The gentleman says he did not sign the Southern Address. No, I never expected him to do it. I knew that the motives of that Senator (pointing to Mr. Rusk) were pure and upright; and every man knows him to be so. I know him and I admire him; and he will allow me to say I hope that I have a true affection for him. I say nothing about the motives of anybody else. The Senator did not sign the address. No, sir; but I admit that there were many honest and patriotic members of Congress who did not sign it. The late Speaker of the House of Representatives, Mr. Cobb, and others, whose motives I have always vindicated, did not subscribe the Southern Address. But there was a mode of manifesting opposition to this address as a political movement, and there is a spirit capable of being manifested on such an occasion, which, among men of proper astuteness of mind, will supply the plainest evidence of the basest treachery to a Southern constituency, and of the grossest infidelity to Southern rights.

I suppose the gentleman did not mean to say anything unkind, when he spoke of this resolution of mine as blackening the white paper on which it was written. That particular gentleman is never found enlisted in the process of blackening anything. Oh, no! all his movements are as pure as vestal purity itself.

He denounces this resolution as a torch, introduced, as he says, into the Democratic party, in order to consume the temple of our party strength. He considers it a sort of incendiary movement, I suppose.

He seemed to intimate that the resolution was introduced also by somebody who wished to "lead" and "direct" the people. I know he intends no unkindness. Oh, no, the Senator from Texas is just the kindest man in the world; but I must say, before God and my country, that I introduced that resolution, alone, for the purpose of aiding, as far as I could, in securing a restoration of fraternal feeling in this country. Every enlightened Southern man, in my opinion, must see that the South is entitled, at this moment, on the part of our Northern brethren, to some special assurance that the fugitive slave law shall be faithfully executed. I, for one, as a Southern man, am willing to give to my brethren of the North an assurance, in return, that the remainder of the compromise scheme—the District of Columbia bill, and the rest—shall be faithfully carried out.

I know, sir, that my motives have been arraigned, but I aver, that no man of honesty, no man of sound intellect, no man whose mind is not unduly swayed by prejudice of some kind, can look at my whole conduct in this affair, and censure me for any act which I have performed. I have attempted to force no man to vote for this resolution, nor have I used urgent persuasions of any kind to secure the support of honorable Senators. I have spoken what I thought was true, when I said that I thought it was a movement, in support of which patriots of both the old political parties could unite, from regard to the vital interests of the country, and with a view to restoring quiet and fraternal feeling among us.

Sir, for one, I am desirous that the question of slavery, in its various bearings, should be entirely withdrawn from the presidential contest, and that this important election should take place without the least regard to what has occurred in connection with it. But I feel bound to say that, in my opinion, there would not have been any particular opposition to this resolution in the Senate, if certain gentlemen, easy to be named, had not chanced to entertain presidential aspirations. This is our whole difficulty. Every man who is disposed to perform his duty, independently and honestly, as a Senator, without looking to the right or to the left, or entering into secret arrangements, in order to get a particular class of votes north of Mason and Dixon's line, for some high office, (he being a slaveholder south of that line,) would be likely to approve this resolution. If there are Northern politicians (I trust there are none such) who are disposed to cater to undue local excitements in the South, and by the manifestation of an apparent sympathy with factionists there, are striving to arrange for additional support in that quarter of the country, in the expected presidential contest, I hold that they are unworthy of the respect of the nation. The man who cannot forget all personal aspirations, at such a moment as this—the poor wretch, in whose heart sentiments of pure and elevated patriotism do not display themselves, and under circumstances like those which now exist, is unworthy to be recognized as an American citizen. The contemptible demagogue who would enter into a corrupt and illicit scheme for the purpose of securing support, as a presidential aspirant of a particular body of factionists in the North, by the avowal of more sympathy for them and their principles than any honest Southern man can profess, is not only unworthy of the Presidency, but unfit to act as a constable in the most obscure hole in the Republic.

I believe I have given the gentleman a Rowland for his Oliver, as I promised him I would do; and I am content with the result of our most kindly and amicable conference.

Mr. HOUSTON. I was very much edified, and I might say amused, by the remarks of the honorable Senator from Mississippi. I cannot but be astonished at the temper of the gentleman. I had not intended to say anything to excite his ire, because I flatter myself that I am a prudent man, and do not like to provoke assaults. I am exceedingly gratified at one thing. In the course of his entire tirade, I believe the gentleman did not state a single fact. He has indulged in many conjectures in relation to Free-Soilism and catering for the Presidency. Why, I should feel that I was not only degrading myself, but degrading the nation and the body in the midst of which I stand, if I would cater to the passions of men or compromise my principles for the Presidency. What I have, I have. I wish to make no new voyages. I am satisfied with the position which I occupy. What I might adventure might be lost. Therefore, I have no petty hankerings after office to gratify. Nor have I any party intrigues to enter into. I have had no correspondence on the subject of the Presidency. The world is acquainted with what I have said. What I do, they make it a point to know. The same charge was made against me on my way here; but, as you, Mr. President, very well know, I expressed the same sentiments at Montgomery, Alabama, which I have expressed here to-day. I addressed a public assemblage there. They knew my sentiments. There were no Free-Soilers there with whom to concoct schemes of personal aggrandizement for presidential advancement. The honorable Senator has no desire to be King; but I think that for a few years past he has been playing Warwick or King-maker. He has made various insinuations against me which I would not have made against any gentleman on this floor. When I have resentments, I speak them out. When I have charges to make, I make them directly. I do not imply a charge and then disavow the imputation. I do not state a hypothetical case, leaving others to apply it. I did not charge the gentleman with having derived this resolution from the State Department. I have not said that it was concocted there. The gentleman seems to acknowledge the wish to raise a third party, to break up the two old parties, and run a third-party man for the Presidency. Whether the honorable Senator from Mississippi is to be front or rear in the race, I do not know. I do not impute any design of the kind.

I should be sorry to suppose that there could be the least ground for applying to me the term "demagogue." What demagogism was there when I gave unpopular votes in this body, when there was no prospect for advancement in popularity, for I was denounced far and near? What intrigue could I then have had, with a party unimportant in the country, when I could have gone with the whole South if I had chosen to sacrifice my own opinions on the Oregon question? Was I playing the demagogue when I refused to sign the Southern Address? Did I not vote for every one of these compromise measures? The honorable Senator from Mississippi did not vote for them all. I voted for all. I think, then, that I am a better compromise man than the honorable Senator from Mississippi.

If I had charged the gentleman with a design to distract the Democratic party, he might have repelled the charge. If I had charged the gentleman with manufacturing a platform to suit the peculiar condition of Mississippi, I would only have reiterated a charge which I have heard frequently for a year or more. The gentleman's furious onslaught has given me a better opinion of my character as a man; for if we had sworn together to commit high treason, he would certainly have betrayed me. The honorable gentleman reminds me of an anecdote, which I will relate to the Senate:

There was a reverend gentleman, one Parson Means, possessing many amiable and excellent qualities as a neighbor and as a companion. He was a generous, hospitable man, but he had a restless disposition, and never could be kept out of mischief, notwithstanding the restraints of religion and morality. He disorganized every church and congregation with which he had any connection. He was a common agitator. At last he passed from the stage of action. Afterwards a particular friend, and a great admirer of his, had a vision in which he was translated to Paradise. When he arrived there, he felt, as he represented, somewhat strange and solitary. He thought he would like to see some old friend or acquaintance, and the first one who presented himself to his mind was Parson Means. He inquired for Parson Means, and was informed that he was not there, but that perhaps he could be found in Purgatory. He repaired to Purgatory, and was received by the keeper with great cordiality and courtesy. While compliments were passing between them, a loud noise was heard in Purgatory. "Stop," said the keeper, interrupting the conversation, "wait a moment if you please; Parson Means has broken his chains, and unless I have him fastened again he will turn Purgatory upside down." [Great laughter.]

When I review the conduct of the honorable Senator from Mississippi for several days, and indeed for several years past, I have had deeply impressed upon my mind the anecdote of Parson Means. The course the Senator has pursued has suggested itself so strikingly to me, that I could not resist relating the anecdote to the Senate for their application of it.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President—

Mr. FOOTE. I hope the honorable Senator will allow me to make an explanation.

Mr. HALE. I suppose I must give way.

Mr. FOOTE. What I have said I have said. All I have uttered I uttered with gravity, with a solemn conviction of the truth of every syllable enunciated by me. I have used the language of honesty and patriotism. If I have delineated character in a somewhat striking manner, it is because I understand that character well, from having studied it closely, and from having made up my mind concerning it without prejudice. The Senator from Texas says that I have spoken indirectly. He is the only gentleman who thinks so. Certainly I meant all that I have said that was at all disrespectful for him, and for him alone; and the whole country will so understand it.

The PRESIDENT. If the Chair had supposed that such was the intention of the Senator, he would have felt it his duty to call him to order.

Mr. FOOTE. I do not now repeat what I have said. My reason for not applying my denunciatory language directly, was that I knew I could not do so without violating the rules of senatorial propriety. I knew, sir, that if I did so you would call me to order. Having given my reason for using indirect language, I hope the gentleman, and everybody else, will understand me. A word as to the gentleman's anecdote. He may consider me a very restless person; and if he supposes it necessary to chain me in order to prevent my doing mischief to his presidential pretensions, or something else in which he is interested, all I have to say is, that it is not in his power to forge a chain strong enough to hold me in duress, when I have, a public duty to perform, and especially such a duty as I have been called to perform this morning. My language is ever free, unequivocal, and independent; and whenever I find a case of concealed iniquity, requiring, in my judgment, a prompt and explicit disclosure, I shall be ever ready to employ such language of manly contempt and indignation as the occasion may seem to demand. I am perfectly content, in harmony with his very chaste and classical anecdote, either to go to Purgatory headlong, or descend in infernus, as may suit his taste.

Mr. HOUSTON. I have a better illustrative anecdote than the one I told, but I shall not occupy the time of the Senate by repeating it at this late hour. Mr. President, I assure you, I assure the Senate, and I assure the country, that every insinuation against me of indirect plotting by myself or by my friends, within my knowledge, with one party or another—very insinuation that imputes to me any other design than that of preserving the Government in its purity, and the Democratic party in its own faith without an extension of platform, is altogether unfounded. I voted for the compromise, for every measure of it. But I did not insinuate that I had started it. The records of the Senate, however, will show that I gave out the inception of a suggestion of a committee of six Senators. In my absence, owing to the sickness of members of my family, the honorable Senator from Mississippi introduced his resolution for the appointment of a committee of thirteen. Whoever insinuates that I have had any intrigue, or any understanding, or any correspondence upon the subject of free-soil, abolition, disunion, or secession, insinuates what is utterly unfounded, and without the slightest countenance of truth. I make that declaration here without any feelings of unkindness towards the gentleman from Mississippi, for I can assure him that I wish him a smooth and untroubled path of life, and that for his own good and for the gratification of his friends, I hope it may be less troublous hereafter than it has been heretofore. [Laughter.]

Mr. FOOTE, of Mississippi. I thank the gentleman for his generous wishes in my behalf. I trust I may have a quiet career hereafter. I have felt pained at the necessity, which I thought was imposed upon me, of vindicating myself on this occasion. The first assault did not come from me. The Senator from Texas will bear me witness that I warned him solemnly this morning, that, if at this moment when I was about starting for my home, he should undertake to indulge in illiberal remarks, in the expectation that I would probably not stay here and vindicate myself, he would find himself to have committed a great error.

I will announce to him now, that he cannot get out of the predicament in which he has deliberately placed himself. The language of the gentleman in the first instance, as he declares, was intended to be strictly political. My words of derogation and contempt were designed to be most emphatically personal. I have nothing more to say.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I am not inclined to take any part in this debate at this time; nor do I know that I shall take part in it to-morrow morning. If I were to consult my own feelings, after what has passed between gentlemen, I would not say a word. But I must be permitted to express my surprise that the honorable Senator from Texas [Mr. HOUSTON] should have thought proper to wage war on the constitution of South Carolina. It is not the first, second, nor third time that he has thought proper to allude to the constitution and laws of South Carolina, and to hold them, as far as he could, to censure and condemnation. I have not the least idea that the constitution of South Carolina is in any danger from the assaults of the honorable Senator. I would just as soon suppose that a diamond could be cut by having rubbed upon it a piece of stained glass. But allow me to say, in a tone of seriousness, that if the sentiment of union between us, the representatives of the sovereign States, is to be preserved and cherished, it will not be by allowing any man upon this floor to look into the constitution of a State which one of his fellow Senators represents and make criticisms upon it.

Next to the religion of any people is their laws and constitution. Now, what would be thought of a Senator upon this floor rising and speaking of the representatives of Louisiana—I do not know that either of them is a Catholic, but there is a very large Catholic population in Louisiana—or of Maryland, where there is also a large Catholic population, and of the religion of their constituents in language of censure? What would be thought of any Senator who spoke in terms of censure of the religion of any portion of the people? And I say that next to the religion of any people, is their laws and constitution.

I would as soon suppose that the Roman constitution would have suffered from the rebuke of the Scythian, as that the constitution of South Carolina will suffer from any remarks of the honorable Senator from Texas. I am sorry that he has thought proper to allude to it for the third or fourth time. What brought that subject into this debate? Does the gentleman suppose that by bringing himself in comparison with South Carolina and her institutions, he is to shine more brightly by the contrast, in his professions of love for the Union? Is that his object? Why has he selected peculiarities in the constitution of South Carolina, when they obtained in the constitution of almost every State in the Confederacy, until very recently. Some provisions which have been put into the constitutions of the States of late years, have not, in my opinion, improved them. Why, at this moment North Carolina has the same features in her constitution, so far as regards a property qualification for Governor and a property qualification for Senators. In Georgia, a Senator sometimes represents five hundred people, while another may represent two thousand or three thousand. It is so.

What does the Senator mean when he speaks of an "oligarchy" in South Carolina? Does he mean to say that the people of South Carolina are governed as slaves by an oligarchy who have concealed from them the knowledge of their rights, or have defrauded them of those rights? I will not speak in anything like flattery of the people of South Carolina; but I would inform the Senator that that people will not appeal to him for instruction as to their rights. Philip of Macedon had a party in Greece; Napoleon Bonaparte had a party in Italy; and perhaps the gentleman may suppose that he has a Houston party in South Carolina.

The Senator asked a question which is perhaps illustrative of his doctrine as to the relation of the Federal and State Governments. What was it? I wish to put it in a prominent point of view, with no disposition to throw anything like personal odium on him. But he asked, in a very emphatic manner, if the Federal Government were to inhibit the people of New York, or of any other State, from voting for electors of President and Vice President, would it not be considered an outrageous usurpation of their rights? He turned round and in the next breath said, South Carolina had done the same thing, and she is to be held equally responsible to the condemnation of history, or I suppose to the condemnation of the gentleman, who is to set himself up as the muse of history—as the modern Clio.

Mr. HOUSTON. I said nothing about condemnation.

Mr. BUTLER. No; but the gentleman made this illustration. The gentleman's doctrine will have that effect to some extent. I have always contended that the Federal Government acted under derivative and delegated powers, and could not by any act of legislation affect any State beyond the powers conferred. I have contended that the States possessed all powers that have not been delegated to the Federal Government; that they are on a parallel of equality. The idea of the Senator, as I understood it, was, that because she has thought proper by her constitution to exercise her franchise for electors of President and Vice President in a certain way, she is as reprehensible as the Federal Government would have been if it had done the same thing. He cannot get rid of that proposition. The fact is that nearly every State in the Union exercised this power in the same way as South Carolina until very recently. In South Carolina the people vote for the representatives who elect the Governor. They vote for representatives, knowing that those representatives are to select presidential electors. They do not make the matters of popular election directly, but they are so indirectly, because these things are done with intelligence. The people of South Carolina know their rights, and they exercise them in a way they think most conducive to the security of the community. I am one of those who believe that the United States is an organized confederacy of republics. I am not one of those who believe that it is a wild democracy. This thing of breaking down the conservative guarantees of State constitutions will destroy the Confederacy.

The gentleman talks of the Union. It is one of his themes. I believe he is the only practical secessionist on this floor. I believe he is the only man here who voluntarily left the Union. He left the Confederacy and went abroad to enjoy practically in another community these high democratic or sans culotte doctrines which he professes. Sir, I believe he did not go, like Coriolanus, to make war on his ancient mother. I have never said or believed anything of the kind. He went to make his fortune, and I award to him all the reputation of being historically connected with the creation of the State which he now so very ably represents. I shall deny him nothing. But I do say, and I say it now for the first time, that he is the last man who should speak unfavorably of South Carolina. Look at the course of South Carolina in connection with the history of Texas. Who proposed for the first time in the Senate of the United States to recognize the independence of Texas? He was a Senator from South Carolina—William C. Preston. Who supported it in the other House? My friend and relative, General Johnson. Who consummated it? My distinguished predecessor and colleague, Mr. Calhoun—with an ability for which the gentleman ought to feel an obligation instead of a disposition to throw imputations on his memory. Sir, who was the hero of the Alamo? Who commanded the troops with so much gallantry at the battle of San Jacinto? A citizen and native of South Carolina, my friend General Rusk. Who was the gallant Travis? He was born not more than five miles from my place of birth. His gallant compeer, Bonham, drank out of the same spring, and went to the same school. Who advanced money for Texas when she needed it? A South Carolinian. Who have had a greater agency, next to the gentleman himself, in bringing into existence a political association with this Confederacy the State of Texas than the people of South Carolina? Yet it is the institutions of that State the gentleman is continually aspersing:

"How sharper than a serpent's tooth it is To have a thankless child."

The honorable Senator has expressed kind feelings for me and for my family. I believe he entertains them; but I cannot suffer my mother and my country to be assailed under compliments of the kind. The injustice which has been pronounced upon that State more than once, must be rebuked, or I cannot hold my place upon this floor with anything like feelings of perfect equality. No man on this floor has the right to look into the institutions of another State. I will not have the indecency to do so. Suppose I were to look into the institutions of Texas, and hold up something that I might not approve, what would be thought of it? It has only been done on this floor by the Senator from Texas in relation to South Carolina. It is the fourth time it has been done by him.

I have not said that the gentleman is a candidate for the Presidency and is fishing for popular support. If he were to fish in South Carolina for popular support, and to appeal to the people, as distinguished from the rulers, as he calls them, he would fish with a hook so naked that the people would see and despise it. I know, sir, that a great deal might be said on this subject. I do not wish to protract this debate, for I do not feel that the institutions of South Carolina are in danger from the gentleman's attacks. Coke's Commentaries upon Littleton have been read, and have instructed the great lawyers of the land. Justinian has embalmed and given immortality to the Pandects. I suppose we shall have a book coming out, "Houston on the Constitution of South Carolina," as equal with them in literary merit and instructive matter. I am willing to let it go forth with all the authority of the Senator's high name.

Mr. HOUSTON. It is seldom that I ask the indulgence of the Senate; it is with regret that I ask that indulgence now. I started upon the compromise resolution, but I believe we have travelled off and around it until we have got to "Coke and Justinian." I am really very sorry that the honorable Senator from South Carolina has gone so much into detail in relation to the position I bear to his State. It would appear from his remarks that I had wantonly, at various times, made attacks on South Carolina. I will be a little personal to myself, but I hope not egotistical, in stating the only occasions on which I made any allusions to the constitution of South Carolina. The first difficulty that originated was with a distinguished citizen of South Carolina, and I hope the gentleman did not understand me as casting the slightest reflection on the late Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN.]

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator said that he did not intend to cast any such reflection; therefore I must believe him. I always confide in that Senator's word.

Mr. HOUSTON. I said that I buried any resentment which I might have had against him, and I wished it so understood. I have no resentments against the dead. I was proceeding to state that the first thing in this controversy was the denunciation of me by that distinguished man, when he said that I ought to be held up to public reprobation for voting for the Oregon bill. I adverted to that matter in an address to my constituents. The next cause was a letter which I received of a most abusive character from Colonel Gadsden, of that State. I responded to it. I was not the assailant in either case. The next cause was, that a member of the other House issued a most scurrilous publication against me. I repelled that; so that I was merely acting defensively. At the conclusion of the last session an attack was made on me by a Senator, which was followed up by another. I am now repelling that attack, which I had not the opportunity of doing then. I care not what others may think about it; but I thought it due to myself that I should let these facts be known. I designed no reflection beyond the facts. I intended to say nothing in derogation of the State of South Carolina, or of her citizens.

We have lately seen a practical manifestation of the truth of my remarks. The Legislature has taken one course in the recent proceedings in that State; the matter was submitted to the people; and notwithstanding the unanimity of the Legislature, we find that the people, by eight thousand majority, negated the course indicated, so that I am right in relation to the matter in South Carolina.

The Senator says that I am a practical secessionist. I never was a secessionist. If I left my own to visit an adjacent country, it was no secession from principle or from allegiance to this country. If a new government was formed, and I was a part of that government, I owed my allegiance to it, but that did not make me an enemy to my native land. It is said South Carolina has imposed obligations on Texas in her veriest need. I recollect that a Governor of South Carolina denounced Texas and her cause when she was bleeding at every pore. When her women and children were fugitives, and distracted with fear and apprehension—when an invading and victorious enemy were sweeping over her plains—then it was that a Governor of South Carolina denounced us as vagrants and vagabonds. Sir, if this imposed an obligation upon us in our veriest need, I have yet to learn a sense of gratitude for such favors. We honor the memory of the gallant sons of South Carolina who fell in the Texan contest, and we have recompensed their representatives as far as possible; but to say that South Carolina ever aided Texas in the advance of one penny—

Mr. BUTLER. I never said that South Carolina did.

Mr. HOUSTON. Then the gentleman says, I suppose, that some of her citizens did.

Mr. BUTLER. I have always understood so. Mr. HOUSTON. I assure the gentleman that he is mistaken in his apprehension. I do not mean any disrespect to South Carolina. I have stated facts. I intended to make no disreputable intimation. I can assure the gentleman that I am not fishing for the favor of South Carolina. I do not like the sea-board, and in the mountains they have nothing but trout, and I never was a fisherman. I would not fish for political influence in South Carolina particularly, until some change or modification takes place in the power of the people to express their opinions. I do say, once for all, that I do not intend to reflect on the people of South Carolina, or on the memory of the illustrious dead. I am sorry we have had such a rambling, desultory debate to-day, but I have done with it.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I do not know that I shall make the motion which it was my intention to make when I at first rose.

Mr. BADGER. I must beg, as a favor of the honorable Senator from New Hampshire, that he will allow me one moment for the purpose of making an explanation.

Mr. HALE. I have given way already an hour and a half for explanations, and I shall never get the floor in the world if I give way any more. I do not know that I shall make the motion which I at first intended to make, which was to lay the subject on the table. I am too unpopular to carry the motion, and too good-natured to persist in it, particularly when I have been notified that several gentlemen want to speak upon it. But I do hope that at a very early day the motion will be made. I wish to call the attention of the Senate, and of the Senator from Mississippi, who is about to leave us, to one fact. He says, and I have no doubt of it, that his intention in introducing the resolution was to produce a brotherly feeling. Well, I think the exhibition he has had here to-day will satisfy him, that so far as we have had any experimental knowledge of the effects of his brotherly resolution, it has been a failure.

Mr. FOOTE. I never expected, when I introduced the resolution, that it would pass without opposition. I expected that every Abolitionist would oppose it, of course; that every Free-Soiler and every disunionist would oppose it. I expected that all from the South who were catering for Free-Soil votes at the North, and that all from the North who were catering for secession votes at the South, would oppose it; but I believed that all patriotic votes—that is, the votes of all the rest of the members of the Senate—would be given in favor of the resolution. I wanted the fight to take place here. I thought the factionists would die hard; but die they must. I thought, however incompetent I might be for destroying such monsters, that I might have a chance for striking one or two blows more for my country.

Mr. HALE. I think that the illustrations of the healing and brotherly influence which this resolution is to produce, was best manifested by the state of mind in which the Senator from Mississippi himself addressed the Senate. It was the operation which it had produced upon himself that induced me to come to the conclusion that it could not produce brotherly feeling.

The Senator said he expected the Free-Soilers to die hard. Why, we can die without making as much fuss as the Senator does in living upon this earth. I think we shall not have as many spasmodic throes as he has in the full life and experiment of the resolution itself. You know, Mr. President, that I am a diffident man; but I think I have a right to advise these gentlemen from the South upon this subject. I appeal to the Senate, that when we had this agitation on our side we managed it in much better temper, and more quietly. If this resolution is to operate on the country as it has operated upon the Senate, the effect will be to throw the patient into fits before it is cured. But that may be the intention of the physician. He may be one of those doctors who cannot cure a patient without throwing him into fits. It is said that there are some such. I believe conscientiously that this resolution is not calculated to do any good in the world; and it certainly cannot be the object of the gentleman from Mississippi to kill off the Free-Soilers before he retires; for he announced here during the last Congress, as often as once a week, that the Free-Soilers were dead.

Mr. FOOTE. We are merely performing their obsequies now.

Mr. HALE. But they are not dead. It seems to me that the task of killing them is not over. It is altogether a mistake. I want to call the attention of my friends to another view of this subject presented by the honorable Senator from Mississippi the other day. In urging Southern men to vote for the resolution, he gave as a reason that the South had got everything they claimed; but he added, by way of proviso, that they claimed nothing but what was right and patriotic.

Mr. FOOTE. Nothing but what the Constitution allowed.

Mr. HALE. He did say so; but he said they got everything they claimed. But to-day he says it is a thoroughly Democratic measure, by which I understand the modern definition of his democracy is, that it is thoroughly Democratic to give to the South everything they want, and that is the reason Southern men are to vote for this compromise resolution. I want to appeal to some Northern gentlemen here, for there are some Northern members on this floor representing Northern States and Northern constituencies. What can we—we patriotic men, I am not speaking of factionists—after we have taken this dose, and given this great glory to our friend to go home to Mississippi with, what can we tell our constituents that we got? The South, remember, got all she claimed; what did we get?

Mr. BADGER. All the rest.

Mr. HALE. The honorable Senator from North Carolina has made the best answer in the world. The South got everything she asked; the North got all the rest. That is a complete answer, and it is a highly satisfactory solution of the whole difficulty. With that I suppose we can stand before our constituents.

But the honorable Senator from Mississippi, as I said the other day, does not consider this to be final. He means it to be final until the South wants something more, and then the compromise is no longer binding.

Before the honorable Senator goes home, I can assure him that if he has not produced a brotherly feeling all around, he has on me: I have none but the kindest feelings for him. But when he and the honorable Senator from South Carolina [Mr. RYER] the other day were disputing the palm with one another, to know who had done most for the Abolitionists, and which acted with them the best, I remembered very well that it used to be the fashion when I was getting what little education I have, to have debating societies, where the disputants displayed themselves, and where it was the fashion for the presiding officer to scan up the merits of the various disputants, and to award the palm. As it is not precisely in accordance with your position, Mr. President, to assume that place, and as from the very nature of the case, I supposed the appeal was made to me to pronounce which was the better Abolitionist of the two, I think it is my duty to the country to announce the fact. I can assure both of these honorable Senators that they have done a great deal more for the Abolitionists than either of them is aware of. But on the score of magnanimity, and on no other score, I think I must award the palm to Mississippi; and I will tell the honorable Senator why. He says the South got all they claimed, and having got all they claimed, they are willing to acquiesce for awhile. Having got all they wanted they do not care about dissolving the Union. South Carolina is in the same category with Mississippi. She gets everything she wants, and everything the North has got to give; but, like the old lady who got a new kettle, she is neither for borrowing nor lending any more. She is for dissolving the Union and going on for herself. Having got everything she claimed, and everything we could give, she thinks the Constitution has entirely failed to bring about what was intended, and she is for going off. Mississippi has the advantage in this respect, and in this alone.

I would not undertake to go further into the comparison. If the honorable Senator would permit me to quote Latin, I would say non nostrum inter vos tantas componere lites. I would leave the controversy between the two where it stands; but I must say that I hope I shall not hurt anybody in Mississippi by doing this.

Mr. FOOTE. Do not praise me too much.

Mr. HALE. I will not praise the gentleman too much. I only give him credit for magnanimity. On that score alone, I give the palm to Mississippi. If I were to follow the dictates of my own judgment, I would move to lay this resolution on the table, not that I think it will do any great hurt to the Free-Soil party or to anybody else. I am certain, however, that it will do no good. I sympathize with some of those honorable gentlemen who spoke to-day for the private claimants; and I think that something is due to them. I do not wish the whole time of the Senate to be occupied during this long session in re-discussing what took us a long session two years ago to discuss. We have in our courts in New Hampshire a sort of trial on review; and I have always found in my experience as a practitioner, that it takes twice as long to try a case on review as on the original issue. This is caused by new evidence coming up, and the case being presented in new aspects. What is this? Stript of its technicalities, it is nothing but the trial, upon review, of the compromise measures. The honorable Senator who introduced it was in a hurry to have it passed, so that he might go home in season to be inaugurated Governor of Mississippi, and carry the resolution in his pocket. He may go home, be inaugurated, serve his time out, and come back; and, in the ordinary course of legislation, we shall not have got through the resolution unless the Senate come to the conclusion that they will do something practical, and lay the resolution on the table. I shall not make the motion which I rose to make, because I see some gentlemen opposite me—some young gentlemen—who are anxious to distinguish themselves before the country, and shed light on the subject, and I am desirous to hear them.

Mr. CLEMENS next obtained the floor; but it being four o'clock, he yielded the floor,

And the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, December 22, 1851.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Mr. MORGAN.

The Journal of Thursday last was read and approved.

ALPHABETICAL LIST OF CLAIMS.

Mr. DANIEL, by unanimous consent, from the Committee of Claims, presented to the House a report made to him, as chairman of said committee, by the late Clerk of the House, Richard M. Young, showing the progress made in preparing an alphabetical list of private claims, the nature of said claims, and the action thereon, accompanied by the following resolutions, viz:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be and he is hereby directed to have completed, in the shortest possible time consistent with accuracy, the digest of claims authorized by the resolution of the House of the 27th of January, 1848, and the 2d of September, 1850, in the manner and at the rate of compensation therein authorized to the extra clerks employed upon the same; and that he pay the compensation due for services already performed on the work, which has been withheld in consequence of the restriction as to time in the resolution of 1850.

Resolved, further, That the Clerk be and he is hereby required to withhold the work from the press until the whole of it shall have been completed and subjected to a re-examination with the journals, reports, laws, &c., and to have reprinted so much of that now printed as shall, by the discovery of errors in it, connected with that now incomplete, or otherwise, be deemed necessary; and that the work, when ready for the press, be printed by the printer now engaged upon it.

[A message was received from the Senate, informing the House of the passage, by that body, of the joint resolution of the House providing for the printing of additional copies of the Journal and documents; also, an act to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to issue a register to the brig Ada; also, an act granting to the State of Mississippi the right of way and a donation of public land for the purpose of locating and constructing a railroad from Brandon to the eastern borders of said State, in the direction of Montgomery, Alabama.]

The resolutions of the Committee having been read,

Mr. DANIEL said: I beg leave to state, that as this matter requires the immediate action of the House, I trust there will be no objection. It is in regard to the digest of private claims which was authorized by a previous Congress, and continued under a resolution of the last Congress. The printer has suspended the work, awaiting the action of the House, as some inaccuracies have been found in the work, until the sense of the House can be taken whether they shall be corrected or not. The committee have had the matter under consideration, and have authorized me to report to the House the resolutions which have been read, that the House may see the state of the work. I ask that the Clerk read the report I send to his desk. It is a report made to me, as chairman of the committee, which more properly might have been made to yourself as the Presiding Officer of the House.

The report of the late Clerk of the House, showing the progress made in preparing the alphabetical list of private claims, was then read.

Mr. JONES. I wish to inquire of the chairman of the Committee of Claims, when it is probable that this work will be completed, and how many clerks are now employed upon it; and, also, what sort of volume it will make?

Mr. DANIEL. It will make three volumes about the size of the Congressional Globe. There are about a dozen clerks now employed upon the work, and I understand, if the course recommended by the committee be pursued, it will be completed in five to ten months, and then we shall have probably a work as nearly accurate as one can be made.

Mr. JONES. The thing was wrong in the start. I am opposed to going on with it.

Mr. APPLETON, of Maine. I would like to inquire if the committee know what amount of money has been already expended and contracted for?

Mr. DANIEL. I will first give the House some idea of the progress and origin of the work, and they can then judge for themselves. This work was authorized previous to the last Congress, and was recommended by the Committee of Claims. They found in their investigation, that some digest and index referring them to the action, which the two Houses of Congress had had upon the various claims which had been before them, would not only facilitate the labors of the several Committees, but would tend to protect Congress from imposition. It was found, that claims sometimes rejected in one shape, sometimes assumed another shape, and afterwards very unjustly passed. I have been referred to a case, which was twice paid by Congress, at the distance of only eight years. The committee, therefore, felt the necessity of such a work, and recommended that a work similar to the digest of claims which had been prepared by the Senate, should be also prepared, containing all the cases which had been before this House, and that Mr. Young, a gentleman of this city, who had performed the duties of clerk to the Committee of Claims in previous years, should prepare the work. During the last Congress, feeling the necessity of the work, and wishing to have it completed as soon as possible, the Committee of Claims inquired what progress had been made, and found that although Mr. Young had been engaged some three years, he had made but very little progress, and that if he were alone employed upon it, years would elapse before we should have the work, without any saving, as regards expense. It seemed best, therefore, to the Committee of the last Congress, that the work should be hastened, but first requested the Clerk of the House to ascertain, from such source as would impart correct information, what force would be necessary, in addition to the Clerks of the House, to complete the work within twelve months. We wished to have it completed by the last session of the last Congress. It was a matter about which all was mere conjecture. We had no idea of the vast labor which was required, nor, as it seems, had the Clerk, who supposed that seven extra clerks would be sufficient to complete the work within twelve months. The House, under the recommendation of the Committee of Claims, therefore, passed a resolution authorizing an additional number of clerks, but thought proper not to restrict him as to the number, for it was very obvious that it was all mere conjecture. As the work had been commenced, and we were desirous of having the work completed, and if seven clerks were not sufficient to complete it, that the Clerk should be authorized to employ a greater force. He proceeded at first with the smallest number supposed to be necessary to complete the work in the requisite time. But as the time approached he found that the force was not sufficient, and enlarged it to something like a dozen. They have been employed in making examinations—they have gone through the Journals, reports, and laws—they have examined written and printed reports—they have examined the files, and in fact everything relating to the action of the House upon the various claims which had been before it as well as the Senate. They have, as I understand, completed the alliteration of all the letters of the alphabet, except perhaps the letters M, S, and T. They have made extracts from printed reports, laws, and the files of the House, and arranged them under their respective letters. That is the condition of the work, so far as the alliteration is concerned. The late Clerk, being exceedingly anxious to hasten the work, thought proper to have the copies of the alliteration under the two first letters of the alphabet, A and B, sent to the printer, and they have been printed.

Mr. McMULLIN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question? Was it not understood that this work was to be finished by the 1st of September last?

Mr. DANIEL. It was so expected, sir; but, as I have stated, it was not so finished. There was no just idea of the immense amount of labor which it involved. The object of the index or digest is for the purpose of reference to claims which have been before Congress. It must be obvious to the House that the same claims may appear under different names. For instance, an original claimant presents a claim. After it has been pending some time, he dies. Then his representative presents it. The claim would appear first in the name of the original claimant, which name might begin with the letter A, and subsequently it would appear in the name of his representative—sometimes of assignees. The letters A and B have been prepared and sent to the printer before a comparison of the alliteration under subsequent letters had been made; and, therefore, there is no reference of cases under those two letters to the same cases appearing under different names beginning with subsequent letters of the alphabet. After sending the work so far as it was supposed to be completed to the printer, the clerks, on proceeding with a comparison of other letters, found that there were many cases under other letters that ought to be referred to under letters A and B, and that the work would be imperfect unless it should be suspended until the alliteration was completed, and the copies for the printer be compared with the originals, and they with the Journals, reports, &c. Although this work is far more accurate and extended than the work of the Senate, there are, it seems, some mistakes in copying as well as in the abstracts, which we are anxious to have corrected, and have, if possible, an accurate work, and not an imperfect work, like the Digest of the Senate. That, I understand, is exceedingly imperfect. I am informed that there are thousands of cases which have been before the Senate, and upon which they have acted, which are not to be found in the Digest. So that that Digest is calculated to mislead as to cases which it does not embrace, but which have in truth been acted upon by the Senate; and I understand there are thousands of cases that have been omitted. This we wish to avoid in the Digest under consideration. If the Digest which has been prepared thus far, should be suffered to go to the printer, although incomplete and inaccurate in some respects, yet it would be valuable, and might aid in guarding against imposition, but would be more valuable if accurate. These matters have been taken into consideration by the Committee of Claims, and they have instructed me to report a resolution which directs the Clerk of the House to withhold the work from the printer until the entire alliteration has been gone through with and compared, and an examination of the Journals, laws, and files of the House have been made, so as to insure the greatest possible degree of accuracy. There is another matter embraced in the resolution which the committee thought proper to bring to the consideration of the House. This is a matter which falls within the contract of the printer of the last Congress. If the work should be suspended as proposed, a claim might be set up by the printer to the present Congress, and the committee have thought proper to provide by resolution, that the work should be done by the printer who has heretofore performed a part of it. He has his type already set up, and can correct with less trouble and expense the defects which exist under the letters A and B, than to make an entire reprint of the work. I will state to the House, that the committee have been informed by the clerk of the Senate Committee on Printing, and one of the printers engaged about the work, that the cost of the printing which has been already done, if that should be thrown aside, will be a little the rise of two thousand dollars. Fourteen hundred copies of the work, under the letters A and B, and some perhaps under the letter C, have been printed. The committee thought it would be best even to pay that sum to have the work accurate. They believe that a great deal of the work which has been printed under letters A and B, might be embraced in subsequent reprints; so that the probability is, if the House see fit to act upon the suggestions of the committee, the cost will be much less than $2,000. It is supposed if they were to compare the copies with the original abstracts, under the different letters, it would require some two or three months to have the work ready for the printer; and to compare the abstracts with the Journals, reports, and laws, might require some four or five months more. The number of clerks employed at present is about twelve, as before stated, and they receive the compensation of engrossing clerks—salaries of $1,500 per annum. The House can see, therefore, what the additional cost will be. I suppose, if the work shall be so prepared and so printed as to insure that accuracy which the committee think highly desirable, the whole cost will be upwards of $20,000—perhaps as high as $25,000. Even if the cost should reach that sum, it might save the Treasury double, treble, even ten times the amount in a single Congress. I trust that with these explanations there will be no objection to the resolutions, and that they will be adopted.

I desire to add one single remark, which I omitted. I understand from the clerks who have been engaged in this investigation, that the indices to the Journals and the reports of the House have been found to be exceedingly inaccurate. In one case several hundred matters that have been before the House are not indexed at all. I make this remark with the hope that those engaged in preparing the indices will pay more attention in future.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, called for the yeas and nays on the adoption of the resolution.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The question was then taken on agreeing to the resolution, and on a division there were—ayes 100, noes 38.

So the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. SACKETT moved to reconsider the vote just taken, and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

RECEPTION OF LOUIS KOSSUTH.

Mr. CARTER asked the unanimous consent of the House to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee of five be appointed by the Chair to wait upon Louis Kossuth on his arrival at the capital, and introduce him to the House of Representatives.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, objected.

Mr. CARTER moved that the rules be suspended, to enable him to introduce the resolution.

Mr. JONES called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. I desire to debate the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The motion now is, to suspend the rules to enable the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CARTER] to offer his resolution.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then taken on the motion to suspend the rules; and there were—yeas 111, nays 58; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Willis Allen, Allison, Andrews, John Appleton, Babcock, Bartlett, Bennett, Bissell, Bowne, John H. Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee, asked leave to record his vote, being without the bar when his name was called; but objection was made.

So, two thirds not voting in the affirmative, the rules were not suspended.

HOLDERS OF BOUNTY LAND WARRANTS.

Mr. BRENTON, by unanimous consent, and pursuant to previous notice, introduced a bill "for the relief of the holders of bounty land warrants issued under the act of September 28, 1850."

The bill was read a first and second time by its title.

Mr. BRENTON. I wish to make a very few remarks in reference to that bill. It is one which, in my opinion, demands the prompt and speedy action of Congress; and if I had confidence in the general correctness of its phraseology, I would ask the House to pass upon it immediately, without any reference to a committee.

The object of the bill is to permit the location of these bounty land warrants upon lands above the minimum price of $1 25 per acre; and also to confirm the titles of the holders of land of that character that has already been located. Under the present law the Commissioner has suspended the operation of locations at several offices upon lands of that character. Many warrants have been located upon these lands under the instructions applicable to the location of Mexican bounty land warrants; but those locations have been suspended, and it is important that they shall be confirmed, in addition to extending the privilege of locating on these lands, to the present holders. Again, patents have already been issued upon locations that have been made of the character described in the bill, and it is important that the last section shall pass in order to confirm the titles of the present holders of these patents. The offices where there are lands of this character are now suspended, as far as the location of warrants is concerned, and have been since some time in the month of September last. I myself know of hundreds of cases where individuals are now held in suspense—locations having been made and the Commissioner having authorized the canceling of those locations in some instances and the suspension of them in others. It is therefore important that the patents of the holders shall be legalized.

Believing that the bill can meet with no objection from any part of the House, I ask that it be put upon its passage immediately. If objection is made, I shall move its reference to the appropriate committee.

Mr. HALL. This is a bill of considerable importance, and I do not think it ought to be passed without being examined by a committee. I therefore move its reference to the Committee on Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

ASSIGNABILITY OF LAND WARRANTS.

Mr. BISSELL moved that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, for the purpose of taking up for consideration the joint resolution explanatory of the act approved September 28th, 1850, entitled "An act granting bounty lands to certain officers and soldiers who have been engaged in the military service of the United States."

Mr. B. said: If the House will indulge me for a single moment, I will state that there are matters contained in this resolution which require prompt action on the part of this House. I know of no measure that has been or can be brought before us that requires prompt action more than the matters embraced in this resolution. I hope, therefore, that there will be no objection to going into committee and passing it to-day.

The resolution provides, amongst other things, for compensating land officers for locating military bounty land warrants. This is but an act of justice, and one which is demanded by every principle that should govern our action here.

I will state to the House, that there are land officers in the West who, under the impression that compensation would be made to them for locating these warrants, have held on to the offices for two or three years, which only yield them one hundred dollars a year above clerk hire. The very fact that all the lands around them in their districts are entered upon by these warrants prevents them, of course, from receiving that percentage which they have heretofore received when their land has been entered by money. All that they get, therefore, is the $500 salary, and very small dribblings received from other sources, which do not compensate them for their labor. I hope there will be no objection to my motion.

Mr. TUCK. I desire to inquire of the gentleman, whether it is his purpose to ask that the other parts of the resolution which he proposes to take up, shall be passed, besides that to which he has referred?

I have not yet heard of any opposition to that part of the gentleman's resolution to which he has referred, but I consider it a matter demanding the utmost deliberation before we determine to create an indefinite and, at present, unknown extension of the law of 1850, granting bounty lands.

Mr. HOUSTON. I call the gentleman to order. I object to this debate.

The SPEAKER. The debate is not in order.

The question was then taken on Mr. BISSELL's motion; and it was agreed to—ayes 81, noes 36; [the Speaker voting in the affirmative to make a quorum.]

So the rules were suspended, and

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. HIBBARD in the chair.)

Mr. RICHARDSON moved to pass by all the business preceding the joint resolution in relation to bounty lands warrants, with the view to take up and consider that resolution.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. That motion is not in order. The 135th rule requires that the business shall be taken up in committee in the order in which it stands upon the calendar; and it is a question for the committee to determine whether they will proceed with the first business in order, or whether it shall be laid over.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The gentleman from Tennessee is right, and I was but anticipating the rule. If, however, the Chairman will designate what the business is that precedes the resolution, I will move to pass it by.

The CHAIRMAN stated that the first business in order was the resolutions of the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. HOUSTON] for the distribution of the President's message to the several standing committees.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I move to lay aside those resolutions.

Mr. HOUSTON. I do not understand the gentleman from New York [Mr. SEYMOUR] as yielding the floor for a motion of that sort. When the committee was last in session, that gentleman was entitled to the floor, and is, therefore, now entitled to it. Unless he shall yield the floor, the motion of the gentleman from Illinois cannot be entertained.

Mr. RICHARDSON. When the gentleman from New York gave way for the committee to rise, he lost the control of the floor. It is for the committee to determine each day what business they will take up. They have entire control of the business.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York. I will state that when the committee last had under consideration the President's message, the floor was awarded to me. The question was about to be taken upon the resolutions introduced by the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. HOUSTON]; and desiring to offer an amendment to one of these resolutions, I obtained the floor. I do not propose to enter into an extended discussion, but merely to offer an amendment to one of the resolutions. For one, I hope that the President's message will take precedence, and that the subjects therein contained will be referred to the appropriate committees, so that the committees of this House may have subjects before them to consider during the recess, or during the time when this House will not be seriously occupied with business until after the 1st of January. It will not take long to dispose of the message, and then this resolution can be taken up.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I rise to a question of order. I desire to know from the Chair whether or not the gentleman from New York is entitled to the floor?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides that the gentleman from New York is entitled to the floor.

Mr. RICHARDSON appealed from the decision of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The business before the committee is the consideration of the resolutions of the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. HOUSTON], in relation to the President's message. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SEYMOUR] having obtained the floor before the committee last rose, the Chair decides that he is now entitled to the floor. From that decision the gentleman from Illinois appeals; and the question now is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?

Mr. RICHARDSON. As I understand that the gentleman from New York desires only to occupy the floor for a few moments, I withdraw the appeal; but I shall renew it hereafter with a view of testing the propriety of the decision of the Chair.

Mr. CARTTER. I want that question decided at once, and therefore I renew the appeal.

The question was then taken, and the Chair was sustained.

Mr. SEYMOUR called for the reading of the eighth resolution; and it was read as follows:

"8. That so much of said message as relates to commerce, the improvement of harbors, reciprocal trade between the United States and Canada, and other British possessions near our frontier, be referred to the Committee on Commerce."

Mr. S. then moved to amend the resolution by inserting before the word "harbors" the words "rivers and;" and also to strike out the 10th resolution, which provides that so much of the message as relates to the improvement of rivers be referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Mr. S. said: Mr. Chairman, the remarks I propose to submit upon this amendment will be very brief and of an entirely practical nature. It will be perceived that the resolution as offered by the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. HOUSTON], proposes, among other things, to submit to the Committee on Commerce the consideration of the improvement of our harbors; whereas the same resolution proposes to submit the subject of the improvement of our rivers to the Committee on Roads and Canals. Now, the amendment which I have submitted proposes to submit the consideration of both these subjects to the Committee on Commerce, as has been the practice of the House heretofore.

I am aware that the resolution as offered by the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. HOUSTON], is strictly in accordance with the 98th rule of this House, by which the Committee on Roads and Canals was established. That rule provides, that this committee shall have consideration of all such petitions and matters or things relating to roads and canals, and the improvement of the navigation of rivers, as shall be presented, or may come in question, or be referred to them by the House, &c. That rule, however, I will remark, bears date twenty years ago; and if gentlemen will take the trouble to examine, they will find that the universal practice of the House, from that period down to the present time, has been to refer all matters relating both to the improvement of harbors and rivers, to the Committee on Commerce. I have not been able to find a single instance where the two subjects have been separated. Such has been the uniform practice of the House, and I suppose it has been thus uniform for good reasons. A full investigation of the matter will convince gentlemen of the propriety of this practice. The subjects themselves are of a similar nature; both have reference to matters affecting the foreign commerce of the country.

A rule which has been promulgated—and which we have endeavored, certainly, to adhere to, in relation to the improvement of rivers—that all appropriations for such objects shall be of a national character, shows the propriety of the reference of all matters pertaining to the navigation of our large rivers, as well as those pertaining to the improvement of our harbors upon the Atlantic and Pacific coast, or upon the lakes, to the Committee on Commerce. The committee will perceive that appropriations made for these subjects, if separated, will often be expended upon similar objects. The improvement of a river is many times the improvement of a harbor—the river itself helping to form that harbor. Gentlemen are aware of the great pressure for appropriations upon these subjects. I trust, therefore, that they will see the propriety and importance of referring them both to the Committee on Commerce, in order that those subjects, which are kindred in their character, may be considered and decided upon by one and the same committee. If the House is to pass a bill the present session, making such appropriations as our constituents may reasonably expect, it seems to me that it can be better matured in one committee than in both. I wish to be distinctly understood, in making this motion, that I cast no disrespect upon any member of the Committee on Roads and Canals. I believe that this, or any other subject, which it may be the good pleasure of the House to refer to them, will receive their deliberate and impartial investigation; and I believe that investigation would be conducted with ability. I make the motion for the purpose of preserving uniformity of proceeding upon this subject, and for the purpose of subserving to what I believe will be the best interests of the country, in relation to these matters. I present these remarks for the consideration of the committee, and I leave them to make what disposition of the subject they may deem proper.

Mr. BISSELL. As this subject furnishes a theme for discussion about as illimitable as any other, I move that it be now laid aside.

Mr. ROBINSON. I hope that it will not be the pleasure of the committee to pass it over.

Mr. BISSELL. Well, I make the motion to lay it aside temporarily, in order to take up the next business on the calendar.

Mr. ORR. I desire to inquire of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. BISSELL], if the resolution which he proposes taking up, has been printed and laid upon the desks of members?

Mr. BISSELL. It has been printed, but it seems has not been very generally distributed.

Mr. ORR. I will merely remark that I have just sent out for a copy of it and cannot obtain one.

The question now being upon the motion to lay aside the resolution under consideration,

Mr. BISSELL demanded tellers, which were ordered, and Messrs. CARTER and FOWLER appointed.

The question was then taken, and the tellers reported—ayes 41, noes 57; no quorum voting.

[Cries of "Re-count!" and "Call the roll!"]

The CHAIRMAN said that the roll would be called to ascertain the names of the absentees.

The roll was then called and the committee rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the chairman of the committee reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union having found itself without a quorum, had instructed him to report that fact to the House, with the names of the absentees.

A quorum being now present, the committee resumed its session; and the question being taken upon the motion to lay aside the resolution under consideration, the tellers reported—ayes 65, noes 61.

So the motion prevailed.

The CHAIRMAN stated the next business in order to be a joint resolution explanatory of the act approved September 28, 1850, entitled "An act granting bounty land to certain officers and soldiers who have been engaged in the military service of the United States."

Mr. DUNHAM desired to offer an amendment. Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, called for the reading of the resolution.

It was read by the Clerk. The following is the first section, as read:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That nothing in the act approved September 28, 1850, "granting bounty land to certain officers and soldiers who have been engaged in the military service of the United States," shall be construed as to prevent the sale and transfer of any certificate or warrant issued by virtue of said act, prior to the location of the same, or the issue of the patent thereon.

Mr. DUNHAM. I desire to offer an amendment, which I send to the table, to come in as an additional section.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana propose to amend the first section?

Mr. DUNHAM. I do not.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I suggest to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. DUNHAM,] that he move to amend in such a manner that the whole shall take the form of an act, and not of a resolution.

Mr. DUNHAM made a reply that was entirely inaudible to the reporter.

Mr. STEPHENS. Then I move to amend the first section, by striking out the word "Resolved," and inserting the words "Be it enacted."

The question being taken, the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FICKLIN. I move to amend the first section by inserting the following as a substitute therefor:

SECTION 1. That hereafter all military bounty land warrants shall be assignable by indorsement thereon, and may be either by a special or blank assignment, but shall in all cases be dated on the day of the assignment, attested by two competent witnesses, and acknowledged before some officer authorized to take the acknowledgment of deeds, who shall certify that the person making the assignment is personally known to him to be the individual making the assignment, or that his identity was established by two competent witnesses, which said assignment to be attested by the seal of a court of the proper county, and shall authorize the assignee thereof to locate the said warrant in his own name.

Mr. FICKLIN. It may be proper for me to say, in explanation of the amendment I propose, that I concur entirely with my friend from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS,] that it is proper that this resolution should throughout assume the form of an act. I think it proper also that, instead of saying that nothing in the act shall be construed to prevent an assignment, that there should be an express authority given to make the assignment; and that the mode of making it should be designated, so that all may understand it. As I understand it, sir, the act which has heretofore been passed making land warrants assignable, is so loose that infinite frauds upon the Government in making assignments have been committed; and that one location after another has been set aside by the proper officers of Government, because of defects in the assignment and transfer of warrants. I am not prepared to say that the amendment I propose is perfect; but I am prepared to say that there should be an amendment giving express authority to the holders of these warrants to assign them, and also pointing out the mode and manner of making that assignment, so that it may be understood by every person how he can effect an assignment of these warrants to make them good at the land offices.

Mr. BISSELL. As the amendment proposed by my colleague [Mr. FICKLIN] aims at the accomplishment of the same object as the first resolution of the series, and perhaps is better adapted to accomplish that object, I see no objection to its being adopted. The object will perhaps be more certainly and more effectively attained.

Mr. BRENTON. I ask that the amendment may be read, as I desire to make a few remarks in reference to it.

The amendment was accordingly read as above.

Mr. BRENTON. Mr. Chairman, I have some objections to the form prescribed in the proposed amendment. It would be much better, sir, to provide simply that the warrants shall be assignable, leaving the form to be prescribed by the Commissioner of the General Land Office. The practice has been, in reference to warrants issued under the law of 1847, to accompany them with the blank form of an assignment. The form prescribed would be objectionable, if for no other reason than this, that the law would not be in the hands probably of ten out of a hundred of those that will hold these warrants. But if authority be given to make these warrants assignable, under the instruction of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, in the form of the assignment accompanying the warrant, every individual, when he receives the warrant, will at once have the form before him.

Mr. FICKLIN. With the permission of my friend from Indiana, [Mr. BRENTON,] I wish to ask him if he is not aware that such instructions have heretofore been given under the act of 1847, and that in very many cases of warrants being located these locations have been set aside one or two years after the location for a defect in the assignment?

Mr. BRENTON. I will answer the gentleman, that such is the fact; but the remedy is not to be found by embodying the form of the assignment in the law. It is true, sir, under my own observation, that thousands of these warrants have, during the last few years, been assigned in the most informal manner, even with the blank form of assignment, and by attorneys who have acted for the holders of warrants. If the form of assignment is embraced in the law, and no authority given to have it printed upon the warrants themselves, the law will not be generally circulated, and greater evils and informalities will grow out of it than have grown out of the practice heretofore.

Mr. FICKLIN. I would inquire of the honorable member from Indiana, if the printing of this first section, as to the mode of assignment upon the warrant, would not obviate his objection entirely?

Mr. BRENTON. I answer the inquiry of the gentleman further: Under the act of 1847, the ninth section of that act, by which these warrants are authorized to be issued, and by which they were made assignable, accompanied the warrant, and was then followed by a bill of instructions from the Commissioner himself, printed upon the back, prescribing the form in which these warrants should be assigned; and I conceive all that is necessary in making these warrants assignable, is to leave the matter with the Commissioner of the General Land Office to prescribe the form, and to have that form printed upon the back of the warrant, that every holder may have it directly before his eye. I have known hundreds of cases where warrants have passed into the hands of attorneys who have undertaken to transact this business, and these warrants have come to the Land Office regularly assigned apparently, but with only one attesting witness, and in many cases with no seal of any officer attached to them.

The instructions should be made so specific that every individual who holds a warrant, however ignorant, may be enabled to fill up the assignment, and to put his name to it so as to save, in the language of the law of 1850, the soldiers from any expense whatever in the location of their warrants. I would remark further, sir, while upon this point, that, as regards the location of these warrants, the provisions of law in reference to the expenses incurred by the soldiers have, to my mind, been contravened. Expenses have been incurred by the holders of warrants issued under the act of 1850, which, I think, are wholly uncalled for, in order to their location. I am decidedly in favor of the transfer or assignment of all these warrants, and want a provision inserted in the first section, such as shall authorize the Commissioner of the General Land Office, or the Commissioner of Pensions, issuing the warrants, to cause to be printed upon the back of them the form of an assignment, such as shall be recognized by the proper authority for the location of these warrants. And as I have not the amendment before me, and I do not know at what point precisely to introduce that provision, I will leave it with the committee, that it may be introduced. In that form and with that change in the proposed amendment I shall favor it.

Another point, sir. If I understand the language of the proposed amendment, it is simply that hereafter all warrants shall be made assignable. Is the language there used intended to embrace all warrants now outstanding, or warrants which shall hereafter be issued? It should be made retrospective.

Mr. FICKLIN. It means all outstanding warrants. It embraces all warrants.

Mr. BRENTON. I supposed that was the intention.

Mr. BISSELL. It must be recollected that the form which it is proposed the Commissioner shall adopt, cannot reach the thousands of warrants already out; therefore I think that we should fix in substance the form, so that holders of warrants already issued can have the help of the Commissioner, and may know how to assign them. I think, therefore, that the form proposed in the amendment of my colleague [Mr. FICKLIN] should be adopted; and if it is thought advisable, to suggest to the Commissioner, or require that any warrants hereafter to be issued, should have printed upon them the form corresponding with what we here contemplate, it will be well. But, in addition to that, it is necessary here to fix the substance of the form, in order to meet the case of warrants already passed beyond the control of the Commissioner.

Mr. BRENTON. There is very little difference between me and my friend from Illinois, [Mr. BISSELL.] There is no difference as regards the propriety of the assignment and the form of the assignment. The point is this, to get the assignment in such a form that the mass, the illiterate and the uneducated, shall understand it.

Mr. CARTER. I rise to a question of order. It is this: Is it competent to discuss the point the gentleman is now discussing, when there is no amendment before the committee. He said he has an amendment somewhere in contemplation.

Mr. BRENTON. I am thankful that the orderly gentleman from Ohio has called my attention to a point of order. I always, as a stranger to parliamentary proceedings, feel myself under obligation to any gentleman who sets me right, and puts me in order when I am out of order. I understand that in discussing this question in the Committee of the Whole, I would have a right to take up and discuss every letter and syllable of this section, as well as the proposed amendments, and still be in order. I only suggested to my friend from Illinois [Mr. FICKLIN] the propriety of having that amendment so changed as to authorize the indorsement of the form of the assignment upon the back of the warrant.

Mr. FICKLIN. I have no objection. It is right.

Mr. TAYLOR inquired if it was in order to submit an amendment to the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN replied that it was.

Mr. TAYLOR then submitted the following amendment, to come in at the end of the first section, viz:

In conformity with a form to be prescribed by the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

Mr. BISSELL. One suggestion upon that amendment: It would not reach the warrants already out.

Mr. TAYLOR. I apprehend it will, just as readily as the form suggested by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. BRENTON.] It is not my purpose to detain the committee. I believe a very large majority of the House would like to see these land warrants made assignable. I believe that is the desire of the country—particularly of those persons to whom these warrants have been issued. The object of the gentlemen who have discussed this question is to adopt some form by which this may be done. Now, sir, I think there is no better person to prescribe a form for such warrants than the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and the amendment I move to come in at the end of the first section will meet that view. I propose these land warrants shall be made assignable in the form prescribed by the Commissioner of the General Land Office. That will be known to the country, and accessible to everybody, and probably will be printed upon the back of the land warrant itself. This I think meets the views of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. BRENTON,] so intelligently expressed. I will add to my amendment the words, "and be printed upon the back of the warrant." It is very evident, Mr. Chairman, that these land warrants are to be made assignable; and I think if these words are adopted, they will meet the views of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the Chair understand the gentleman to modify his amendment?

Mr. TAYLOR. I think my amendment as first offered will meet the wishes of gentlemen, and I will not modify it.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I move the committee rise. My object is to terminate this debate.

Several MEMBERS. "Oh, no!" "Oh, no!"

Mr. RICHARDSON. If the resolution I intend to propose is adopted, we can go back into committee again; gentlemen can offer all of their propositions, have a vote upon, and five minutes to debate them. I want to terminate this sort of debate, as there is evidently no good to result from it. I move the committee rise.

Mr. CARTER demanded tellers; which were not ordered.

The question being taken, the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee. The amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FICKLIN] is one in substitution of the first section—is it not, sir?

The CHAIRMAN assented.

Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee. Then I suppose it is in order to perfect the first section before the vote is taken upon the substitute. I offer the following as a proviso, to come in after the first section, and I desire its adoption, although I have no objection to the substitute offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The CHAIRMAN. It is the impression of the Chair that the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. TAYLOR,] being in fact to perfect the first section, takes precedence. The first vote must be upon it.

Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee. I supposed it was an amendment to the substitute of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CLEVELAND called for the reading of the section as it would be if the amendment were adopted; which was read by the Clerk.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I will detain the House but for a moment. The sense of the House upon the subject now before them is a matter very well ascertained. We will not reach the time when we can proceed to vote upon these questions at all, so long as there is a gentleman in this Hall disposed to go on and make a speech, except by proceeding according to the regular rule; that regular rule is, that in the House we shall pass a resolution which shall limit debate to five minutes. Then every gentleman can have an opportunity of offering amendments and of making five minutes' speeches upon them, and those opposed to them will have, also, five minutes in which to state their objections. If we are disposed to go on and get through with this matter, which has been half passed upon already by this House and the Senate, there can be but one motion now introduced that is in order, which will cause the business to progress, and that is, sir, that the committee rise. I intend, if the committee rise, to present the resolution I have indicated, which I hope may pass.

Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee. I rise, Mr. Chairman, to a question of order. I had the floor and yielded it but for the reading of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. TAYLOR,] to learn to what end that amendment was submitted. I did not think proper to interrupt the gentleman from Arkansas while he was addressing the committee. My question of order is, that the gentleman has no right to offer the motion, as I am entitled to the floor.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I am very sorry that my friend has been cut off so unceremoniously. I will withdraw the motion.

Mr. HARRIS. I understand the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio is an amendment to the original section, and that it is in order to offer an amendment to the amendment: I therefore offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's table, to come in after the amendment of the first section.

The amendment was read by the Clerk, as follows:

Provided, That in all cases the assignment shall be acknowledged or proven by two subscribing witnesses, before some officer authorized to take the probate of deeds, who shall certify under his seal of office that the person making the assignment is personally known to him, or that his or her identity has been proven by two credible witnesses.

Mr. WALSH. I move an amendment as a substitute for the whole, in order to simplify the subject.

A MEMBER. The gentleman is out of order.

Mr. WALSH. Only one word, as was allowed the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. BRENTON,] The difficulty has been, it is said, that these persons will not understand the particular rules governing these assignments, established by this House. Now, every man in every city understands the local laws governing the transfer of real property. I desire to so amend the bill that said assignments shall be authenticated in all respects in the transfer of land as authenticated in the State where said assignments are made.

Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee. I rise to a point of order, which is, that there is a substitute pending for the whole of the first section; that there is an amendment to an amendment perfecting the first section, and therefore no other amendment is in order, according to my idea of the rules. I make the question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the impression of the Chair. The proposition submitted by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FICKLIN] was in fact a substitute. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TAYLOR] moved an amendment to the original section, which he had a right to do, and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] moved an amendment to the amendment, which is now the question before the committee.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. If I understand aright I would not certainly intervene between any gentleman, and any wish he has in regard to the offering of an amendment. I will say the motion I proposed to make is one which will cause the advancement of business; and when this step has been taken every gentleman will still have in the committee, upon the same subject, the right to offer amendments. I therefore move that the committee rise with reference to the putting a limit upon debate. We cannot get along if members are permitted to offer all the ideas they desire.

I move the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the Chairman [Mr. HIBBARD] reported that the Committee of the Whole had had the state of the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the joint resolutions explanatory of the act, passed 28th of September, 1850, entitled "An act granting bounty lands to certain officers and soldiers engaged in the military service of the United States," had made progress therein, but had come to no conclusion thereon.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I offer the usual resolution for closing debate in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union in five minutes after the said committee shall have again resumed its session.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. RICHARDSON moved that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. HALL, of Missouri, rose to a privileged question, and moved that the House adjourn; which motion, upon a division of the House, was agreed to—ayes 64, noes 56.

So the House adjourned.

NOTICES OF BILLS.

Mr. WEIGHTMAN, of New Mexico, gave notice, under the rule, of his intention to introduce the following bills:

FLOGGING IN THE NAVY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of the Navy, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 19th instant, letters from officers of the Navy on the subject of corporal punishment in the Navy, and a revision of the rules and regulations of the Navy by a board of naval officers.

Ordered, That it be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and printed.

Mr. GWIN. I move that this communication, with the accompanying papers, be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and be printed for the use of the Senate. And I also give notice, that instead of calling up the memorial of the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BRODHEAD,] as I intended to do to-day, I shall postpone calling it up until the 6th of January, when I hope that those gentlemen who are in favor of this practice will be prepared to give their views upon the subject.

Mr. DAVIS. I wish merely to say, that this is a question of some interest, agitating the public mind in many quarters to a considerable extent; and I hold that the whole matter should go to the Committee on Naval Affairs, who should take it into their deliberate consideration, and make a written report, which may go out to the country.

Mr. GWIN. I have moved that the communication and papers go to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and stated that I will postpone the consideration of the memorial presented by the Senator from Pennsylvania until the 6th of January.

The question was taken, and the communication and papers were referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

PETITIONS.

Mr. BRODHEAD presented a petition of citizens of Pennsylvania, praying that the stock owned by individuals in the Louisville and Portland Canal may be purchased by the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Mr. UNDERWOOD submitted additional documents in relation to the petition of William L. Meredith; which were referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. STOCKTON presented the memorial of Jesse E. Brown in his own right, and as administrator of Wm. J. Russell, deceased, complaining that injustice has been done him and his intestate in the rejection, by the late Board of Commissioners for settling claims against Mexico, of a large portion of their claim for indemnity, and praying that a tribunal may be established for reviewing the decisions of that Board; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

On motion by Mr. ATCHISON, it was Ordered, That when the Senate adjourns this day, it adjourn to meet again on Friday next.

REPORTS OF STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. CLEMENS, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the joint resolution authorizing the President of the United States to confer the title of Lieutenant General, by brevet, for eminent services, reported it without amendment.

Mr. DAWSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of Margaret Hetzel, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for the relief of Mrs. Margaret Hetzel, widow, and administratrix of A. R. Hetzel, late assistant quartermaster in the Army of the United States.

The bill was read and passed to the second reading.

Ordered, That the bill be printed.

The bill was read and passed to the second reading.

Resolved, That the report be printed.

NAVAL DEPÔT AT KEY WEST.

Mr. MALLORY submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be instructed to inquire into and report on the expediency of establishing a Naval Depôt at Key West, in the State of Florida.

CLERK TO COMMITTEE ON PENSIONS.

Mr. JONES. I wish to offer a resolution, and I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate that it may be considered now.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Pensions be authorized, as heretofore, to employ a clerk.

Mr. ATCHISON. Unless the pension business has greatly increased within the last few years, there is no necessity to appoint a clerk to that committee. I was a member of that committee at one time—I believe for about two years—and, to the best of my recollection, two members of the committee disposed of all the business brought before that committee. Two working members were at that time amply sufficient to dispose of all the business without occupying half of their time. Now, I am not aware that there has been such an increase of business as to require a clerk; and it does seem to me that five members, who constitute that committee, can dispose of pension claims. These claims are generally disposed of upon the opinion of the Commissioner of Pensions. The memorial is enclosed to the Commissioner, and he gives his opinion in relation to it, embracing the law and its application to the facts; and it is no difficult matter then for the committee to determine whether they will allow or disallow the pension.

Mr. JONES, of Iowa.* I believe, sir, that an immense saving to the Government will be the result of the employment of this clerk. It is his duty to carry communications, petitions, and papers, in every case, to the Commissioner of Pensions; to confer with him; to ascertain the facts in each case respectively; and also communicate by letter with the Commissioner, by order of the committee, in each case. At the last session of Congress the clerk of our committee addressed some two or three hundred communications to the Commissioner, made very frequent visits to him on behalf of the committee, and also prepared a synopsis of each case; and I am well satisfied that a great saving to the Government was the result of his labors. I know this as a fact; and at the first session of Congress which I attended, in 1848, the chairman of the Committee on Pensions (Governor Johnson, of Louisiana) assured me that almost the whole business was in his hands; that the committee permitted him to make reports in nearly every case. At the last session of Congress a similar course would have been pursued if I, as chairman of the committee, had been willing to assume so much responsibility. This I declined to do, and the committee were unanimous in their opinion that the interests of the country would be subserved by the appointment of a clerk. On this, as I have just remarked, the committee were unanimous; and in consequence of the great number of cases now before us, and the utter impossibility of obtaining the services of the different members of the committee, they have therefore instructed me to offer this resolution; and I am satisfied that by doing so the business of the claimants will be better attended to, and a considerable saving to the country be effected.

Mr. ATCHISON. I am satisfied with what the Senator from Iowa has said, and I will take his word, without any argument. I did not know that this proposition came from the Committee on Pensions, or was presented by that Senator. The reasons he has assigned I think are sufficient to authorize the appointment of a clerk.

The question was then taken, and the resolution was adopted.

REINVESTIGATION OF SETTLED CLAIMS.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I desire to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the reinvestigation, by the judicial department of the Government, of all payments made by any of the executive departments, when there is ground to apprehend fraud or mistake.

I beg leave to make a statement, and then to ask for the immediate consideration of this resolution.

I brought this subject to the attention of the Senate perhaps two years since. The necessity of some provision of this sort grew out of a case somewhat personal to my family. I had an old uncle who happened to be a revolutionary captain in George Rogers Clark's regiment. He died in 1794; and under the act of 1832, allowing half pay, there were some two or three thousand dollars to which my family were entitled, and which some twenty years ago they drew from the Treasury. Subsequent to that time a North Carolina family sprung up, pretending to be the heirs of John Rogers deceased, insisting that he lived till 1822 or 1823, and drew from the Treasury some fifteen or twenty thousand dollars, for the services of the same man whose family had drawn two or three thousand dollars before. This money was drawn two or three days before I reached Washington, and when I was informed of it, I went at once to the department and made some inquiry to know how this had happened. They showed me a bundle of papers in which there was affidavit after affidavit, and memorial on memorial, and circumstance after circumstance, to show that this North Carolina family were the real descendants of John Rogers, alleging that he had been a married man, and left a great many children; when, in fact, the real John Rogers was never married, and died a bachelor. Well, I asked if there was no way of investigating this matter, and getting the money back again. It was said that perhaps the decision of the department was final, and there could be no reinvestigation; and thus it appears that two sums of money have been paid in consequence of the services of the same man. For the reputation of my family, allow me to remark, that I was obliged to send home and get copies of the original commission, which fortunately had been retained; and we also retained the diploma of his being a member of the Cincinnati Society, signed by General Washington, and countersigned by Knox. It so happened that the claim twenty years ago, on behalf of the true representatives of John Rogers was made on the affidavit of a single soldier, and it was overruled by the pile of affidavits to which I have referred; and we were told that there could be no reinvestigation, because the action of the department was final. I brought this subject to the attention of the Congress of the United States, and, since that time, I have received letter after letter stating other cases of precisely the same kind. I hope the Committee on the Judiciary will attend to it. I once drew up a bill for the remedying of this evil, but it fell through. I want them to provide by law a remedy in case of payments being made by the Executive department of the Government, where there is ground to apprehend fraud or mistake, that remedy to be by bringing suit against the party supposed to be in the wrong, and make them refund the money. Justice requires this; and I hope that the Committee on the Judiciary will take the subject under their consideration, and report us a bill to that effect. I ask that the resolution may be now considered, and the subject referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The consent of the Senate being given to the present consideration of the resolution, and the question being taken on its adoption, it was decided in the affirmative.

MESSENGER OF THE SENATE.

Mr. BELL. I offer the following resolution.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That Owen Connelly be and he is hereby appointed messenger to the Senate, the appointment to take effect from the first day of March, 1851.

I do not know, Mr. President, whether this is in strict conformity with the usual mode of proceeding in such cases; but it was suggested to me that I should make the proposition, and ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to consider it now. I will merely state to the Senate what I have been informed in regard to the condition of this man. He was formerly a watchman upon the grounds of the Capitol, and had the misfortune to be dreadfully crushed. He recovered, however, sufficiently to be able to perform the duties of an ordinary messenger about the Senate, although not sufficiently to be able to perform labor about the grounds. By this accident he has been left destitute. It is true that this man has not suffered in the Army or the Navy, but he has suffered in our service here; and as there are several duties that he can competently perform as a messenger, I trust the Senate will agree to consider this proposition now. This is a dreadful season for a man to be cut off from the means of support, especially when he has been deprived of the energy and activity with which he was by nature endowed. It is a dreadful season for a man in this condition to be cast upon his own resources—indeed this man has no resources; and as he suffered in our service, I hope there will not be an opposing voice to the taking up of this resolution, and the passing of it.

Objection being made, the resolution was laid over under the rule.

COMPROMISE MEASURES.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the special order, being the resolution submitted by Mr. FOOTE, as amended on the motion of Mr. BADGER, declaring the compromise measures a definitive settlement of the questions growing out of the subject of slavery.

The resolution is as follows:

A Resolution declaring the Measures of Adjustment to be a definite settlement of the questions growing out of domestic slavery.

Be it enacted, That the series of measures embraced in the acts entitled "An act proposing to the State of Texas the establishment of her Northern and Western boundaries, the relinquishment, by the said State, of all territory claimed by her exterior to said boundaries, and of all her claims upon the United States, and to establish a territorial government for New Mexico," approved September 9, 1850; "An act for the admission of the State of California into the Union," approved September 9, 1850; "An act to establish a territorial government for Utah," approved September 9, 1850; "An act to amend and supplementary to an act entitled 'An act respecting fugitives from justice, and persons escaping from the service of their masters,' approved February 12, 1793," approved September 18, 1850; and "An act to suppress the slave trade in the District of Columbia," approved September 20, 1850, commonly known as the "Compromise Acts," are, in the judgment of this body, a settlement in principle and substance—a final settlement of the dangerous and exciting subjects which they embrace, and ought to be adhered to by Congress until time and experience shall demonstrate the necessity of further legislation to guard against evasion or abuse.

Mr. CLEMENS, who was entitled to the floor, yielded it for a few minutes at the request of the Senator from Michigan, who desired then briefly to address the Senate.

Mr. CASS. Mr. President, I am much obliged to the Senator from Alabama for yielding me the floor; and as I shall occupy it but for a few minutes, I trust he will then be permitted to resume it, in order to go on with his remarks, which I am sure the Senate will find more interesting than anything I have to say.

Though I expressed, sir, to the honorable mover of this resolution [Mr. BADGER] my regret at its introduction, yet here it is, and I am required to vote upon it; to testify my satisfaction at the passage of the compromise measures, and my conviction that the arrangement was a just, and should be a final one, no more to be disturbed in whole or in part. I have before taken occasion, in my seat here, when practical subjects involving all these issues were before us, to state my views, and I shall not now repeat them, when the course proposed proposes no legislative action. I am not generally in favor of mere legislative declarations, leading to no practical results; yet, the circumstances which surround this proceeding give to it unusual importance, and it may well rest upon its own peculiar claims. The peace of the country has been assured, I trust, by this series of measures. But reports have gone forth, more or less imposing in their character, that they would be assailed in Congress, and some of them repealed, or so modified as to destroy their efficiency and acceptability. Agitation is thus kept alive by the expectation of change, prepared to renew its fearful work, and in this state of things, I find myself face to face with a resolution which asserts, as I believe, the true character and just inviolability of these measures, and seeks thereby to remove from the public mind all apprehension that the perilous contest through which, by the kindness of Providence, we have safely passed, will again be renewed; and I should discharge my duty as faithfully to my constituents as to myself, if I did not meet this proposition with frankness, and support it with firmness. And especially, sir, am I unwilling to be misunderstood in this grave conjuncture, after the denunciations we have heard for the first time, from an American Senator, in the American Senate, against the Confederation and Government of our common country. If such sentiments are to furnish motives to any one for the rejection of this proposition, they will furnish motives to me for its support, as I desire, by my voice and my vote, equally to mark my disapprobation of them.

Mr. President, the words that fell from the honorable Senator from South Carolina [Mr. RHETT] were as unwelcome as they were unexpected. They fell upon reluctant, I may well say, indignant ears, and they went to sorrowing hearts. I have not the most distant idea of following the Senator in his bill of indictment against his country, against my country, against this glorious Union, the most precious political gift of God to man since the exodus of our first parents from the garden of Eden. I will not follow him—the task would be too irksome—in his arithmetical calculations of what the different portions of our country have lost or gained in the collection and disbursement of revenue, in the disposition of the public lands, nor even in the amount of pensions granted to the poor and time-honored, but time-stricken relics of our revolutionary struggle; not only because many of the facts, and almost all the conclusions, are erroneous, but still more, because, after all the inequality, which really exists not, but which may be shadowed forth by the most dis-tempered imagination, there remains a sum of freedom and prosperity, of enjoyment and of blessings, such as the world never saw before, and will never see again, if this Union is dissolved. That it is the freest government the sun ever shone upon, requires no clearer proof than is furnished by the very denunciations against it, uttered in this high place, in the presence of the portrait of the Father of his Country, hallowing, not merely adorning, these walls, and who, in his last solemn act, warned us against sectional feelings and their consequences. That Government has not been merely assailed in a strain of invective, rare even in the contests of party, but the determination has been avowed, in language not less clear than unqualified, to break up the Union, by breaking the prestige of its integrity, and to reduce it to a kind of temporary partnership, feeble and inefficient in its operations, both at home and abroad, and equally contemptible to its own citizens and to the rest of the world. Does the honorable Senator believe, there is another government under the face of heaven, where such language and such objects can be uttered and avowed with impunity? And does he not find, in the great principle of the right of speech, of free speech, unshackled by conditions or limitations, unknown indeed in its extent elsewhere through the world,—does he not find, I say, a refutation of his own position that we live under a despotism; a practical commentary, which rebuked, even while he uttered them, his harsh denunciations?

As to the ruin so confidently asserted or predicted, or both, where is it, or even a sign of it as big as a man's hand, like that seen by a prophet, more truly inspired, I trust, than the honorable Senator from South Carolina? [Mr. RHETT.] Has the eye of man ever rested upon a more prosperous country than this? And if such a condition is ruinous or pregnant with ruin, where shall we find prosperity, but in some new Paradise specially created and governed by God? though even in such a place sad experience has taught us that a tree of evil may be found, and the highest blessings rashly rejected in a spirit of impatience and discontent.

North and South, East and West, the sun rises and sets on a happy land, teeming with an intelligent people, with free and equal institutions, with all the avenues of position and employment open to all, and advancing in every element of power and prosperity with a rapidity which outstrips human expectation, as it has outstripped human experience, and with nothing to fear but our own crimes and follies, and the just judgments of God. And while republics, and empires, and monarchies, have fallen and are still falling before us, marking this as the age of social and political revolutions, our institutions have been preserved, our boundaries enlarged, our power augmented, and the beacon-light of liberty still shines from our shores, inviting the struggling nations of the earth, tossed upon a sea of oppression, to follow us to a haven of safety. For almost three score years and ten this has been my country, my happy, glorious country, and for more than half a century, since I have been old enough to appreciate and to love it, its Government has protected me and mine from foreign aggression and domestic violence. The honorable Senator from South Carolina seems to measure the value of free institutions by a standard adapted to his own peculiar notions of the operation of fiscal laws, and the assumed want of equality, which he has strangely and strongly asserted, but has failed to prove, may be the knell, is now, indeed, the passing knell, he hopes and believes, of this world-watched Republic. But our real equality, the true American equality of condition, by which we have neither high nor low among us, and which freely offers fortune and honors alike to the hopes and exertions of all, this condition of social existence the Senator has not glanced at, probably has not even thought of, in his search after the evidences of sectional inequality. But it is an institution which those who commenced life under circumstances less fortunate than himself, regard as the brightest spot in our political firmament, as offering ample compensation for any temporary partial operation of public measures, where such occur, (and they must sometimes occur in every Government,) far greater than in the cases, even if they were all liable, which they are not, to this objection, whose proofs have been collected with so much industry, and spread before us with so much power, and I doubt not sincerely, but with so little conviction. Such was the charge against the non-intercourse, the embargo, the war, the tariff, and to some extent against the removal of the deposits; and the foreboding of ruin, happily rebuked by the results, was then as wide-spread as it can be again, and was rendered still more powerful by that strange spirit of hallucination, to which the best and the wisest are often subject during periods of excitement in this, our world of errors. And I may well speak with a full heart upon the subject of our equality of condition; for this very condition, joined, indeed, to the undeserved favor of my fellow-citizens, has given me, whose early prospects in life were shrouded in difficulties, and who passed much of it in hard and harsh duties in the forest, it has given even to me this opportunity, and I glory in it, of bearing my testimony of gratitude to the priceless value of the Constitution here, in this great depository of its power. And when, in God's good time, I shall need its protection no longer, may I leave it, as a most precious legacy, untouched and unscathed, to those who are most dear to me, an object of pride and affection for them as it has been for me.

One more word, Mr. President. What a strange spectacle does the opposition to the compromise exhibit? Assailed with equal violence, not to say virulence, North and South, its enemies unite in condemning it with equal zeal, but they unite in nothing else. Both parties charge it with unconstitutionality and injustice, because it concedes all to one, and nothing to the other, while each considers itself the injured party, and its rights and feelings as sacrificed by the arrangement. For myself, sir, I believe it was a wise and patriotic disposition of the eventful questions, which agitated and threatened us, and I think, if other evidence were wanting, it has been supplied by the criminations and recriminations which are yet sounding in our ears.

Mr. CLEMENS next addressed the Senate at considerable length in favor of the Compromise measures, and in favor of the passage of the resolution. His speech will be found in the Appendix.

Mr. DOUGLAS followed, and entered into explanations of his position on the fugitive slave bill, and the circumstances which prevented his presence in the Senate Chamber to vote for the bill on its passage. His remarks will be found in the Appendix.

Mr. DOWNS was next recognized by the Chair. He said he was desirous of addressing the Senate on this resolution, but the day was too far advanced to enable him to do so satisfactorily. He therefore moved that the further consideration of the subject be postponed to the first Monday in January next.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate adjourned to Friday next.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, December 23, 1851.

The House met at twelve, m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Mr. MORGAN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ASSIGNABILITY OF LAND WARRANTS.

The SPEAKER stated that the first business in order was the unfinished business of yesterday, being the motion of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. RICHARDSON,] that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. TUCK rose to a privileged question, and moved to reconsider the vote of the House, yesterday, adopting the resolution limiting the debate in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union upon the bill in relation to the assignment of bounty land warrants.

Mr. T. said: I propose to occupy the attention of the House for but a few moments.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, (interrupting.) I rise to a question of order. I submit that a motion to reconsider a resolution closing debate is not debatable, for the reason that the resolution itself, when upon its adoption, is not debatable. It is like a motion to reconsider a motion to lay on the table; the motion to lay on the table not being debatable, a proposition to reconsider that motion cannot be debatable.

The SPEAKER sustained the point of order.

Mr. TUCK. I do not propose to take an appeal from the decision of the Chair, but I recollect that the practice of the House has been directly contrary.

The SPEAKER. The resolution itself not being debatable, a motion to reconsider the vote by which that resolution was disposed of, cannot, of course, be debatable.

Mr. TUCK. Well, I hope the House will look at the 4th section of the bill. I am sure it cannot be understood.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from

New Hampshire ask for a vote on his motion to reconsider?

Mr. TUCK. I do.

Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee, moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The question being taken, on a division there were—ayes 75, noes 58.

So the motion to reconsider was laid upon the table.

The question recurring upon the motion of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. RICHARDSON,] it was taken and decided in the affirmative.

So the rules were suspended, and the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. HIBBARD in the chair.)

The CHAIRMAN stated that the question before the committee was on the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] to the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. TAYLOR.]

The following is the first section of the bill:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That nothing in the act approved September 28, 1850, "granting bounty land to certain officers and soldiers who have been engaged in the military service of the United States," shall be construed so as to prevent the sale and transfer of any certificate or warrant issued by virtue of said act, prior to the location of the same, or the issue of the patent thereon.

Mr. TAYLOR had submitted the following amendment to come in at the end of the above resolution:

"In conformity with a form to be prescribed by the Commissioner of the General Land Office."

Mr. CARTTER called for the reading of the amendment to the amendment, and it was read as follows:

"Provided, That in all cases the assignment shall be acknowledged or proven by two subscribing witnesses, before some officer authorized to take the probate of deeds, who shall certify under his seal of office that the person making the assignment is personally known to him, or that his or her identity has been proven by two credible witnesses."

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky, demanded tellers on the adoption of the proviso; which were ordered, and Messrs. FOWLER and CARTTER appointed.

The question was then taken on the amendment to the amendment, and there were—ayes 52, noes 56—no quorum voting.

[Cries of "Another count!" and "Call the roll!"]

The CHAIRMAN. By unanimous consent another count will be had.

Mr. KING, of New York. No, call the roll.

The roll was then called, and the absentees noted. The committee then rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the chairman of the committee reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union having found itself without a quorum, had instructed him to report that fact to the House, with the names of the absentees.

Mr. STANTON, of Ohio, stated, that Mr. PARKER, of Indiana, was detained from his seat by sickness.

A quorum being now present, the committee resumed its session; and the question being taken on the amendment to the amendment, tellers reported—ayes 67, noes 59.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The question recurred on Mr. TAYLOR's amendment as amended.

Mr. SACKETT. Is an amendment now in order by way of substitute?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not now in order.

Mr. TAYLOR asked for the reading of the amendment as amended, and it was read.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I propose to amend the amendment by inserting at the commencement thereof the words "but the same shall be assignable."

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. That would make it imperative.

Mr. STEPHENS. Then I will make it "may be assignable." As the bill now reads, it says that nothing in the existing law shall be so construed as that the warrant shall not be assignable. My object is to make it affirmative.

Mr. SACKETT. I ask leave to have an amendment read which I propose to offer as a substitute for the whole of the first section.

The CHAIRMAN. The substitute is not now in order, but by universal consent it can be read for information.

Several MEMBERS objected to the reading.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I now offer the amendment which I indicated just now.

Mr. FICKLIN. Do you propose to strike out that about the construction of the law?

Mr. STEPHENS. No; I propose to strike out nothing, but merely to insert the words which I have read, so as to make it affirmative.

The question was then taken on Mr. STEPHENS's amendment to the amendment, and it was agreed to.

Mr. FICKLIN. I propose now to amend the amendment as amended, by inserting after the word "assignment" the words "by indorsement upon the warrant;" so as to make it read: "Provided, That in all cases the assignment by indorsement upon the warrant shall be acknowledged or proven," &c.

The object of that amendment is, that the soldier shall have his warrant before he makes an assignment of it, and that he shall make the assignment upon the warrant, instead of upon a separate piece of paper. A great many of the frauds which have been committed have arisen from the want of such a provision as this.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. If we are not exceedingly cautious, we shall get into difficulty about this whole matter. This amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FICKLIN] requires the assignment to be upon the warrant. Now, the warrant never leaves the Department. It is filed there; a certificate of location is issued to the soldier, and it is located and returned here. I believe that has been the case with nearly all the warrants that have been issued.

Mr. BISSELL here interposed a remark, which was not heard by the Reporter.

Mr. JONES, (continuing.) The best way to provide for this assignment, I think, would be to declare that such sale, transfer, or assignment shall be made and authenticated in accordance with rules to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior. He can then alter them to suit the circumstances.

Mr. FICKLIN, (interposing.) I would suggest to the gentleman, that the certificate of location is the paper that is assigned, and is the one that is located upon the land.

Mr. JONES. Then put in "warrant or certificate of location."

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois modify his amendment?

Mr. FICKLIN. I have no objection to do so, but it is understood already. The certificate of location is the paper that is assigned.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I suggest to the gentleman from Illinois, that his amendment would be more acceptable, if it did not require the assignment to be proven before the person authorized to take the probate of deeds. It will require a man to go to the clerk's office in the county seat every time he wants to make an assignment.

Mr. FICKLIN. I will state to the gentleman from Kentucky, that the provision to which he has reference, is contained in the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. HARRIS,] which has already been adopted by the Committee. My amendment is simply to have the assignment made upon the warrant or certificate of location, and not upon a separate piece of paper. My object is to prevent fraud and forgery.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Is this an amendment to an amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee. I thought the gentleman from Illinois was willing to modify his amendment, by adding the words "or certificate of location."

Mr. FICKLIN. I will do it.

The amendment was modified accordingly.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Is it in order now to offer an amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not; there is an amendment to an amendment now pending.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I think, as the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] has said, that we are likely to get into great difficulty with this bill. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FICKLIN] has submitted an amendment that these assignments shall be authenticated by two witnesses before some officer authorized to take the probate of deeds.

Mr. FICKLIN, (interrupting.) That provision was contained in the substitute submitted by me yesterday, which has not been voted upon by the committee. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] offered an amendment requiring the same thing, which has been voted on and adopted by the committee, and I intend, therefore, to abandon my substitute.

Mr. STEPHENS. What I wish to say is, that different officers have authority to witness deeds, in the different States of this Union. This would occasion some difficulty, if we were to pass such a law as this, and therefore I think it would be better to adopt the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. WALSH,] providing that the assignment shall be witnessed by such parties as are authorized to authenticate deeds in the several States where the assignments are made. We have been here for two days engaged upon one section of the bill, and it is impossible for gentlemen upon different sides of the House to understand one another in reference to this subject. We shall spend two more days upon the bill at this rate. I shall therefore move that the committee rise, for the purpose of submitting a motion to the House to take this bill from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and refer it to the Committee on the Judiciary, who can present to the House a bill that will meet the views and wishes of all. We can never perfect such a bill here. I move that the committee rise and report the bill to the House with a recommendation that it be referred to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I ask permission to say a few words upon that motion, and I usually say as little as any gentleman here. It is well known—

Mr. TUCK. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas can only proceed by unanimous consent, as debate is out of order.

Mr. JOHNSON. The gentleman's objection came too late. A gentleman must object before a man has begun his remarks. [Laughter, and cries of "Go on!"] I have merely to say that I am perfectly satisfied of the entire sincerity of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] in making this motion, for I have been with him here for some time. But at the same time I know that after the amount of discussion which we have had upon this bill, if we now put it beyond our reach and send it to a committee, it is lost beyond resurrection. If we want these land warrants made assignable and the other relief given which is contemplated by this bill, we must go on and consider the bill and act upon it now.

If there is not sufficient intelligence amongst the members of this House to perfect a bill that was discussed for weeks during the last Congress, and has been so much discussed already in this, no Judiciary Committee can do it; it cannot be done at all. If we go back now and refer this bill to a committee, we shall have again to go through the whole process of considering and discussing separate amendments. If the committee rises now without considering and perfecting the bill, we shall have gone back to where we commenced yesterday morning. The whole country demands that these warrants shall be made assignable, and that the other provisions contemplated by this bill shall be made. We had better proceed with the bill and perfect it. I call for tellers on the motion that the committee do now rise.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. JOHNSON] appeals to the experience of this House to sustain him in saying that should this resolution go to the Committee on the Judiciary, it will be the last we shall see of it. I would barely remark that such has not been my experience.

Mr. JOHNSON. I hope the gentleman will not understand me as casting any slur upon that committee.

Mr. STEPHENS. I did not understand the gentleman as casting any slur upon that committee; but I think the experience of this House in regard to the past is, that bills which have been referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, have been considered and acted upon with promptness. The gentleman says this House has sufficient intelligence to perfect this resolution. I do not doubt its intelligence, but I submit that however intelligent it may be, it is impossible for us to perfect this resolution so well here as it can be done by the Judiciary Committee. I submit, with all due respect, that this committee is constituted of gentlemen who are more competent to perform this duty; they can better draw up bills, and put them in the proper legal form, than the majority of the members of this House. Many gentlemen are not lawyers, and they may state what they desire to be done in order to put the bill in a form to make it acceptable to them. The gentleman says that it is poor soldiers whose claims are presented in this bill. Now, in my judgment, this forms an additional reason why the bill should be committed to the Committee on the Judiciary, in order that we, as members upon this floor, may not fail in our efforts to accomplish the object we have in view, by employing improper language. I think, therefore, that it will facilitate this business if the committee rise and report the bill to the House, in order that it may be referred to the appropriate committee for perfection, with instructions (if gentleman desire it) to report with as little delay as possible. I move that the committee do now rise.

Tellers were demanded, and ordered; and Messrs. CARTER and FOWLER were appointed.

The question was then taken, and the tellers reported—ayes 68, noes 67.

So the motion prevailed.

The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the Chairman reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had the Union generally under consideration, and especially joint resolution No. 1, in relation to bounty land warrants, and had instructed him to report the same to the House, with the recommendation that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. ORR. I desire that the House will also refer the bill upon this subject which was prepared by the Commissioner of the General Land Office. It embraces all the points touched upon in the bill before the House, and is, in many respects, preferable to any bill I have seen, and I hope that it will be referred to the Judiciary Committee along with that bill. It is as follows, viz:

A BILL declaring warrants for military bounty land assignable, and for other purposes.

SEC. 1. Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That all warrants for military bounty lands which have been, or may hereafter be issued, under any law of the United States, and all valid locations of the same which have been, or may hereafter be made, and the same are hereby declared, assignable, according to such form, and pursuant to such regulations, as may be prescribed by the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

SEC. 2. And he it further enacted, That the registers and receivers of the United States land offices shall hereafter be severally authorized to charge and receive, for their services in locating all military bounty land warrants, the same rate of compensation or percentage to which they are entitled by law for sales of the public lands for cash, at the rate of one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre; the said compensation to be paid by the assignee or holder of such warrant, in all cases where the same have been transferred by the soldier or his legal representatives; but in any case in which the warrant has been or may be located by and for the use of the warrantee or his heirs, no compensation shall be charged by the register or receiver for any services they may render in making such location; and the provisions of the act of 17th May, 1848, requiring "the holder of military land warrants to compensate the land officers of the United States for service in relation to the location of those warrants," be, and the same are hereby repealed.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the franking privilege be, and the same is hereby extended to the principal clerk of public lands of the General Land Office.

Mr. BISSELL. Is there any motion before the House?

The SPEAKER. Nothing except the report of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. BISSELL. Then there is nothing before the House.

Mr. ORR. The report of the Committee of the Whole is before the House, and the question is on concurring with the recommendation of that committee. I submit that that is the motion.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I understand that the question now pending is to refer the bill under consideration to the Committee on the Judiciary, as recommended by the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BISSELL. That question could not come before the House without a motion, and no such motion has been made.

The SPEAKER. The Chair decides that the recommendation of the Committee of the Whole is now before the House, and the question pending, therefore, is to refer the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BISSELL. Is that motion debatable?

Mr. STEPHENS. Certainly; but I have possession of the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] has been recognized.

Mr. BISSELL. I submit, with due deference to the Chair, that I was recognized first.

The SPEAKER. It is true the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BISSELL] was recognized by the Chair; but that gentleman only asked a question, which the Chair answered, when the floor was accorded to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. STEPHENS. I do not claim the floor for the purpose of debating this question. I merely rise for the purpose of moving the previous question.

Mr. DUNHAM. Will the gentleman from Georgia withdraw the demand for the previous question for a moment, in order that I may be allowed to make a single inquiry?

Mr. STEPHENS. I will withdraw it for that purpose.

Mr. DUNHAM. I desire to inquire of the gentleman from Georgia if he would not accept an amendment to his motion, to refer the bill to a select committee, instead of the Committee on the Judiciary?

Mr. STEPHENS. I have no objection to its going to a committee composed of the friends of the bill. I will accept the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. STEPHENS. I have not yet yielded the floor.

Mr. MARSHALL. I suppose I have the right to state my point of order, whether the gentleman yields the floor or not. What I wish to say is, that after the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] has moved the previous question, he has no right to withdraw it for the purpose of allowing one gentleman to get in his amendment, when the rest of us will not be permitted to offer ours.

Mr. STEPHENS. If the gentleman objects, then I shall insist upon my first motion, to refer the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary. I make that motion, and now move the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would inquire of the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. ORR,] whether he designed his motion as a distinct proposition, or to be incorporated in the motion of the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. ORR. I asked that the bill to which I referred might go with the bill under consideration to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The previous question was then seconded.

Mr. HALL. I desire to propound a question to the Chair.

The SPEAKER. No remarks are in order.

The main question was then ordered to be put.

Mr. HALL. I now desire to inquire whether, if the House refuse to refer the bill, it will not then be in order to put it upon its passage?

The SPEAKER. It will be in order to move that it be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. STANTON, of Ohio. I desire to ask how the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. ORR] has got his bill before the House?

The SPEAKER. By the unanimous consent of the House, the gentleman from South Carolina was permitted to move that his bill be referred, along with that before the House, to the Judiciary Committee. If the gentleman desire it, however, the question will be taken separately upon the reference of each bill.

Mr. STANTON. Well, I make it as a point of order, that the gentleman from South Carolina had no right to introduce his bill.

The SPEAKER. It was introduced by unanimous consent.

Mr. STANTON. But there was no opportunity of making objection.

The SPEAKER. The question was pending to refer the bill under consideration to the Committee on the Judiciary. The gentleman from South Carolina, by unanimous consent moved, as an amendment, to refer along with it the bill drafted by the Commissioner of the General Land Office. The question, therefore, now is to refer both bills to that committee.

Mr. FICKLIN demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered; and the question being taken, there were—yeas 82, nays 81; as follow:

YEAS—Messrs. Abercrombie, Aiken, Allison, John Ap-

Howe, Andrew Johnson, John Johnson, Robert W. Johnson, J. Glancy Jones, Kurtz, Lockhart, Mace, Humphrey Marshall, McCorkle, Millson, Miner, Molony, Murphy, Oids, Peaslee, Penn, Penniman, Porter, Richardson, Riddle, Robinson, Sackett, Savage, Smart, Benjamin Stanton, Richard H. The CHAIR voted in the negative, and the bill was not referred.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I move this House do now adjourn.

[Cries of "No!" "No!"]

The question was then taken by tellers, (Messrs. RICHARDSON and CLINGMAN acting,) and decided in the negative—ayes 23, noes not counted.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. FICKLIN. I move the previous question upon the bill.

Mr. DUNHAM. I rise to make an inquiry. It is whether the bill is not still under the operation of the previous question?

The SPEAKER. The previous question was ordered upon the motion to commit.

Mr. DUNHAM. I then inquire of the Chair whether or not, after the previous question has exhausted itself, the question may not be reconsidered?

The SPEAKER. The question is upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time. The Chair thinks that as the House is acting upon the direction or recommendation of the Committee of the Whole, the previous question would not apply to the question of engrossment. The question is now on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time, on which the previous question has been demanded.

[Cries of "Question!" "Question!"]

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. If the House should refuse now to order the previous question, will it not be in order to refer the bill again to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

The SPEAKER. It will.

Mr. EVANS. How will this previous question operate?

The SPEAKER. To bring the House to a vote upon the question of ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. EVANS. I then rise to a question of order. I submit that the bill takes its place in regular order upon the Speaker's table, and comes up under the 27th rule, after messages, executive communications, bills and resolutions from the Senate on their first and second reading, engrossed bills and bills from the Senate on their third reading, according to the provisions of that rule. It comes up in the fifth order, and not in the first, and cannot be now taken up on the question of engrossment without the unanimous consent of the House. The 27th rule expressly provides that it shall be the fifth business in order.

The SPEAKER. I overrule the point of order made by the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. EVANS.]

Mr. EVANS. I appeal from the decision of the Chair, and ask that the 27th rule may be read.

The rule was then read, as follows:

"27. After one hour shall have been devoted to reports from committees and resolutions, it shall be in order, pending the consideration or discussion thereof, to entertain a motion that the House do now proceed to dispose of the business on the Speaker's table, and to the orders of the day—January 3, 1832; which being decided in the affirmative, the Speaker shall dispose of the business on his table in the following order, viz:—September 14, 1837.

"1st. Messages and other Executive communications.—September 14, 1837.

"2d. Messages from the Senate and amendments proposed by the Senate to the bills of the House.—September 14, 1837.

"3d. Bills and resolutions from the Senate on their first and second reading, that they be referred to committees and put under way; but if, on being read a second time, no motion be made to commit, they are to be ordered to their third reading, unless objection be made; in which case, if not otherwise ordered by a majority of the House, they are to be laid on the table in the general file of bills on the Speaker's table, to be taken up in their turn.—September 14, 1837.

"4th. Engrossed bills and bills from the Senate on their third reading.—September 14, 1837.

"5th. Bills of the House and from the Senate, on the Speaker's table, on their engrossment, or on being ordered to a third reading, to be taken up and considered in the order of time in which they passed to a second reading.

"The messages, communications, and bills on his table, having been disposed of, the Speaker shall then proceed to call the orders of the day.—September 14, 1837."

Mr. RICHARDSON. What question can arise now upon the report of the committee after that report has been acted upon?

Mr. EVANS. I had the floor upon the bill.

The SPEAKER. The question is not debatable.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I move that the appeal be laid upon the table.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I hope that by general consent the 50th rule may be read, which governs this case and shows that it is now covered by the previous question. The previous question is not exhausted.

The 50th rule was then read, as follows:

"The previous question shall be in this form: 'Shall the main question be now put?' It shall be only admitted when demanded by a majority of the members present; and its effect shall be to put an end to all debate, and bring the House to a direct vote upon a motion to commit, if such motion shall have been made; and if this motion does not prevail, then upon amendments reported by a committee, if any—then upon pending amendments, then upon the main question."

Mr. CLINGMAN. In the confusion that occurred I did not understand the Chair to decide that the previous question was exhausted. If so, I should have appealed from that decision; and I respectfully request the Chair to inform me of the operation of that decision if it has been made. It will be seen by the rule quoted that the previous question has not been exhausted, and it has been the every-day practice of all the Congresses of which I have been a member. I desire to take an appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. FICKLIN. There is an appeal now pending.

The SPEAKER. I am inclined to believe that my decision upon that subject was wrong.

Mr. EVANS. I admit that if the previous question is pending, I cannot take an appeal. But that is not the question. It is whether the previous question is pending or not. I submit to the Chair, whether I am not entitled to debate the bill. I do not wish to occupy many minutes.

The question was then taken upon the motion of Mr. RICHARDSON to lay the appeal upon the table; and it was decided in the affirmative.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is disposed to review its decision, and his opinion is, that the previous question is not exhausted, and does apply to the engrossment and reading of the bill a third time.

Mr. DUNHAM. I rise to make an inquiry, whether, if we now go on and order the bill to be engrossed, the previous question will not have exhausted itself?

The SPEAKER. It is very true. It is not now in order to interrogate the Chair upon that subject. The Chair will, however, decide that question when it comes up in order.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I move that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, with a view of taking up this bill.

Cries "Not in order!" from different parts of the Hall.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. You cannot get it there.

Mr. MARSHALL. My motion was made with the idea that the previous question had not been ordered by the House at all. I understood the Chair decided that the previous question had exhausted itself.

The SPEAKER. The Chair decided that the previous question had not exhausted itself. The question now recurs upon ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. TUCK. I submit that this bill was in Committee of the Whole, and before it was in order to rise and report it to the House, it was necessary that each section should be read, and amendments thereto, if any, should be considered in the committee. We had not concluded deliberations upon the first section, when the motion was made that the committee rise, and report the bill.

Mr. OLDS. I call the gentleman to order. We are not in committee but in the House, and the gentleman has no right to refer to what was transacted in committee.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order taken by the gentleman from New Hampshire. The bill was referred back to the House by the committee, with the recommendation that it be committed to the Committee on the Judiciary. The House refused so to refer it. The Chair decided that the previous question had not exhausted itself; and the House is brought now to a vote directly upon the question of engrossing the bill.

Mr. TUCK. I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I move that the appeal be laid upon the table.

Mr. CARTTER. I rise to a privileged question. I move the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken, and the House refused to adjourn.

The question was then taken upon the motion of Mr. RICHARDSON to lay the appeal upon the table, and it was agreed to.

Mr. COBB. I find we are getting into considerable difficulty.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is not in order.

Mr. COBB. I rise for personal explanation.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama is not in order.

Mr. CARTTER. I call for the reading of the third section.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I object.

Cries of "Let the bill be read!"

Mr. CABELL, of Florida. I move that when this House adjourns it adjourn to meet on Friday next.

The question was then taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The bill was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That nothing in the act approved September 28, 1850, "granting bounty land to certain officers and soldiers who have been engaged in the military service of the United States," shall be so construed as to prevent the sale and transfer of any certificate or warrant issued by virtue of said act, prior to the location of the same, or the issue of the patent thereon.

Sec. 2. And be it further resolved, That the registers and receivers of the United States land offices shall hereafter be severally authorized to charge and receive for their services in locating bounty land warrants, the same rate of compensation or percentage to which they are entitled by law for sales of the public lands for cash, at the rate of $1 25 per acre, the said compensation to be hereafter paid by the assignees or holders of such warrants, in all cases where the same have been transferred by the soldier or his legal or personal representative, under the provisions of the acts of Congress, and the regulations of the General Land Office on that subject, and to be paid out of the Treasury of the United States, upon the adjustment of the accounts of such officers, where it shall be shown to the satisfaction of the General Land Office that the same was located by the soldier or warrantee, or in case of his death by his next of kin, as provided by the acts of Congress aforesaid.

Sec. 3. And be it further resolved, That the said officers, whether in or out of office at the time of passage of this act, or their legal or personal representatives in case of their death, shall be entitled to receive from the Treasury of the United States, for similar services heretofore performed in such cases, an amount equal to the compensation provided for by the first section of this act, after deducting the amount already received by such officers under the act entitled "An act to require the holders of military land warrants to compensate the land officers of the United States for services in relation to the location of those warrants," approved May 17, 1848: Provided, That no register or receiver shall receive any compensation out of the Treasury of the United States, for past services, who has charged and received illegal or exorbitant fees for the location of such warrants.

Sec. 4. And be it further resolved, That nothing in the first section of the act of the 28th of September, 1850, granting bounty land to certain officers and soldiers who have been engaged in the military service of the United States, shall be so construed as to exclude any commissioned or non-commissioned officer, musician, or private, whether of regulars, volunteers, rangers, or militia, who was mustered into the service of the United States for the suppression or prevention of Indian hostilities, and served the length of time required by said act, or whose services were subsequently recognized by the United States.

Sec. 5. And be it further resolved, That in all cases where the militia or volunteers, or State troops were called out under the laws or executive authority of any State, and who served in defence of the country, and whose service have been recognized and paid by the United States Government, shall be considered as having been in the service of the United States, and shall be entitled to the benefit of the act to which these resolutions are explanatory.

[Mr. WILDRICK, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported to the House, as correctly enrolled, the joint resolution providing for printing of additional copies of the Journals and documents. It was then signed by the Speaker.]

The question recurred on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The yeas and nays were demanded and ordered.

Mr. CARTTER. Is it competent, under the operation of the previous question, to call for a separate vote upon each section of the resolution? There is a rule somewhere, but I do not know where it can be found.

Mr. WELCH, (in his seat.) Rule 53.

Mr. BISSELL. If the previous question is still in force, I call for the question.

[A message in writing was here received from the President of the United States; which in a subsequent part of this day's proceedings was laid before the House.]

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I wish to make a question of order at this time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would remind the gentleman that while the roll is being called it is not in order to make explanations.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. This bill makes an appropriation of $500,000.

Cries of "Call the roll!" "Call the roll!"

Mr. BRENTON, when his name was called, asked to be excused from voting, as he was included under the exceptions contained in the 40th rule.

The question being put and taken upon ordering the bill to be read a third time and engrossed, it resulted—yeas 89, nays 66; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abercrombie, Willis Allen, Andrews, Ashe, Bartlett, Bennett, Bibbhaugh, Bissell, Breckenridge, Albert G. Brown, Busby, E. Carrington Cabell, Caldwell, Chastain, Churchill, Clark, Cleveland, Clingan, Cobb, Conger, Cullom, John G. Moore, Newton, Orr, Andrew Parker, Pennington, Perkins, Robbins, Robie, Scudder, Scurry, David L. Seymour, Origen S. Seymour, Skelton, Smith, Alexander H. Stephens, Sutherland, George W. Thompson, Townsend, Tuck, Walbridge, Wallace, and Wildrick—66.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee. I move to reconsider the vote by which this bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and to lay that motion upon the table.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I call for a division of the question.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, called for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. It is not divisible.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. The question is divisible, and the first question is upon laying the motion to reconsider upon the table. If that motion is voted down, then the question will recur upon the reconsideration.

The SPEAKER. By the option of the House it may be divided; but cannot by the Chair.

The question was then taken upon laying the motion to reconsider upon the table, and it was not agreed to—yeas 47, noes not counted.

Mr. DUNHAM. I believe the previous question has now exhausted itself, and I hope the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time may prevail; for if it—

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I rise to a point of order. The bill having passed under the operation of the previous question, the motion to reconsider is not debatable.

The SPEAKER. The opinion of the Chair is, that the previous question has been exhausted, and that the motion to reconsider is debatable.

Mr. DUNHAM. I hope the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was engrossed and read a third time may prevail. If it does, I mean to make a motion to refer the bill to a select committee where it may be fully considered.

Mr. BRECKENRIDGE. I wish to say a word upon that motion to those having constituents interested in these land warrants. I am in favor of the reference of the subject to a select committee. By the bill as it now stands the holders of these warrants are limited in the location of them to the lands in the market at the time the bill was passed. Since that time great quantities of lands have been brought into market. Should you not adopt an amendment including the lands that were brought into market after the passage of that bill, it will be practically excluding the holders of land warrants from the best portion of the public domain.

Mr. CABELL, of Florida. Will the gentleman allow me to say a word?

Mr. BRECKENRIDGE. Certainly, sir.

Mr. CABELL. I propose to the gentleman from Kentucky that he will offer as an amendment such as I send to the Clerk's table.

Mr. BRECKENRIDGE. I will cheerfully yield to an amendment that will accomplish my purpose.

Mr. HOUSTON. The amendment is not in order.

Mr. CABELL. I do not propose to amend the bill. This question is open to discussion, and I only desired that the proposition should be read, with a view to carry out the purposes of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BRECKENRIDGE.] I will state to the gentleman from Kentucky, and to the House, that when this bill granting bounty lands originally passed, it had no such provision attached to it as that which he proposes to repeal. All lands, subject to entry at the time of making the application to locate the bounty lands, were open to the soldier. At the succeeding session of Congress, a gentleman from Ohio, no longer a member of this House, (Mr. Vinton,) who seemed to be specially anxious to prevent new States from acquiring benefits which had been conferred most liberally upon his own, introduced, at what time I know not, in a bill having no connection with bounty lands whatever a proviso, to repeal which the gentleman from Kentucky now makes his motion. In one of the general appropriation bills of the preceding session, a proviso was introduced, providing that no land bounty for military services granted by the act of the 28th of September, 1850, entitled "An act granting bounty land to certain officers and soldiers who have been engaged in the military service of the United States, or by virtue of any other act of Congress heretofore passed granting land bounties for military services, shall be satisfied out of any public land not heretofore brought into market, and now subject to entry at private sale under existing laws." This was a proviso to the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill. In that way it passed the House, and, as I think against the sense of the House. I intend, when it shall be in order, to offer an additional section to the bill, to repeal that clause of the civil and diplomatic bill, thus:

And he further resolved, That so much of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of Government for the year ending the 30th June, 1855, and for other purposes," as provides "that no land bounty for military services granted by the act of the 28th of September, 1850, entitled 'An act granting bounty land to certain officers and soldiers who have engaged in the military service of the United States,' or by virtue of any other act of Congress heretofore passed, granting land bounties for military services, shall be satisfied out of any public land not heretofore brought into market, and now subject to entry at private sale under existing laws," be and the same is hereby repealed.

Mr. BRECKENRIDGE. The proposition is not now in order. It is evident that the gentleman from Florida and myself are aiming at the same thing. I rose merely for the purpose of explaining a portion of the bill, and of showing the importance of amending it in the manner suggested. I hope the friends of the soldier will vote for the reference, and for giving this privilege to holders of land warrants.

Mr. TUCK. I am in favor of the reconsideration moved, although I would oppose it, if nothing influenced me but the reasons which have hitherto been assigned in its favor. I am decidedly opposed to the amendment which the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CABELL] designs to offer to the bill, in case the vote to reconsider prevails. To open the virgin lands of the territories to the liability of being taken by the holders of these warrants, is a measure which I can never support. I had the pleasure during the last summer to travel through several of the Western States, and into one of the Territories. In Minnesota I found men who had removed from Illinois and Wisconsin to escape the effect of such a provision as the gentleman from Florida proposes, by his amendment, to make general throughout the Territories and our whole domain. These men gave me as the only reason for leaving the fertile fields and prairies of those States, that the villages which they had commenced to build up by hard labor, amidst the inconveniences of a frontier life, had become surrounded by the lands of those who had bought up and located land warrants, and who, amidst the luxuries of eastern cities, were waiting for their lands to be made valuable by the hard labor of the western farmer. They told me that they would no longer work to develop a country, when the land about them, without an inhabitant upon it, was to be enhanced in value by their labor only; and to escape such a necessity they had gone to Minnesota, where land warrants cannot be located by the laws of the country, and where the actual inhabitants own the soil. These men were those who live by the sweat of their brows—honest citizens, desirous only of earning a livelihood and competence, by hard labor and patient industry.

It may be that the only satisfaction we shall derive from attempting to arrest the passage of this bill, will be to gain the privilege of giving a deliberate vote against it. That satisfaction I hope to have, and also that of calling the attention of the House to some of my objections to its provisions. I call the attention of members to the fact, that this bill has its present place ahead of all other business, because we have, in regard to this measure, dispensed with the formalities, requirements, and tests which are required in all other cases. This bill has been to no standing committee, has never been considered in Committee of the Whole House, except the first section of it, and is now attempted to be forced through, under the operation of the previous question. I am unable to understand the occasion of this hot haste, and undignified rapidity of legislation, unless speculators in warrants are impatient to have a good branch of business opened to them for the winter. Gentlemen may suppose that the multiplication of land warrants by this bill will especially benefit the Western doers of the land. They may be right in this supposition, but I can assure them that the sharp-sighted speculators of the Atlantic cities will divide the spoils with them. They will buy the warrants at a great discount, locate them in large or small parcels in all parts of the West, and patiently wait at home for the Western men to give a high value to these lands by labor and toil, in which the speculators will not participate. The lands will thus be held in a sort of mortmain, and the new States be cursed by the sharpers, who refuse to take a share in the hardships of that frontier life, by which they attempt to become enriched.

This bill has been talked about yesterday and to-day; but until within a short time, we have not heard a word upon that part of it which gives to it its chief importance. The great feature of the bill is contained in the fourth section. To that section, I invite the particular attention of this House. It proposes to grant bounty lands to all who have been engaged since 1790 in the suppression of Indian hostilities. It creates a new class of beneficiaries for bounty land, indefinite in number, and to an extent unestimated and unknown.

The attempt is made to force this law to the last stage of enactment, when no gentleman has yet proposed to lay before us any estimate whatever of the extent of land which will be appropriated under the operation of this law. Does this haste become us? Is it necessary for the friends of the law to deny us light, and to force a vote without knowing themselves, or permitting others to know, anything of the amplitude of the provisions of this law?

Let me call the attention of the House to the fate of the proposition contained in the fourth section, in the last Congress. It was then thoroughly discussed, and, after mature consideration, was condemned. It was stated during the discussion, by a gentleman from Ohio, of great experience and great wisdom, (Mr. Vinton,) that applications for these gratuities of land had been before Congress for about twenty-five years, and had always been refused. The applications had been examined at every Congress and condemned, first because of want of merit in the applicants, who had been paid for all services they had performed, and therefore deserved nothing, in justice; and secondly, because the policy of our legislators had always condemned all schemes of plundering the public Treasury, or the public domain. Yet a law did pass the last Congress of unparalleled amplitude, giving lands to an immense number, which it is now proposed to follow up, by a precipitate enactment of another law of unestimated and unknown capacity. If gentlemen, after examining the law, and ascertaining what it means, and what it is to accomplish, are inclined to vote for it, so be it. I shall not be captious, but shall content myself with the opposition which one member can make, and which my own judgment dictates.

Let me say a few words in regard to the first section of the bill, which relates only to the making of land warrants assignable. We have been in Committee of the Whole House, and have heard many remarks upon this section; but it has not yet been stated, what I now say, that some ten days ago a bill passed this House, and is now before the Senate, making land warrants assignable. This section is entirely unnecessary, and can do nobody any good. I voted for the other bill, and I have no objection to the reenactment contained in this section, if one reason could be given for it. I do not believe that such reduplication in the labors of this branch of Congress is becoming, assuming, as it does, that the attention of the Senate may not be attracted by doing a thing over once. It will also lead to confusion.

I will only say in regard to the fifth section of the bill, which is designed to give bounty lands to such State troops as have been recognized and paid for by the United States, that the section does not enlarge in the least the law of 1850, as now administered. Such claimants are now allowed bounty lands, as any one may learn by inquiring of the Commissioner of Pensions.

The second and third sections in regard to payments to assistant registers, I have not examined with much care. As at present inclined, I interpose no objection. I believe that all officers should have fair compensation for their services, and if it be the intention of these sections to secure such a purpose, I shall give them my support. I consider the fourth section of the bill creating the new class of land warrants, as before stated, to have an overwhelming importance, which throws all the other sections into comparative insignificance. To that I have exclusively directed my attention, leaving others to examine the other provisions of the measure. I entreat gentlemen to consider the great feature of this bill, and to consider the policy of this extravagant appropriation of the public domain, as well as the effect of it upon the new States, before they give to it the sanction of their support. Let it go through the ordinary stages of legislation, and be tried by those tests which are thought necessary in laws which have not one thousandth part of the importance of this. Under the fourth section of the bill there is concealed a monster, whose talons may pierce the new States, and curse them for many years. I cannot pretend to drag him forth and destroy him. I content myself with only pointing to the place where he lies concealed.

I did not rise with the purpose of occupying so much of your time. As I said at the outset, I fear, from the indications about me, that opposition will be fruitless, and that I must content myself with the enactment of a bad law, by the reflection that I opposed and voted against it. I have pointed out some of my objections to the bill, and I close.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. Tuck] has opened a discussion here as to the effect upon the new States of the resolution now before us for consideration. I have thought, and still think, that the Representatives from the West understand her interests. They have not been accused heretofore of any negligence in this respect. The gentleman is very much afraid that our interests will be neglected and forgotten. Well, for one, I beg leave to say, that I think we understand the interests of the West quite as well as the gentleman from New Hampshire. The gentleman says that he is opposed to certain provisions in this bill, because they open a door to speculation. How, sir? We have watched the operations of the bill as it now exists, and how has it been? The speculator who buys the land or buys the warrant without an assignment upon the back, buys it at a far less price than he would if he got the assignment, because he is to run the hazard of getting the title. The man who intends to buy him a home, and who has only money enough to do it, is not going to run any chance in speculation. It is only the speculator who will do it.

Mr. TUCK. It seems I was not fortunate enough to make myself understood. I voted for the law which passed a few days since, making these land warrants assignable. The gentleman misunderstood me. I said I am opposed to any proposition subjecting the public domain to entry by these land warrants, for the reason that it would open all the new Territories to the speculators; and to this I am opposed.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I understood the gentleman from New Hampshire, I think. What reason is it here that this Government should not give the privilege to enter land in Minnesota as well as in Illinois? Can the gentleman assign any good reason? He says the effect of it is, to drive our population from Illinois to locate in the Territories, where they will not have to meet competition from the speculator holding these land warrants. Has not your Government perpetrated fraud by pretending to give the public domain to your citizens for public services, when it only gives them the refuse of the lands? Can the gentleman assign any reason why an individual who has his warrant from Government for land, should not locate in Minnesota as well as in Illinois? The gentleman says that the question was discussed in the last Congress, and that the subject was perfectly understood. I concur with the statement made by the gentleman from Florida, [Mr. CABELL,] that the amendment restricting the location of the warrants to the lands then in market, found its way through this House covertly; that its purpose was not avowed, nor was it understood. I understand from gentlemen around me, that it came from the Committee of Ways and Means in one of your appropriation bills, and under the plea that it would have checked the wheels of Government, unless these lands were cut off from the soldiers. Thus it was that the bill was passed. I think, however pertinent this whole discussion may be at this time, that there is an appropriate place for the discussion of all these questions. I want this thing disposed of, and for the purpose of producing this result, I move the previous question.

Mr. BAYLY. I wish the gentleman would withdraw his call for the previous question for a few moments.

The call being withdrawn—

Mr. BAYLY resumed. I only desire to say a word in reference to the remarks of my friend from Florida, [Mr. CABELL,] and my friend from Illinois, [Mr. RICHARDSON,] in respect to the provision contained in the civil and diplomatic bill passed at the last session of Congress. It was true that that amendment was moved by the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. Vinton) at that time, and that I aided him zealously in passing it. I therefore feel myself quite as responsible for that amendment as the gentleman from Ohio. The motives which actuated us were these: At that time it was almost certain that unless we husbanded the resources of this Government very carefully, we should have to resort to loans to carry on the Government. A loan had been recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury, and I felt it my duty, in the position which I then occupied, to take every means in my power to obviate that necessity. We desired to confine the location of these warrants to lands which had been already in the market, in order that we might still continue to get some revenue from the public lands which at that time I thought we would want very much. I have not seen the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, and I am not able, therefore, to say with any great confidence whether this source of revenue from the public lands can now with safety be dispensed with. By the operation of this provision, notwithstanding the predictions that this bounty land bill would cut off the entire revenue from the public lands, we were enabled in the last year to receive from that source more than two millions of dollars. We had another view, or at least I had, in advocating the adoption of the provision to which my friend from Florida has referred. I shall not imitate the example of the gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. TUCK,] and undertake to instruct these Western members as to what is their interest, because in my experience here during five Congresses I have found that they are exceedingly smart and adroit in taking care of themselves.

Mr. TUCK. I wish to say to the gentleman, that I defy him or any other member who heard my remarks, to find one word that assumed any position or any right to instruct members from any part of the country.

Mr. BAYLY. If that is the case, let the matter drop. That was the understanding of my friend from Illinois [Mr. RICHARDSON] of the speech of the gentleman from New Hampshire. It is a small matter any way. I had another view in wishing to confine the location of these warrants to lands already in market. My own decided opinion is, that it is the policy of this Government to withdraw its proprietorship over the public lands within the States as rapidly as it can be done with propriety. I knew that the public lands in nearly all of the States had already been surveyed and were in the market; and I knew, also, that by confining the location of these warrants to such lands, it would compel the extinction, to the extent of these warrants, of the Government proprietorship in these cases. I did not regard it as a matter of any hardship to these soldiers, because there are in these States, now open to private entry, as fine lands as there are on the face of the earth. It was for these reasons, and not from any disposition to do injustice to warrant holders, that I felt it my duty, in the position I then occupied, to husband the resources of Government as much as I could. In doing that, I was pleased to find that I was at the same time carrying out this very policy of the Government, to which I have referred—that is, the extinction of the proprietorship of this Government over these lands.

Mr. BISSELL. The land warrants throughout the West might have been located in the State of Illinois, and still there would be three millions of acres left there now.

Mr. BAYLY. That was the policy I pursued.

Mr. CARTTER. I will trespass upon the time of the House but a few moments. I hope that the motion to engross this bill may be reconsidered, for I understand by gentlemen best acquainted with the rules of the House, that they permit an expression of the sentiment of the House in reference to the merits of the bill, and that they also tolerate amendments. My objections to the bill are not of the character that have been alluded to, and do not obviate the objection of throwing away the public domain. I am done with that point; but my prayer now is, that my friend from Tennessee [Mr. JOHNSON] may urge forward his measure for the distribution of the public domain among men who will till and occupy it. The measure will succeed. The struggle in regard to this bill, and every bill of a kindred character, which has come before this body since I have had the honor of a seat here, has been a mere scramble among speculators to plunder the public domain.

In the pursuit of this measure, you have hunted up all the patriots that ever shouldered a musket, and they have even got warrants for corn-stalk service in the States. We have exhausted this avenue to the expenditure of the public domain; for every man that ever heard or smelt powder, or that had a great-great-grandfather that ever did, has been provided for as a patriot in the public service. [Laughter.] I know that this way of talking is a little unpopular. The army, and everybody that ever heard of it, is canonized, and I am aware that I run some little risk of getting into collision with this patriotic force. Nevertheless, no gentleman will differ with me in this, that, in the wide range of public benevolence, in the direction of military service, they have got them all in—corn-stalks and all.

But, sir, my objection to this bill is, that we are exhibiting our financiering talents; we are making an exhibition of our abundant capacity to throw away the public domain—a domain purchased out of the general Treasury, and paid for in the coats and pantaloons of the citizens—a domain that belongs, (if tax-paying constitutes any rule of judgment in the premises,) not to the States, as some have contended, or to the corn-stalk army; but that belongs to the individual citizens, in rights secured by individual taxation, and that is to be compensated for, when it is alienated by the Federal Government, in the same description of taxation. Nevertheless, it is doomed to go, and I do not raise my voice against its alienation, for it would be impotent for that purpose.

But to the question of financiering as connected with this subject. We are proving ourselves abundantly profligate in throwing away the public domain, and not only that, but abundantly profligate in drawing out of the public Treasury money outside of the domain, to provide for its distribution. You not only tax the citizen by his contribution to the Federal Treasury, for the purchase of this domain, but you propose by this bill to tax him further in the process of giving it away to patriots. What is the third section of this bill? It says, "officers, whether in or out of office." You are not content with paying officers in office, and with prospects for the future, but you pay men whether in or out of office—the rest of mankind. [Laughter.]

Mr. BISSELL. Will the gentleman from Ohio permit me—as I may not be able to get the floor when he shall have concluded—to say a word or two upon that third section?

Mr. CARTTER. Well, perhaps I might if I knew what you were going to say.

Mr. BISSELL. What I should say would be directly against what you are saying, and it would be based upon the bill itself which you misapprehend entirely.

Mr. CARTTER. I may misapprehend the bill, but it certainly reads, that "said officers, whether in or out of office at the time of the passage of this act, or their legal or personal representatives, in case of their death, shall be entitled to receive from the Treasury of the United States"—not from the revenues of the public domain, not from the fund proposed to be distributed by this bill, but from the general revenues of the United States.

Mr. ORR, (interrupting.) I desire to make a suggestion to the gentleman. Is he aware that that applies also to the Mexican bounty land warrants that have already been paid?

Mr. CARTTER. Precisely so. It is a bill in the past, present, and future tenses; providing for the dead and the living; for men in office and out of office. A more flagrant and profligate measure for drawing money out of the public Treasury, it appears to me, has never been submitted to this House. Is it not enough in all conscience to tax the American citizen to fill your public Treasury, and then give away the resources that have been purchased by his taxation, without drawing upon the public Treasury to provide the ways and means by which it shall be given away? I regard it as an outrage upon the private rights of the citizen who has not had the gratification of shouldering a corn-stalk.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. Will the gentlemen permit me?

Mr. CARTTER. I mean no disrespect to the officers of the late war. [Laughter.]

Mr. MARSHALL. I supposed the gentleman had finished.

Mr. CARTTER. I will give way to the gentleman.

Mr. MARSHALL. I did not rise with the intention of replying to the gentleman's remarks, but merely to say that it must be apparent to the House, that the course of this proceeding had thrown the friends of a measure similar to this into a position on which they must either have engrossed the bill or killed it, and it is to be hoped that the House will now unanimously agree to the reconsideration, and to the commitment of the bill either to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, or to a select committee, with a view that a bill may be brought in here upon which gentlemen can expend their eloquence and their energy. I move the previous question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CARTTER] yield the floor for that purpose?

Mr. MARSHALL. The gentleman yielded the floor absolutely.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I understood the gentleman from Ohio as merely yielding for an explanation.

Mr. CARTTER. Certainly. I only yielded for an explanation, and I wish now to state a fact.

Mr. MARSHALL. I declined to take the floor for the purpose of explanation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to know of the gentleman from Ohio, whether he had yielded the floor finally, or merely for explanation?

Mr. CARTTER. Only for explanation.

Mr. MARSHALL. Well, I declined at the time to accept it for that purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio is entitled to the floor.

Mr. CARTTER. I will yield the floor finally in a moment, but not by calling the previous question. The fact that I was about stating at the time my friend from Kentucky rose, was this, that every one of these warrants costs the public Treasury two dollars. Now I want this measure opened up. If we dispose of this public domain, let us do it intelligently and responsibly, and not under the gag of the previous question, or by force of the drill, taking hold upon combinations here. Give us an open sea, and a fair sail upon this question, and I apprehend that a portion of this bill at any rate will be obliterated.

Mr. JONES of Tennessee. It is very evident, I think, from the vote of this House refusing to lay upon the table the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was ordered to be engrossed, that the bill is not now in a form that meets the wishes and views of a majority of the House. While there is a decided majority of the House for the main and principal feature of this bill, there is also, I think, a majority against the bill as it now stands.

In the first place, the first section of this bill is perhaps wholly and entirely unnecessary, because this House has, upon a former day of the present session, passed a provision to effect exactly the same purpose that this section is intended to accomplish.

The next section, which provides for giving fees and augmented fees to the receivers and registers of the land office who shall locate the land warrants, is not in a form that suits myself, and I think very many of us, if not a majority of this House.

I must say that I do not understand the full bearing of that section. If it shall pass into a law, I suppose it is to give to these officers the same fees to which they would have been entitled if the land had been entered and paid for as provided for in this section; and not only this, but, if I understand it, it does more—it authorizes the registers and receivers to receive similar fees for the land warrants they have heretofore located under the law granting bounty lands to the soldiers in the Mexican war. But this section makes a distinction between the soldiers who are the beneficiaries of the Government under the acts of Congress granting bounty lands. It provides that the soldier shall locate the land himself, and that the Government shall then take the responsibility of paying the register and receiver for locating them. I ask you how does the soldier who paid it in the first instance to the receiver of the land office get it back from that officer? This bill provides in the first instance, that everybody shall make payment to the register and receiver the fees for locating the warrants, and that when he comes to settle with the Treasury Department there shall be refunded to him from the Treasury of the United States as much as he has received from the man himself. It provides that—

"The registers and receivers of the United States land offices shall heretofore be severally authorized to charge and receive for their services in locating bounty land warrants, the same rate of compensation or percentage to which they are entitled by law for sales of the public lands for cash, at the rate of one dollar and twenty five cents per acre, the said compensation to be hereafter paid by the assignees or holders of such warrants, in all cases where the same have been transferred by the soldier or his legal or personal representative, under the provisions of the acts of Congress, and the regulations of the General Land Office on that subject, and to be paid out of the Treasury of the United States, upon the adjustment of the accounts of such officers, where it shall be shown to the satisfaction of the General Land Office that the same was located by the soldier or warrantee, or in case of his death by his next of kin, as provided by the acts of Congress aforesaid."

Mr. BISSELL. Will the gentleman allow me for a moment?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. BISSELL. By the terms of this resolution it is not contemplated that the soldier himself, in locating the warrant, shall pay anything to the register and receiver for said location. The Government itself is to allow compensation to the register and receiver, when the soldier has not transferred the warrant; but when the soldier has made a transfer, the assignee who made the purchase is required to pay the compensation to the register and receiver.

Mr. JONES. Still you authorize the soldier to transfer his warrant, and you charge the assignee the price of the fees which you authorize the register of the land office to receive for making the location. When the man comes to buy the warrant from the soldier, it will reduce the value exactly to the amount which he is to pay to the receiver of the land office. Then this section makes an appropriation out of the Treasury; and by our rules the bill should be considered in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, where this section has not been considered. To the next section, which provides for extending the benefits of the act approved September 28th, 1850, to other persons, I have no objection; but it will not suffer from undergoing an investigation by the committee to which it will be referred, and who will report it back in an intelligible form which will bear the test of scrutiny.

I desire to make a few remarks upon another subject which has been introduced here; that is, the proviso which was incorporated into the civil and diplomatic bill the last session prohibiting the location of bounty land warrants upon any lands other than those which had been surveyed and brought into market. I think the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BAYLY] will find he is mistaken when he says that this provision was incorporated into the civil and diplomatic bill under the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury that it would be necessary to make a loan. My recollection, is that the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury for a loan was in the first session of the last Congress. This proviso, restricting the location of these bounty land warrants, was passed upon the last day of the last session of the last Congress, when it had been ascertained that the revenues of the country would exceed even the wasteful and extravagant and prodigal estimates and demands of the Administration, sustained and backed by the Congress of the United States.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia, (interrupting.) I only wish to set the gentleman from Tennessee right as to the matter of fact in relation to this loan. Does not my friend recollect that he and I had three or four discussions during the last session of Congress, in which he undertook to show that the bills we had reported largely exceeded the revenues of the country?

Mr. JONES. That was the first session.

Mr. BAYLY. At the second, too.

Mr. JONES, (resuming.) Then how did this proposition get into the civil and diplomatic bill? They cannot say I did it. The first move which was made was to refuse to make any appropriation for the further survey of the public lands and to provide for their being brought into market subject to being located upon by these warrants. The Department said that they must have money to survey the lands, and it was decided to put it into the bill, at the instance of Mr. Vinton, whose name has been mentioned in connection with this subject; but when the appropriation was put in, it was accompanied by a proviso to prevent the location of warrants upon such lands as should hereafter be surveyed. When it came into the House that proviso was stricken out of the bill by an overwhelming majority, so large that those who advocated it had no show at all upon the question. Mr. Vinton was, from the beginning, uncompromisingly opposed to the passage of the bounty land law, and threw all the obstacles in his power in its way. If I mistake not, my friend from Virginia [Mr. BAYLY] voted against that law when it was before the House.

Mr. BAYLY. I must say that my friend from Tennessee does not exhibit his usual accuracy today. I voted for it.

Mr. JONES. I recollect that the gentleman said in a speech that he did not want his constituents to get these lands and remove from his State.

Mr. TAYLOR. Will the gentleman from Tennessee permit me to ask him if this proviso did not come from the Senate, as an amendment?

Mr. JONES. That is just what I am coming to. When it had been stricken out in the House, the bill went to the Senate, and it was understood that Mr. Vinton followed it there and got the proviso incorporated. It came back to the House, and a committee of conference was appointed upon the bill, and that committee, I believe, with my friend from Virginia, [Mr. BAYLY] and Mr. Vinton both, on it, on the part of the House, reported it back here, when the clock wanted but five, ten, or, at most, fifteen minutes to twelve o'clock, the 4th of March, 1851. I then called for a vote upon it. I wished to defeat the proviso; and I would have defeated the appropriation bill sooner than to have seen it passed the House with the proviso in it. The committee had not time to meet again, and unless the House concurred in the report the bill would be lost. In that state of feeling, and at that period of the session, passed the proviso, after three fourths of the members had voted against it.

I hope this bill will be referred either to a select committee or to the Committee on the Judiciary, or to some other committee, which will take the subject into consideration and make the bill such as it should be and such as shall meet the wishes of a majority of this House, and which, at all events, shall provide for the repeal of that proviso in the civil and diplomatic bill of the last session.

I move the previous question.

The previous question was then seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. CLARK asked that the previous question might be withdrawn for a moment.

[Cries of "Too late!"]

The SPEAKER said no remarks could be made after the previous question had been seconded. The question was now upon reconsidering the vote by which the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time.

The question was then put, and carried in the affirmative.

So the House agreed to reconsider; and the question again recurring upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time—

Mr. DUNHAM moved to refer the bill to a select committee of five.

The question was put, and the motion to refer was agreed to.

Mr. DUNHAM moved to reconsider the vote just taken, and to lay that motion upon the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

CUBAN AFFAIRS.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia, asked that by unanimous consent the Chair be permitted to lay before the House the several Executive communications upon the Speaker's table. One of these was of a most important character, and should be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. There being no objection,

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication from the President of the United States, viz:

To the House of Representatives:

I transmit to the House of Representatives a report from the Secretary of State in answer to the first part of a resolution of the 15th December, 1851; and also a report from the Secretary of the Navy, in answer to the remaining part of the same resolution.

MILLARD FILLMORE.

WASHINGTON, 23d December, 1851.

[The first part of the resolution of the House referred to in the above, called upon the State Department for any information in its possession in regard to the conclusion of a treaty between Spain, France, and Great Britain in relation to the Island of Cuba, and the nature of such treaty. The Department informs the House that it has no knowledge of the conclusion of any such treaty, and that there is good reason to suppose that no such treaty has been entered into, although there is no official information upon the subject. The second branch of the resolution called upon the Navy Department for information in regard to the relative strength of the British, French, and the United States squadrons in the West India seas, and whether additional appropriations are necessary to increase the force of the United States on that station. In response to the above, the Secretary of the Navy reports that the United States have in those seas but five vessels, carrying sixty-five guns in the aggregate; that the British squadron consists of twenty-one vessels, carrying in the aggregate six hundred and thirty-two guns; and that the force of the French is deemed to be equal to that of the English. He also states that additional appropriations are necessary if the United States squadron be increased, unless the vessels be drawn from other stations.]

Mr. BAYLY moved that the communication and accompanying documents be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and be printed; which motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Treasury Department, transmitting, in compliance with the 20th section of the act of 26th August, 1842, detailed statements of the manner in which the contingent funds of said Department have been expended during the year ending the 30th day of September, 1851; which,

On motion by Mr. HOUSTON, was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

Also, laid before the House a communication from J. J. Albert, Colonel of the Corps of Topographical Engineers, a report relative to the construction of roads in Minnesota Territory, in answer to the resolution of the House of the 15th instant; which,

On motion by Mr. SIBLEY, was referred to the Committee on Territories, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a communication from the Navy Department, transmitting a report from the Fourth Auditor of the Treasury, exhibiting in detail form the pay and allowance of the several officers of the Navy and Marine Corps of the United States for the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1851; which,

On motion by Mr. BOCKOCK, was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

JOHN S. THRASHER.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following communication from the President of the United States, viz:

To the House of Representatives:

In answer to a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 15th instant, requesting information in regard to the imprisonment, trial, and sentence of John S. Thrasher in the Island of Cuba, I transmit a report from the Secretary of State, and the documents which accompanied it.

MILLARD FILLMORE.

WASHINGTON, December 23, 1851.

The communication having been read, Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia, moved that it be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. BROOKS moved to amend the motion as follows:

"With directions to examine into the laws of domicile in the Island of Cuba, and to see if they are not proper matters for negotiation and treaty."

The question was put, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. B. said: I do not propose to make any remarks upon that amendment at the present time.

A MEMBER. You can't, for it has passed.

Mr. B. continued. But I will, at a proper time, by the indulgence of the House, enter into an explanation of what these laws are, and how unjustly they operate upon our citizens, and the reason why I think it a proper subject for negotiation upon the part of our Government.

The whole subject was then referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. BOCKOCK. I believe that the first message which was read from the President of the United States, was in answer to a resolution offered by my colleague from the Petersburg district, [Mr. MEADE,] a few days ago, calling upon the Executive for information, as to whether there had been a treaty concluded between England and France having relation to Cuba. The communication in answer to this legitimately goes to the Committee on Foreign Relations. There was another part of that resolution calling upon the President of the United States to inform the House whether, in his opinion, it was necessary that our navy in the Gulf of Mexico should be increased. In answer to that part of the resolution there was a communication from the Navy Department, and it is my impression that communication should go to the Committee on Naval Affairs. The chairman of that committee is not here, and supposing that is the legitimate reference, I move, or ask, if it is not apparent to the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations that it be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. The reference I moved was a proper one, as the communication refers to international affairs. I have not, however, the slightest objection to the reference proposed by my colleague.

Mr. BOCKOCK. If the reference to the Committee on Foreign Relations is the proper one, I am satisfied.

Mr. HASCALL moved the House adjourn; which motion was agreed to.

So the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, December 26, 1851.

Prayer by the Rev. L. F. MORGAN.

The PRESIDENT called the Senate to order at thirty-five minutes after twelve o'clock; and stated that there was not a quorum present.

Mr. FELCH. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. MANGUM. Will the Senator withdraw that motion?

Mr. FELCH. I withdraw it.

Mr. MANGUM. I move that when the Senate adjourns, it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair is under the impression that the motion cannot be received. The Constitution of the United States expressly designates what is to be done. We cannot adjourn for more than three days without a joint resolution; and when there is not a quorum in attendance we can only adjourn from day to day. Such is the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. FELCH. Then I renew the motion to adjourn.

Mr. BRADBURY. I think there will be a quorum present in a few minutes. I hope the Senate will not adjourn until we order some investigation into the causes of the late fire. I think the Sergeant-at-Arms might easily secure a quorum.

The PRESIDENT. It is in the power of the Senate to send for absent members if such is its pleasure.

Mr. CASS. I do not think it is worth while to send for absent members during the holidays. I have prepared a resolution in relation to the fire, which I intended to submit, but I am willing to let it lie over.

Mr. FELCH. If there is any object to be accomplished by withdrawing the motion, I will withdraw it.

The PRESIDENT. The only object which can be accomplished by not adjourning, will be the sending for absent Senators. The Senate can order the attendance of absent members, or wait to see whether or not they will come in.

Mr. CASS. I would only say that I do not think there is any probability of obtaining a quorum.

Mr. MANGUM. I renew the motion to adjourn.

The motion was disagreed to—ayes 10, noes 10.

After waiting for some time longer without obtaining a quorum,

On the motion of Mr. MANGUM, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, December 26, 1851.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m.

The following gentlemen have been appointed by the Speaker to constitute the select committee on the joint resolution in relation to the assignability of land warrants, viz: Mr. DUNHAM, of Indiana; Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia; Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee; Mr. TUCK, of New Hampshire; and Mr. BISSELL, of Illinois.

BURNING OF THE LIBRARY OF CONGRESS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Librarian of Congress; which was read, as follows, viz:

"LIBRARY OF CONGRESS, December 25, 1851.

SIR: It is my very painful duty to communicate to Congress the destruction of the books, paintings, statuary, medals, and other property of the principal saloon of their Library, yesterday morning, by fire that originated in the room, in a manner to me altogether unaccountable, as no fires have been used in it for a long time, and no candles, lamps, or other lights, have ever been used in it during the whole time that it has been under my charge.

I have not been able to ascertain the precise number of the books that were destroyed, but believe that it may be estimated at about thirty-five thousand.

It is truly gratifying to have it in my power to add, that about twenty thousand volumes of books that were in the Law Room, and in the two rooms adjoining the Saloon of the Library, are safe. Many of these books belonged to the library of the late President Jefferson, that was purchased by Congress in the year 1815.

They constitute the several chapters in the Catalogue of the Library, agreeably to Mr. Jefferson's classification, under the following heads: Ancient History; American History; Ecclesiastical History; Chemistry; Mineralogy and Conchology; Moral Philosophy; Law of Nature and Nations; the five chapters composing the law department of the Library; Religion; Politics, (including the science of Legislation, Political Economy, Commerce, Banking Statistics, &c.) part of the chapter on Architecture, and the entire chapter on Music; Dialogue and Epistolary; Logic; Rhetoric and Orations, and the Theory of Criticism.

I sincerely hope that the searching investigation Congress will give to the distressing event, which every lover of science and literature must deeply deplore, will lead to a detection of the causes that produced it, and to the adoption of means that will prevent, in all future time, a recurrence of the sad calamity.

With the most respectful regard, I have the honor to be, your obedient servant,

JOHN S. MEEHAN, Librarian.
To the Hon. LYNN BOYD,
Speaker of House Representatives U. S. Congress.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky, asked the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a joint resolution in reference to the subject referred to in the communication just read.

[Cries of "Read it!" "Read it!"]

The resolution was then read the first and second time, as follows:

Joint Resolution authorizing an Inquiry into the origin of the late fire, by which the National Library was destroyed.

Resolved, That the Joint Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds be instructed to inquire into the origin of the fire by which the National Library was consumed, on the 24th instant, and whether the same occurred from the negligence of any officer of Government, or person in the employment of either or both Houses of Congress, or from the defective construction of the furnaces or flues, or was the act of an incendiary; and also the extent of injury to the building, and the best mode of reconstructing the Library Room, so as to afford perfect security in the future against the like disaster, and report the facts to the House. The said committee shall have power to send for and examine, on oath, such persons as may have information touching the premises.

Mr. SWEETSER. I move to amend the resolution by making it the duty of a select committee, to consist of five, instead of the Committee on Public Buildings.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio moves to strike out the "Joint Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds," and insert a "select committee of five."

Mr. SWEETSER. At the suggestion of the members around me, I will move to insert the Committee on the Library, instead of that proposed in the resolution.

The question was then taken on the amendment, and it was lost.

The resolution was then read a second time, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. FOWLER. I suggest an amendment to the last part of the resolution. It proposes that the committee shall have power to send for such persons as may have information. Now, how are we to know they have information? I suggest as an amendment the words "that may be supposed to have information," instead of the words used in the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The amendment can be introduced only by unanimous consent.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. It has been suggested to me, that in the resolution offered to the House, the Library has been misnamed, and that instead of being called the National Library, it should be called the Congressional Library, or the Library of Congress. I suppose that by the unanimous consent of the House that alteration can be made.

The SPEAKER. If there was no objection the alteration could be made.

No objection being made, the resolution was altered accordingly.

The SPEAKER. The proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FOWLER] is objected to, and cannot be entertained.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. It seems to me that the resolution is defective in one particular. I merely make the suggestion to the gentleman who offered the resolution, and to the House, that if the House concur with me in that respect it may be amended without objection. One object of the resolution seems to be to inquire into the best mode of making the Library, when it should be rebuilt, fire-proof, so that it cannot be subjected to any similar accident in future. I simply wish to inquire, and suggest whether the range of investigation ought not to go further than this, and inquire as to the best means of making the whole Capitol fire-proof. It is well known to all that this accident not only destroyed the Library, but endangered every other part of the Capitol. The structure of this building above the House and Senate is of wood, and both the Senate and House of Representatives are liable to be consumed at any time, as was the Library day before yesterday. I make this as a suggestion, and I think the resolution should be so amended.

Objection was made to any such change, and the suggestion was not considered.

The resolution was then read the third time and passed.

SEIZURE OF THE BRIG AROC.

Mr. FULLER, of Maine, by the general consent of the House, introduced the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to this House, if not incompatible with the public interest, any information in possession of Government relative to the seizure of the brig "Aroc," of Eastport, Maine, owned by Z. A. Paine, and commanded by Captain A. C. Spates, and the detention and imprisonment of the master in the year A. D. 1850, by the Haytian authorities at the port of Jeremie; and also what measures, if any, that may have been taken to procure indemnity to the owners of said brig for her detention, and for the imprisonment of the master.

Mr. SWEETSER asked the unanimous consent of the House to withdraw certain papers from the files; but it was objected to.

Mr. COBB. Many of us have important bills to present to the House, and have referred to the appropriate committees, but we shall never be able to do so, unless we proceed to the regular order of business. The regular order of business is calling the States and Territories for petitions, and I call for that order of business now.

EXPENSES OF THE FIRE.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. With the permission of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Cobb] I will state that the Committee on Public Buildings received a communication this morning from the Commissioner of Public Buildings, stating that great expense had been incurred in extinguishing the fire on the 24th instant, and that an appropriation is needed to meet this expense, and for the purpose of putting the building in a condition to be secure from the action of the weather. I request the gentleman from Alabama to withdraw his call for the regular order of business, to enable me to introduce a bill for that purpose.

Mr. COBB. I have no objection. I consent. Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. I ask the general consent of the House to introduce a bill, and to move to refer it to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Several MEMBERS. "Read the bill!"

The bill was then read, as follows:

An act making appropriation to meet the expenses incurred in consequence of the late fire at the Capitol.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the sum of five thousand dollars be, and the same is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended, or so much thereof as may be necessary, under the direction of the Commissioner of Public Buildings, in discharge of expenses incurred in the extinguishment of the late fire in the Library Room, the removal of the rubbish, and the preservation of such books and other articles as may have been saved, and the construction of a tin roof for the preservation and protection of the public building now exposed.

The reading of the communication from the Commissioner of Public Buildings was then called for, and it was read, as follows:

OFFICE OF COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC BUILDINGS,
WASHINGTON, 26th December, 1851.

Honorable RICHARD H. STANTON,

Chairman Com. on Public Buildings and Grounds:

SIR: The late destruction of the Hall of the United States Library by fire, has left a mass of burning books and papers, which I am now having removed. I am also constructing a temporary roof (covered with tin) over the exposed arches which cover the rooms immediately east of the Library, which I hope to finish this week.

To enable me to pay the cost of these works, and also the buckets, axes, &c., purchased during the fire, and wages of men employed to guard the premises and prevent further extension of fire to other parts of the Capitol, I very respectfully pray your committee to ask for an appropriation of five thousand dollars, which I hope will be sufficient for these purposes.

I am, with great respect, your obedient servant,
WM. EASBY,
Commissioner of Public Buildings.

Mr. SWEETSER. The bill makes an appropriation of money, and must go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. Is there any objection to the introduction of the bill?

Mr. SWEETSER. Yes, sir, I object.

Mr. COBB. I now make a motion to proceed with the call for resolutions, dispensing with the call for petitions, &c.

Mr. CLINGMAN, (interrupting.) If the gentleman will allow me, I ask the general consent of the House to offer a resolution, of which I have given previous notice, and which I think will meet with no objection, which resolution is as follows:

Resolved, That so much of the standing rules as provides for calling States and Territories for petitions, be rescinded and repeated.

Objection was made by Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, and the resolution was not received.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I move that when this House adjourns, it adjourn to meet on Tuesday next.

Mr. FOWLER demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Is there a quorum?

The SPEAKER. A quorum is not necessary on a proposition for yeas and nays.

Mr. BOCKOCK. I move to strike out Tuesday, and insert Monday.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I have no objection.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I wish to be indulged to say a word or two. If we adjourn over till Tuesday, it will be impossible to pass before that time upon the bill, of which notice was given, appropriating money to defray the expenses incident to the burning of the library, and necessary to preserve the other portions of the building now exposed to the weather. It is a bill that should be passed immediately, and sent to the Senate, before its adjournment to-day, for action thereon. If the House remain in session, reports from committees will soon be in order, when the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds can introduce as a matter of right his bill, which has just now been precluded by the objection of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SWEETSER.] The House should not adjourn to-day before passing the bill. We must sit here until we can reach that bill in the regular order of business.

Mr. RICHARDSON. There is barely a quorum of the House now present. Gentlemen have left with the impression that there would be no business transacted until after New Year's day.

The SPEAKER stated that there was no quorum.

Mr. SWEETSER. I withdraw the objection I made to the introduction of the bill offered by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. STANTON,] but I do it with considerable reluctance. I was in favor of a more stringent course than that indicated by the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings, but I withdraw it upon the suggestion of my friends.

The SPEAKER. The question is now upon the motion of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. RICHARDSON.]

Mr. RICHARDSON. I withdraw my motion in reference to adjournment for the present.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky, by unanimous consent then introduced the bill, heretofore referred to, making appropriation to meet the expenses incurred in consequence of the late fire at the Capitol; which was read a first and second time by its title.

Cries "Read the bill!" "Read the bill!"

The bill was accordingly read as reported above.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. I move that it be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. There can be no objection to its being passed upon immediately, without sending it to the Committee of the Whole. The rule can be suspended by unanimous consent; and we can pass it, and send it to the Senate for their action upon it to-day.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed it was then read a third time and passed.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I now renew the motion I made a few moments since, that when the House adjourns, it adjourn to meet on Tuesday next.

Mr. STEPHENS. I ask that the Clerk be authorized to carry forthwith to the Senate the bill which has just been passed.

The SPEAKER. It will be done as a matter of course.

Mr. FOWLER called for the yeas and nays on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. RICHARDSON,] which were ordered; and having been taken, were—yeas 91, nays 54; as follows, viz:—

YEAS—Messrs. Aiken, Willis Allen, John Appleton, William Appleton, Ashe, Averett, Babcock, Thomas H. Bayly, Barrere, Bartlett, Beale, Bennett, Bissell, Bockock, Bowne, John H. Boyd, Bragg, Brooks, Albert G. Brown, Burrows, Bushy, E. Carrington Cabell, Caldwell, Chastain, Churchwell, George T. King, Mace, Humphrey Marshall, Martin, McCorkle, McDonald, McMullen, Millson, Minor, Morehead, Olds, Orr, Penn, Powell, Price, Richardson, Riddle, Robinson, Sackett, Schermerhorn, Schoonmaker, Scurry, David L. Seymour, Smart, Snow, Stanly, Frederick P. Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Stuart, Sutherland, Taylor, Benjamin Thompson, Thurston, Venable, Wallace, Addison White, Wilcox, Williams, and Yates—91.

NAYS—Messrs. Abercrombie, Allison, Brenton, Briggs, Joseph Cable, Lewis D. Campbell, Chapman, Clark, Cleveland, Clingman, Cobb, Conger, John G. Davis, Doty, Picklin, Fowler, Gaylord, Goodenow, Goodrich, Grey, Grow, Hascall, Haven, Hendricks, Henn, Hillyer, Horsford, John W. Howe, Thomas M. Stephens, Stone, Sweetser, George W. Thompson, Townshend, Tuck, Walbridge, Ward, Washburn, Watkins, Welsh, and Wildrick—64.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. ORR moved that the House do now adjourn; upon which question tellers were demanded and ordered, and Mr. ORR and Mr. FOWLER appointed. The question was taken, and the tellers reported—ayes 74, noes 59.

So the House adjourned to Tuesday next.

PETITIONS, &c.

The following petitions, memorials, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

On the motion of Mr. ATCHISON, it was

MILITARY ROADS IN IOWA.

Mr. JONES, of Iowa, submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of constructing a military road from Dubuque, in the State of Iowa, to Fort Dodge, in said State.

Mr. JONES also submitted the following resolutions; which were considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to communicate to the Senate such information as may be on file in the War Department relative to the construction of a military road from Fort Dodge to Dubuque, in Iowa; and that he inform the Senate what the cost has been for the transportation of the munitions of war, provisions, &c., used at said fort, from the usual place of deposit upon the Mississippi river.

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be also directed to communicate to the Senate a plan and estimate for the construction of a military road from Dubuque to Fort Dodge, and the amount necessary to pay for the survey and estimates for such road.

GEOLOGY OF IOWA, WISCONSIN, AND MINNESOTA.

The following resolution, submitted by the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. Dodge,] came up in order for consideration:

Resolved, That five thousand five hundred copies of the report of Dr. D. B. Owen, on the geology of Iowa, Wisconsin, and the Territory of Minnesota, together with the maps, illustrations, &c., be printed; and that five hundred copies be delivered to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, two hundred copies to Dr. Owen, and three hundred copies to the Smithsonian Institution.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That resolution was passed over the other day at my instance, and I am so very hoarse now that I do not know that I can speak upon the subject at all; but I want to make a suggestion to my friend from Iowa, [Mr. Dodge.] I perceive, from the wording of the resolution, that the printing is to be done in the quarto form. All the printing that has been done heretofore has been done in the octavo form. By departing from the mode of doing the printing, if I am correctly informed, you will leave the printer at liberty to make his own charges, without any regard to the past action of Congress on that subject. This proposal seems to me to be a departure from the mode which we have heretofore adopted in relation to printing. If we pursue it we shall order a thing to be done in a new mode, and there will be nothing to govern us in fixing the compensation. I think our past experience ought to have shown us that this mode is not the right one. I desire that this matter shall be referred to the Committee on Printing. According to my experience on subjects of this sort, there will be a great many plates, diagrams, and engravings. I recollect having looked into the subject a year or two ago, and the amount paid for engravings in a report from the Patent Office was such as to astonish me. I believe it amounted to some thirty or forty thousand dollars for a single volume.

If we adopt a resolution of this sort, changing the form in which the printing is to be done without knowing anything of the number of diagrams or plates which it may be necessary to print, we shall do it in ignorance of the amount of the cost. I therefore think it would be prudent—and I make that motion—to refer this matter to the Committee on Printing, that that committee may make an investigation of the whole subject.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. I do not object to the reference of this resolution to the Committee on Printing, though the number stated is precisely that which was ordered to be published of Foster & Whitney's report. This document was ordered to be published at the Executive Session of the Senate, commencing the 4th of March, 1851, by a resolution which I offered at that time. But as it is proposed to publish it in a new form, and as I am anxious that it shall be published in that form, (that being the form recommended by Dr. Owen,) and as the Senator from Kentucky has made some observations in reference to the matter, I hope the resolution will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

The question was then taken on the motion to refer, and it was agreed to.

PRINTING OF THE CENSUS RETURNS.

The following resolution, offered by Mr. BRIGHT, was taken up for consideration:

Be it resolved, &c., That the Joint Committee on Printing be directed to contract with Donelson & Armstrong for printing the Census returns, upon such terms as they may deem reasonable.

Mr. SMITH. As this is a subject of very considerable importance, and as it will involve an appropriation to the amount of several hundred thousand dollars, I should be very sorry to have it brought under consideration, and receive its disposition at our hands while the Senate is as thin as it is at the present time. I have no disposition to throw any obstacle in the way of the consideration of this question; but I desire to take the opinion of the Senate—of the entire body—upon it. There is very little more than a quorum now present; and I would suggest to my friend from Indiana, that the consideration of the resolution had better be postponed until after the holidays, and at an early day next week I will be prepared to submit to the Senate such suggestions as I may deem proper. I therefore move that the subject be postponed until Monday next, when I will be prepared to have it taken up, and disposed of at as early a day as possible.

Mr. BRIGHT. It will be recollected that this resolution has been the standing order of the body for the last ten days. I refused to call it up on one occasion, when the honorable Senator from Connecticut objected. He alleged that he would be ready, on the morning following, with an amendment. There is an urgent necessity for acting on this subject. A part of the returns of the census are ready for delivery, and ought to be in the hands of the printer. I dislike to press it in the hands of the printer. I dislike to press it in the hands of the printer objects; but I can see no good reason for delay in the matter. The public contract which we have for the printing of this body does not cover this class of printing, and we have to dispose of it to other and different persons than those holding the contract. The joint resolution provides that the Committee on Printing shall contract with the gentlemen named in it, who are prepared to go on with the printing, at fair prices. I can see no objection to the resolution, and I hope it may be the pleasure of the Senate to take it up and act upon it now.

Mr. SMITH. I have already said to the Senate that we have very little more than a quorum present. There are only some thirty-four or thirty-five Senators here, and it is exceedingly doubtful whether there will be a quorum in the Chamber if we undertake to go into the discussion of this resolution. I have some suggestions to make to the Senate in opposition to its passage, and I hope to be able to satisfy the honorable Senator from Indiana that there are very serious objections to its adoption; but I am unwilling to address myself to only about one half the Senate. I believe it is very unusual to take up questions of this importance, involving the expenditure of some three or four hundred thousand dollars, if not half a million, when there is but little over one half the Senate present, to make a disposition—a final disposition—of them, so far as we are concerned. I wish to say nothing at present in regard to the character of the resolution; but it is a proposition to reverse what has been the policy of the two Houses of Congress during the last five or six years. Some four or five years ago we determined that the public printing should be divorced from the political presses of this city. It is now proposed to reestablish the connection which formerly existed. If it shall be the purpose of the Senate to reestablish that connection in the manner proposed by my honorable friend from Indiana—if that be the real judgment and opinion of the body—I for one shall not complain; because I have no objection whatever to the respectable and worthy gentlemen named in the resolution. But I wish the opinion of the entire Senate upon the subject. I am unwilling to be called upon to address the Senate on a subject of so much importance when there is barely a quorum present. I therefore feel it my duty to persist in the motion to postpone its consideration. I certainly do not desire any delay. I have come for three or four mornings in succession prepared to address the Senate on the resolution. But I trust those gentlemen who constitute the majority in this body will be willing to postpone the question until we have the Senate in its usual condition, with something more than a bare quorum.

Mr. BRIGHT. I understand the honorable Senator from Connecticut to remark that some four or five years since, this body proposed to divorce the printing from the public press of this city. The proposition was made and acted upon, and I ask him, and every other Senator, what has been the result? What has the sequel proved? That we have either not had the printing done at all, or done in a manner unfit to be put in our archives. The work proposed to be done by this resolution is important, containing statistics to which we shall want to refer in all time to come; and to print it upon paper of the character used under the contract system, and to have it done in the manner in which it is now done will render it valueless. This resolution is framed with reference to giving the work to responsible persons—persons who are ready to commence it, and to execute it, as the Committee on Printing may require. It is not an appropriation of money. The honorable Senator says that it will involve an expenditure of thousands of dollars. It is true that money will be expended, but it is to be expended under the direction of our committee, and one of them is a gentleman practically acquainted with the subject. The Census returns are soon to be presented, and hence I find an apology for pressing the matter now. I am willing to hear the Senator from Connecticut at this time, and I presume the body generally are ready to hear him.

Mr. PRATT. In my judgment we have not the necessary information to enable us to act upon this resolution. I notice that the Secretary of the Interior, speaking upon this subject in his report, says:

"With the view of enabling Congress to form a just estimate of the importance and varied character of the information derived from the late census, and of the admirable arrangement of the tables, the Superintendent has, with my sanction, caused the returns of Maryland to be printed for the use of the members of the two Houses. That State was selected, because, from its central position, and the character of its population, soil, productions, and industrial pursuits, its census presented the best illustration of the extent and practical utility of the information which has been gained.

"Another object was to furnish a specimen of the style in which, according to my judgment, it ought to be published. Such a specimen will be of great value in contracting for the publication of the entire work by furnishing a standard by which the contractor will be governed in regard to the paper, printing, and general style of execution."

I have seen a part of the proof-sheets of the publication which the Secretary of the Interior says he has caused to be prepared; but it has not been laid upon our tables; and I think the Senate should be informed of the extent of the printing, for which they are about to contract, before they authorize it to be done. The census of Maryland, which the Secretary proposes to exhibit to the members of both Houses, contains a short history of the State, and of each county in the State, the period at which it was settled, by whom it was settled, and a great deal of information of this kind. If the whole Census returns are printed upon such a basis, they will take up some twenty or thirty volumes as large as the Documentary History which is being published, some of which are in the archives of the Government, and involve the expenditure, I suppose, of half a million of dollars.

A SENATOR. Yes, more.

Mr. PRATT. Yes, or more. I do not know what the amount is to be; but ought we not to know what it is to involve before we direct the printing? If we publish a work of this character, ought we not to see the work itself, and form some judgment of its utility, before we direct the committee to contract for its printing? What is the resolution? "That the joint Committee on Printing be directed to contract with Donelson & Armstrong for printing the census returns, upon 'such terms as they may deem reasonable.'" What is to be printed? If it is to be a history of each one of the United States, and of each county in those States, giving the population of each, the period at which, and by whom, it was settled—if it is to be such a work as has been prepared in reference to Maryland, surely each Senator ought to examine it before we vote to have it published. If it is sufficiently valuable to be printed in this form, it should be done in the best manner, regardless of the cost. But for one I desire to see the work—to see the sample which the Secretary of the Interior says he is preparing to exhibit to us, which is now being printed, and which will be laid upon our tables. I desire that it shall be laid there, so that each Senator may examine it and know what it is.

Mr. HAMLIN. Will the Senator allow me to ask a question? I would inquire if the printing to which he has alluded has not been suspended? I have been informed, and I deem the information to be reliable, that from some cause the printing has been suspended, and that nothing is now being done in regard to the matter.

Mr. MANGUM. Perhaps I can answer that question. I had an interview with the head of the Census Bureau, and he informed me that this work was in progress now, and would soon be completed, and that it was impossible to form a just estimate of what expenditure would be required until that work should be laid before the Senate. I have no sort of objection to the gentlemen mentioned in the resolution. They would perform the duties as well as any others I have no doubt: I have no choice in that respect. But I do think before we embark in so large an expenditure, we ought to know something about it. I hope the Senator from Indiana will not press the immediate consideration of this resolution, in the absence of such information as would let us know what we are about to do. It has been said that half a million of dollars will be required. Sir, it will in all probability be three half millions—certainly nearer that amount than half a million. I hope we shall not take a leap in the dark. I hope the consideration of the resolution will not be pressed upon the body when there is scarcely a quorum present. At all events, before I give a vote affirmatively upon any proposition of this sort, I desire to know the probable amount of the expenditure, and this can be ascertained only when we have the work alluded to on our tables.

Mr. PRATT. I did not know that the work had been suspended. I knew it had been commenced, and I have seen some twelve or fifteen proof-sheets of the Maryland census of which the Secretary speaks. I should like to be informed, if it has been suspended, why it has. We want that information. I should like to know with whom the contract was made to print it; whether the printer under that contract is to be connected with the contract under this resolution; and whether the suspension has not been caused by the proposition contained in the resolution. I desire all this information before I vote upon the subject.

But my great object in rising was to ask the attention of the Senate to this point: If the work is to be published in the manner proposed by the Secretary of the Interior, we should examine it—we should see that it is a work of such a character as would do credit to the country before we order its publication. If it is to consist of the mere tabular statement of the census, as the last was, I should have no objection to any mode of publication which might be required. But if it is to be published in this extended form, according to the view of the Secretary of the Interior, and as it will be published if this resolution passes, I say we have not sufficient information in regard to the character of the work to vote understandingly upon it.

Mr. GWIN. I think the arguments of the Senators from Maryland and North Carolina justify us in passing this resolution now. If we get the information of which they speak, it must be through the committee. What does this resolution propose to direct the committee to do? To print the census. If they find it necessary to give this historical account of each State, they will come to the two Houses of Congress for instructions. This resolution simply provides for the publication of the census.

Mr. BADGER. What for? The census.

Mr. GWIN. What is the census taken for, if it is not wanted? Why was it taken, if not to make a portion of the permanent archives of the country? I want it printed at once. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MANGUM] says that it will cost several half millions of dollars. I should like to know if the postponement of it will make it cost any less. If we are going to print it, let us do it at once. Whether we print it under the contract, or give it to different individuals, let us do it at once. I think that the very information these gentlemen wish will come more properly through the committee than any other way. If the committee want additional power, or additional instruction, let them come to the Senate and House of Representatives for it. We ought to act on the subject, so that the printing may progress. In regard to the specimens alluded to by the Senator from Maryland, he seemed to intimate that they were probably printed in the office of the gentleman mentioned in the resolution.

Mr. PRATT. I did not say so.

Mr. GWIN. I take it for granted that they have had no agency in the suspension of the work. I feel confident that they have not. The object of the Senate should be to have this work printed, and an appropriation should be made at once. We have another special order for next Monday. If we postpone this resolution to that day, it may lead to its being put off from time to time. It seems to me that its postponement will only embarrass the Senate. I think we had better take it up and pass it, or amend it, now.

Mr. PRATT. I have been very singularly unfortunate, if the argument which I intended to make has proved the exact contrary of that for which I used it. What is this resolution? Is it that this committee shall inquire in reference to what is to be done, and what is to be published? Does it give to the committee the power to inquire? On the contrary it takes from the committee that power, and directs them to contract for the printing of the census, which the Secretary of the Interior has prepared. That book, that census, that which he has reported to the Senate as having been prepared as the census, is what this committee is directed to print. They have, under this resolution, no power to inquire. They are not instructed to inquire. The sole power proposed to be conferred by this resolution is to contract for the printing of that paper, which has been prepared by the officers of the Government as the returns of the Seventh Census. I apprehend, then, that I was not wrong in the argument which I made.

Mr. BADGER. The Senator from California seems to have fallen into a mistake—an evident mistake—as to the nature of the joint resolution which it is proposed we shall pass. He seems to suppose that we are merely to refer this subject to a joint committee of the two Houses; that that committee is to take some preliminary steps; and that, after the joint resolution passes, we are to have some control over the subject. But the effect of it is to put the committee in the place of Congress as to the disposition of this printing. They are to make the contract; they are to make no report to us; they are to get no further directions from us; their contract is not to be sanctioned by us. When made by them, it is a contract of the Government. The Senator said that the census returns ought to be published; that they are wanted—that they are needed. I asked the Senator for what? What we are now considering is a mere question of time. Everybody admits that they ought to be published; but I desire to know where is the necessity? What public purpose is to be served by having them printed now? What public injury will be sustained by delaying the publication a week? That is all that is asked. It is impossible to assign any reason why there should be such hot haste in the publication. Surely, they ought to be published; and that in a reasonable time. But they ought to be published in such a manner as to do credit to the country, so as to perpetuate in the best manner the materials contained in the returns. But they ought to be published with some reasonable care, that there shall be no unnecessary expenditure; and particularly in passing this joint resolution for the publication of the census returns, we should, as has been suggested by my friend from Maryland, [Mr. PRATT,] not turn the Superintendent of the Census Bureau into a historiographer, and biographer of the United States, and of all the counties in the States thereof—for I presume that this must contain information as to "the first families" in those parts of the United States where they are so fortunate as to have first families. I think we have a right to have some little time to inquire into this matter.

But again, Mr. President, I ask you, if such a thing has ever been known since you have served in the Senate—certainly it never has to my knowledge since I have been here—of a measure of considerable importance, involving the expenditure of money to the amount, as some gentlemen say, of a million and a half of dollars, being hurried through this body during the Christmas holidays? Again, the Senator from Connecticut says he desires to be heard upon the subject of the resolution. He gives his reasons why; though ready himself, he has not had an opportunity heretofore of being heard. He wishes to be heard by a full Senate, and not by a body consisting of little more than a constitutional quorum, and he asks the indulgence of the Senate for the postponement of this subject until the day following our next meeting. I ask you, sir, if, in your experience of the proceedings of this body, such a request at this season was ever denied to any Senator? This resolution is an important one besides and beyond the amount of public money which it is proposed to expend. I confess, that to me the amount of the expenditure is not the primary consideration. If this work be published, I wish it to be published well; I wish those who print it to be well paid for their work. But this involves another question—namely, as to our diverting from, and ultimately subverting, the system which has prevailed here of printing by contract.

I agree with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. BRIGHT] entirely in regard to the contract system. I am opposed to it. I have been willing for years to vote for a law or joint resolution to abolish it. Our experience in this body, as well as that of the other House, has shown that under it we get documents wretchedly published upon bad paper, with worse printing and still worse binding. For one, I am tired and sick of it. The publications are disgraceful to the body that has them published; and the probability is, that in most of them, in a few years, the ink will have destroyed the miserable substitute for paper, and leave them illegible. My mind has been made up on that subject, and I agree with the Senator from Indiana in regard to it. When this resolution comes up, I should be glad to see a provision appended to it for repealing the joint resolution or law under which the contract system exists. But if the Senator from Indiana considers for a moment, he will see that in order to have an expression of opinion which will be at all available, we should get it from a full Senate. I am not at all opposed to the printing of these census returns. I wish it to be done by competent persons, and I wish them to be well paid. I have no sympathy with that wretched policy which endeavors to save money to the Government by inducing people to come forward, and by competition make bids at ruinous rates, and either lose money or resort to the trick of foisting upon the public worthless and badly executed documents. I think it is unbecoming for us to obtain from any man his time and services for anything less than a fair equivalent. But at the same time I would suggest that this resolution should not be pressed at this time, if for no other reason, according to the usages of the body. The suggestion of the Senator from Connecticut, and the reasons he has assigned why he has not heretofore had an opportunity of being heard, ought to induce us to let this measure go over until our next sitting day. If the publication is delayed for ten days it will answer all the purposes for which it is intended.

Mr. GWIN. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BADGER] speaks of "hot haste." Is it not known to every Senator that this subject was brought to our attention near a year ago by the President or by the head of one of the Departments? Is it not known that it was pressed then, and that we should have acted on it then? Has not this resolution been before us almost from the commencement of this Congress? I do not think there has been any "hot haste" about it. The question presented is, whether we shall take this up and act upon it. If it is taken up now, as long as it is before the Senate it will postpone other special orders. The object which I have in view is to press the business of the Senate. I am not anxious to press the consideration of this resolution now, because there is a thin Senate; but I want it taken up, so that if it is not settled to-day, it may come up from day to day as unfinished business until it is settled.

Mr. BADGER. I think the Senator from California did not distinctly understand the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. SMITH.] He said that in consequence of a cold he was not able to address the Senate to-day.

Mr. GWIN. I certainly did not hear that. But all that I have to say is, that I want this resolution taken up for consideration, so that it may be taken up as unfinished business at the next meeting of the Senate.

Mr. BRIGHT. I certainly did not understand the honorable Senator from Connecticut as objecting to the consideration of the resolution on the ground of his inability to address the Senate to-day. I should not have pressed this matter, if I had so understood him.

Mr. BADGER. I understand that my statement was a mistake. It was the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. UNDERWOOD,] and not the Senator from Connecticut, who pleaded indisposition.

Mr. BRIGHT. I am not disposed to press the consideration of this subject on a thin Senate. I do not desire this resolution to pass unless it has merit, and unless it ought to pass. I introduced it at an early day of the session, believing that it was important that the work should be entered upon. It will be a very voluminous work. It will require time; and it will require the expenditure of a large sum of money, but nothing like the sum named by the honorable Senator from Maryland, [Mr. PRATT,] and the honorable Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. MANGUM.] The cost of the printing of the last census amounted to less than $200,000, and I feel authorized to say, on inquiry which I have made, that the cost of this printing will amount to less than $300,000.

The honorable Senator from Maryland inquires what it is we are to print. He thinks the gentleman who has charge of this subject ought to lay on our tables the forms of the returns. I understood him to say that there is a great deal of historical matter connected with the census returns which will be placed before us to be printed. The answer to his inquiry is to be found in the law of the last Congress. We are to print the enumeration of the inhabitants of the United States and such statistics as shall be reported by the committee appointed by this body to prepare the work. If the Census Bureau has collected historical matter relating to Maryland and other States of the Union not contemplated by the law, we clearly are not authorized to print it. This resolution merely directs the Joint Committee on Printing, who are presumed to know all about this subject, to contract at fair prices with the individuals named in the resolution for printing just such matter as Congress declared in express terms should be prepared—nothing more and nothing less. Hence there is no force in the argument that we should delay the consideration of the subject for the purpose of enabling this bureau to lay before us all the matter which they have collected. I am willing, however, that the resolution should lie over to next Monday.

After a brief conversation as to the proper course to pursue, the joint resolution was made the special order for Tuesday week, the 6th January, at half past twelve o'clock.

RECEPTION OF KOSSUTH.

A message was received from the President of the United States, by M. P. FILLMORE, Esq., his Private Secretary:

MR. PRESIDENT: I am directed by the President of the United States to inform the Senate that he has approved and signed the joint resolution of the two Houses of Congress entitled "A resolution of welcome to Louis Kossuth."

On the motion of Mr. SHIELDS, the President pro tem. was authorized to supply the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Mr. Foote in the special committee appointed under a resolution of the Senate, to wait upon Louis Kossuth on his arrival at the capital, and introduce him to the Senate of the United States.

The PRESIDENT appointed Mr. CASS.

The committee, therefore, consists of Messrs. SHIELDS, SEWARD, and CASS.

Mr. SHIELDS subsequently rose, and made the following report from the special committee:

The special committee appointed to wait upon Louis Kossuth on his arrival at the capital, and introduce him to the Senate of the United States, have had the same under consideration, and recommend that the same proceedings be pursued as in the case of General Lafayette, to wit: That the chairman of the committee introduce him in these words: "We present Louis Kossuth to the Senate of the United States." Upon which the Senators are recommended to rise, and the President will invite him to be seated.

JAMES SHIELDS,
WILLIAM H. SEWARD,
LEWIS CASS.

The PRESIDENT stated the question to be on the adoption of the report.

The report was adopted.

DESTRUCTION OF THE CONGRESS LIBRARY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter from John S. Meehan, Librarian to Congress, communicating information of the destruction by fire, on the 24th instant, of the books, paintings, statuary, medals, and other property of the Government, in the principal saloon of the Library of Congress; which was read, as follows:

LIBRARY OF CONGRESS, December 25, 1851.

SIR: It is my very painful duty to communicate to Congress the destruction of the books, paintings, statuary, medals, and other property of the principal Saloon of their Library, yesterday morning, by fire that originated in the room, in a manner to me altogether unaccountable, as no fires have been used in it for a long time, and no candles, lamps, or other lights, have ever been used in it during the whole time that it has been under my charge.

I have not been able to ascertain the precise number of the books that were destroyed, but believe that it may be estimated at about thirty-five thousand.

It is truly gratifying to have it in my power to add, that about twenty thousand volumes of books that were in the Law Room, and in the two rooms adjoining the Saloon of the Library, are safe. Many of these books belonged to the Library of the late President Jefferson, that was purchased by Congress in the year 1815.

They constitute the several chapters in the Catalogue of the Library, agreeably to Mr. Jefferson's classification, under the following heads: Ancient History; American History; Ecclesiastical History; Chemistry; Mineralogy and Conchology; Moral Philosophy; Law of Nature and Nations; the five chapters composing the law department of the Library; Religion; Politics, (including the science of Legislation, Political Economy, Commerce, Banking Statistics, &c.) part of the chapter on Architecture, and the entire chapter on Music; Dialogue and Epistolary; Logic; Rhetoric and Orations, and the Theory of Criticism.

I sincerely hope that the searching investigation Congress will give to the distressing event, which every lover of science and literature must deeply deplore, will lead to a detection of the causes that produced it, and to the adoption of means that will prevent, in all future time, a recurrence of the sad calamity.

With the most respectful regard, I have the honor to be, your obedient servant,

JOHN S. MEEHAN, Librarian.

To the Hon. W. R. KING,

A message was received from the House of Representatives by Mr. FORNEY, their Clerk:

Mr. PRESIDENT: The House of Representatives have passed a joint resolution authorizing an inquiry into the origin of the late fire, by which the Congressional Library was destroyed. Also a bill making appropriation to meet the expenses incurred in consequence of the late fire at the Capitol; in which resolution and bill they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The resolution was read a first and second time, as follows:

Joint Resolution authorizing an inquiry into the origin of the late fire, by which the Congressional Library was destroyed.

Resolved, That the Joint Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds be instructed to inquire into the origin of the fire by which the Congressional Library was consumed, on the 24th instant, and whether the same occurred from the negligence of any officer of Government, or person in the employment of either or both Houses of Congress, or from the defective construction of the furnaces or flues, or was the act of an incendiary; and also the extent of injury to the building, and the best mode of reconstructing the Library Room, so as to afford perfect security in the future against the like disaster, and report the facts to the House. The said committee shall have power to send for and examine, on oath, such persons as may have information touching the premises.

Mr. BADGER. I move to refer that resolution to the Committee on Public Buildings.

The resolution was so referred.

The bill was read the first and second time, as follows:

An Act making an appropriation to meet the expense incurred in consequence of the late fire at the Capitol.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the sum of five thousand dollars be, and the same is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended, or so much thereof as may be necessary, under the direction of the Commissioner of Public Buildings, in discharge of expenses incurred in the extinguishment of the late fire in the Library Room, the removal of the rubbish, and the preservation of such books and other articles as may have been saved, and the construction of a tin roof for the preservation and protection of the public building now exposed.

Mr. CASS. I have another section which I wish to add to the bill. It is a short section, simply that the sum of — (say ten thousand dollars) be appropriated to the purchase of a new library.

The amendment is as follows:

And be it further enacted, That the sum of — dollars be and the same is hereby appropriated for the purchase of books for the Library of Congress, to be expended under the direction of the Joint Committee on the Library.

On the motion of Mr. BADGER, the bill and amendment were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WHITCOMB, from the Committee on Public Buildings, to whom was referred the resolution authorizing an inquiry into the origin of the late fire, by which the Congressional Library was destroyed, reported it without amendment.

On the motion of Mr. WALKER, the Senate proceeded to consider the said resolution as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CASS. I regret that the resolution does not contain any provision about constructing the wings of the Capitol so as to render them indestructible. Our public buildings are constructed in a shameful manner. I wish to have an amendment inserted as to the construction of the wings, but I suppose that cannot be done without delaying the investigation. I am therefore willing to postpone it.

The resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. BADGER. I wish to ask whether if that joint resolution should pass in its present form, it would have to go to the President of the United States for his signature?

The PRESIDENT. If the resolution shall be passed in its present shape, it will require the concurrence of the President. The usual mode is to pass a concurrent resolution—the House to appoint a committee to act jointly with such committee as may be appointed by the Senate.

Mr. BADGER. That thought occurred to me. It seems to me to be a very great outrage that we should pass a resolution to inquire into a fire in our building in such a form that it cannot go into effect without the signature of the President of the United States. The resolution ought to be amended. It should not pass in its present form. I move to lay it on the table for the present.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CASS submitted the following resolutions for consideration:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed, jointly with such committee as may be appointed on the part of the House of Representatives, to inquire into and report the cause of the recent fire in the Capitol; and also, what measures it is proper to take to prevent the occurrence of a similar accident hereafter. And the said committee be also instructed to examine the proposed mode of construction of the addition to the Capitol, and ascertain whether it is intended to render the same fire-proof; and, if not, what should be done to secure it, as far as possible, from the danger of fire.

Resolved, That the Committee on the Library be instructed to examine and report what measures should be taken immediately to procure such books as may be most indispensable; and what plan it is best to adopt to procure a library, which, in its extent and in the character of the works, shall be sufficiently useful and honorable to the country.

The Senate then adjourned to Friday next.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, December 30, 1851.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. BUTLER.

The Journal of Friday last was read and approved.

Mr. GILMORE, of Pennsylvania, appeared to day, and, after taking the usual oath to support the Constitution of the United States, took his seat.

RECEPTION OF KOSSUTH.

Mr. CARTTER. I move that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, with a view of proposing a resolution in the committee. I hope the House will permit me, at least, to make a single remark. I wish to say that the friends of the resolution do not contemplate any action of the committee or the House towards opening this Hall to any harangues, but simply to carry out quietly an act of courtesy, the initiative of which the nation has already taken.

The resolution was then read, as follows:

Resolved, That a committee of five be appointed by the Speaker, to wait upon Louis Kossuth, and introduce him to the House of Representatives.

Mr. McMULLIN objected.

Mr. CARTTER moved that the rules be suspended for the purpose, and on that motion demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. I would suggest, that if the motion of the gentleman from Ohio prevails, the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union cannot take up that resolution. They can entertain no subject but such as has been referred to it.

The SPEAKER. That question is not now before the House.

Mr. McMULLIN. Is it in order to move a call of the House?

The SPEAKER. It is in order.

Mr. McMULLIN. Then I make such a motion.

The question was put, whether there should be a call, and determined in the negative.

The question was then taken upon Mr. CARTTER's motion, and resulted—yeas 103, nays 49; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Willis Allen, Allison, John Appleton, William Appleton, Babcock, Bartlett, Beale, Bissell, Bowie, Bowne, John H. Boyd, Brenton, Briggs, Buell, Busby, Joseph Cable, Lewis D. Campbell, Carter, Chapman, Chastain, Cleveland, Clingman, Conger, George T. Davis, John G. Davis, Dean, Disney, Doty, Durkee, Eastman, Ficklin, Floyd, Fowler, Henry M. Fuller, Thomas J. D. Fuller, Gaylord, Gentry, Giddings, Gilmore, Gorman, Green, Grow, Hascall, Hendricks, Horstford, John W. Howe, Thomas M. Howe, Hunter, Igersoll, Ives, John Johnson, Robert W. Johnson, Daniel T. Jones, George G. King, Preston King, Kuhns, Letcher, Mace, Mann, Edward C. Marshall, McDonald, Meacham, Miner, Mooney, John Moore, Nabers, Newton, Olds, Peaslee, Pennington, Perkins, Rantoul, Richardson, Riddle, Robie, Robinson, Sackett, Schermerhorn, Scudder, David L. Seymour, Origen S. Seymour, Skelton, Stuart, Snow, Benjamin Stanton, Frederick P. Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Stratton, Stuart, Sutherland, Sweetser, George W. Thompson, Thurston, Townsend, Tuck, Walbridge, Walsh, Ward, Washburn, Welch, Addison White, Wildrick, and Yates—103.

NAYS—Messrs. Abernethy, Aiken, Ashe, Averett, Barrere, Thomas H. Bayly, Biscoe, Bragg, A. G. Brown, E. C. Cabell, Caldwell, Churchwell, Clark, Culison, Dockery, Edmundson, Ewing, Fitch, Goodenow, Hall, Hamilton, Harper, Isham G. Harris, Sampson W. Harris, Haven, Hebard, Henn, Hilkey, Jackson, Andrew Johnson, James Johnson, George W. Jones, Humphrey Marshall, Mann, McMullin, Milson, Morehead, Murphy, Orr, Powell, Savage, Severy, Smith, Stanley, Taylor, Venable, Wallace, Watkins, and Williams—49.

So the rules were suspended, and the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, in the chair.)

Mr. CARTTER. I move that the committee take up the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk; and I ask that it may be reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The first business in order is the resolutions proposing to refer the President's message to the appropriate committees.

Mr. CARTTER. Did the Chair hear my motion?

The CHAIRMAN. What was the gentleman's motion?

Mr. CARTTER. My motion was to take up a resolution which I sent to the Clerk's table for the consideration of the committee as its first business.

The CHAIRMAN. The rule requires that the business shall be taken up in the order in which it stands on the calendar.

Mr. CARTTER. I move, then, to lay aside all other business, and take up my resolution.

The CHAIRMAN. The first business is the resolutions referring the President's message.

Mr. CARTTER. One of the subjects referred to in the President's message is the subject of my resolution. I move to take up that subject in the form of my resolution, and act upon it.

The CHAIRMAN. That motion is not in order.

Mr. CARTTER. Do I understand the Chair to decide that it is not in order to take up a subject embraced in the President's message which has been referred to this committee, and which is imbedded in the proposed resolution?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not in order to make that motion, as it is not the first business in order upon the calendar.

Mr. CARTTER. Well, then, I move to lay aside the resolutions relating to the President's message, with a view to take up my resolution.

The question being taken, the motion was agreed to, and the resolutions were laid aside.

The CHAIRMAN stated the next business in order to be the joint resolution authorizing the Architect of the Capitol to continue in employment the mechanics, laborers, and others employed upon the two wings thereof.

Mr. CARTTER moved to lay that resolution aside.

Mr. WALSH. I hope that resolution will not be laid aside, but will be acted upon at once. I am perfectly willing to do every appropriate honor to Louis Kossuth, and to extend to him a hearty welcome; but I think that our own people who are suffering, are entitled to precedence. I hope, therefore, that the motion will not prevail.

Mr. RICHARDSON demanded tellers; which were ordered; and Messrs. STANTON, of Tennessee, and CARTTER were appointed.

The question was then taken, and there were—yeas 85, noes 58.

So the resolution was laid aside.

Mr. CARTTER. I would now inquire of the Chairman, what orders have precedence of the resolution which I have submitted?

The CHAIRMAN. Nothing. The committee has disposed of the business referred to it by the House and now has nothing before it.

Mr. CARTTER. I now move the resolution which I have sent to the Clerk's table, and ask that it may be reported.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not in order. The committee has no business before it.

Mr. CARTTER. But I move this resolution as business, and I again call for its reading.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has informed the committee that, having disposed of the business referred to it by the House, there is no business before it, and it is the opinion of the Chair that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union cannot originate business.

Mr. CARTTER. I appeal from that decision, and I ask that my resolution may be read, in order that the committee may vote intelligibly on that appeal.

Mr. FICKLIN. I desire to inquire of the Chair, if a resolution cannot as well be offered before the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, as before a standing committee or any other committee?

Several MEMBERS. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has before stated that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union has charge of, and jurisdiction over, only such business as may have been referred to it by the House.

In reference to the standing committees of the House, the Chair is aware that the rule is different. The rules of the House prescribe the duties and jurisdiction of each of the standing committees, but do not prescribe the duty of this committee. The Chair, therefore, decides that this committee can originate no business. From this decision the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CARTER] appeals.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. I would suggest another reason why the decision just given by the Chair is a correct one, besides the conclusive one which the Chair has given.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I object, unless there is to be an opportunity granted for reply.

Mr. BAYLY. I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is out of order. There is nothing before the committee except the appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. BAYLY. Well; I meant to debate that appeal.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I object to its being debated.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides that in the present case the appeal is debatable, although the Chair is aware it is departing from the general rules which govern the committee.

Mr. CARTER. I appeal from the last decision of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The appeal is not in order. Mr. BAYLY. I do not intend to detain the committee, but I do intend to say that I think the decision of the Chair is clearly right. This resolution proposes to raise a select committee. Now, the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union cannot raise such a committee. It is, of itself, only a committee. Such a committee as the resolution contemplates can only be raised by the House itself.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I must say that it seems to me the position taken by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BAYLY] is a very singular one. It is true that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union cannot appoint a committee. This resolution, however, proposes no such thing. It proposes only to recommend to the House the appointment of the committee.

[A message was here received from the President of the United States, announcing that he had approved and signed a joint resolution providing for the printing of additional copies of the Journals and other documents.]

Mr. C. continued: I was about to say that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union can recommend to the House the passage of any resolution or bill which any other committee can recommend; and it can originate a resolution such as any other committee might originate—for the appointment of a committee, or for any particular purpose. We have repeatedly had recommendations for the appointment of committees upon particular subjects, emanating from the standing committees of this House. They report their recommendations to the House, but the House adopts the resolutions and appoints the committees. If the Committee of the Whole should pass this resolution, it will not undertake to appoint the special committee. The resolution, in the event of its passage, will be reported to the House; and if the House then adopts it, the Speaker will appoint the committee. Its appointment will be the action of the House, and not of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. I think, therefore, that the Chair will not hesitate to decide this question—if it be a matter of division—that the committee have the right to recommend this resolution to the House. This very subject (I mean that of Kossuth) has been referred to this committee, among various others, in the President's message. We all know that it is the practice of this committee, when various subjects are referred to it in the President's message, to report upon one part of that message on one day, and upon another part on another day. We are not obliged to make one report only upon that message. I submit, therefore, that, as the President's message is now before us, and as this subject is embraced in that message, we have the right to take this subject up, and report this resolution to the House.

A MEMBER. It is not before the committee.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I understood the Chairman to decide that it was before the committee.

Mr. BAYLY. It has been laid aside.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Then we can take it up again. I make this point, that as there is now no business regularly before the committee, it is competent for us to take up any business which has been submitted to the committee. The fact that it has once been laid aside is no reason why we may not take it up again.

A MEMBER. We have not laid aside the President's message; we have only laid aside one resolution connected with that message; it is in our power to take up any other resolution relating to it.

Mr. CLINGMAN. That was precisely my understanding. If the facts are as stated by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. BAYLY,] we can take up the subject again; but if it is already before the committee, why so much the better.

Mr. GORMAN. I desire to say just one word. It seems to me that the practice of the House justifies the introduction of this resolution. I understand that it has been the practice in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, on the principle of right, to report a resolution asking to be discharged from the further consideration of any subject. I understand the President's message—at least, the general subjects contained in it—is still before the committee. If so, it seems to me that a resolution relating to it, but contemplating no action in committee further than a report to the House, can be originated here. It seems to me it may be introduced (if I may be permitted to use the expression) by common right. As I understand it, this resolution, which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CARTER] proposes, is simply to refer the matter to the House. It is not to originate any new business—it is not a subject of legislative business to which it refers: it is a matter entirely within the jurisdiction of the committee, totally irrespective of any legislative action. That is my view of it.

Mr. OLDS. It seems to me that we have fallen into error in not considering the condition which this committee is now in. According to parliamentary law, the Committee of the Whole can act only with reference to such matters as are referred to it by the House; but the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union is not subject to such restrictions, because it has under consideration the state of the Union, and it is raised for the purpose of taking into consideration everything pertaining to the Union. And when you, Mr. Chairman, leave that chair, you are compelled to make a report to the Speaker different from that which you would make if you were chairman of the Committee of the Whole—not on the state of the Union. You are compelled to report that the Committee of the Whole have had under consideration the state of the Union generally, and specially the subject upon which the committee had been engaged. Let me refer to precedent. If I recollect aright, during the last Congress a gentleman from Wisconsin was allowed to introduce into the Committee of the Whole a bill to admit California into the Union, and he was sustained by the House. If you will go back and examine the practice of this House, you will find that in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, some of the most important war measures have been originated, and have been reported from that committee to the House for its action. It is different from the Committee of the Whole; it is the Committee of the Whole upon the state of the Union; and you have under consideration everything pertaining to the state of the Union; and therefore you can originate measures of this kind in it, and report them to the House for its action thereon.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the Committee of the Whole upon the state of the Union have originated any proposition?

Mr. OLDS. I so understand it. Certain it is that during the last Congress the gentleman from Wisconsin introduced a bill into that committee for the admission of California into the Union.

Mr. STEPHENS. That bill was introduced in connection with the President's message. It was never reported to the House as an original proposition; if it had been I undertake to say that it would never have been sustained by this House. There is not in the history of this country, a case in which the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union originated any matter. They could not do it, and have no power to do it. The committee has already laid aside the consideration of the President's message. If that message were now under consideration, the resolution in relation to Kossuth, in connection with that part of the message relating to him, would be in order.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. I do not think there can be any difficulty in regard to this question. It seems to be admitted on all sides that the President's message is before the committee. This resolution is pertinent to that message, and is therefore in order. Now, sir, the President's message is still before the committee, and we cannot discharge ourselves from the consideration of it. We have not attempted to do so. We have merely laid aside the consideration of particular resolutions in reference to that message, for the express purpose, as understood by everybody, of taking up this very resolution in reference to Kossuth—a subject which is referred to in that message. The message is still before the committee, and we can take up this resolution, or any other which is equally pertinent to the President's message. That is what we propose to do.

Mr. STEPHENS. That is not the question at all. I understand that the President's message has been laid aside.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. Not at all. But if it had been, we could take it up again for the purpose of passing this resolution, which is pertinent.

Mr. STEPHENS. When we take up the message, then this resolution will be in order.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. The President's message is still before the committee. This resolution is pertinent to it, and in taking it up, we take up that particular branch of the message. It is therefore perfectly in order, and in the hands of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The President's message was first before the committee. The committee by a vote laid the message aside, and it is not now under consideration. After all the business upon the calendar was disposed of by the committee, a proposition was made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CARTER] to introduce a resolution. The Chair decided that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union could originate no subject within itself. It could only act upon such questions as had been referred to it by the House. From that decision the gentleman from Ohio took an appeal. The Chair, for reasons first assigned, is still of opinion that the decision is correct; and for other reasons, he is confirmed in that opinion, and more strongly than before. By referring to the 134th rule, it will be found that it is provided that the rules of proceedings in the House shall be observed in a Committee of the Whole House, so far as they may be applicable—except the rule limiting the times of speaking—and no member shall speak twice to any question, until every member choosing to speak shall have spoken. Now one of the standing rules of this House is, that no member shall introduce a resolution or make a proposition except by unanimous consent, or when the States are called for resolutions. That rule, then, is applicable to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. Suppose that this resolution had been offered to the House, and objected to; no motion could have been made, under the rules, to suspend them for its admission, consequently it could not have been introduced. A motion could only be made on Monday to suspend the rules, and this would be the only way, in the House, in which this resolution could be introduced upon any other day than Monday, except by unanimous consent.

Mr. STUART. I wish to inquire of the Chair how his decision, that this appeal is debatable, can be sustained; it being an appeal founded upon the order of business?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair stated, when this appeal was taken, that it was a new question, and for that reason he would decide that it was debatable. The Chair is now perfectly clear that the decision appealed from is right. The Chair has no pride of opinion about it, and is perfectly willing that the committee should overrule it, and say what shall be done.

[Cries of "Question!" "Question!"]

Tellers were demanded and ordered, and Messrs. VENABLE and CARTER were appointed.

The question was then taken, and the tellers reported—ayes 68, noes 80.

So the decision of the Chair was overruled.

Mr. CARTER. I now offer the resolution, that a committee of five be appointed by the Chair to wait upon Louis Kossuth, upon his arrival at the capital, and introduce him to the House of Representatives.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. I rise to a question of order. The point I make is, that special committees can only be appointed by the Speaker, unless the House order otherwise. This is a proposition to appoint a special committee by the chairman of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. I submit it cannot be done.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that the point of order raised by the gentleman from Virginia is well taken.

Mr. CARTTER. I will modify it by inserting the word "Speaker" in the place of the word "Chair."

Mr. FICKLIN. Change the phraseology so that it shall read that it be recommended to the Speaker to appoint a committee, &c.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I want to make a single suggestion. I fully concur with the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BAYLY] in the point of order raised by him. In my opinion there is but one plan by which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CARTTER] can attain his object. It is by recommending to the House the passage of a resolution to authorize the raising of a committee. That is the only way in which it can be done.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. I understand the object of this resolution is nothing more than a recommendation to the Speaker of the House. Every subject that comes before the House in the form of a bill, which is passed by the Committee of the Whole, is merely a recommendation to the House to pass this resolution. Before it passes it must first pass the committee. It is no more than a recommendation to the House.

Mr. HALL moved that the committee rise.

Mr. CARTTER. Is that motion subject to amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. I think not. [Cries of "Tellers!" "Tellers!"] Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. CULLOM, and KING of New York, were appointed.

The question having been taken, the tellers reported—ayes 44, noes 85.

So the motion that the committee rise was negatived.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio. Is an amendment in order now?

The CHAIRMAN. The resolution is not yet before the committee.

Mr. CARTTER. I ask that the resolution be now reported.

The CLERK then read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That a committee of five be appointed by the Speaker to wait upon Louis Kossuth, and introduce him to the House of Representatives.

Mr. CARTTER. The resolution is now subject for the action of the committee. I move the committee rise and report the resolution to the House, with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I do not understand the resolution is yet before the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair considers the resolution now before the committee.

Mr. STEPHENS. I object to the reception of the resolution, under the 136th rule, which provides "that no standing rule or order of the House shall be rescinded or changed without one day's notice being given of the motion therefor; nor shall any rule be suspended except by a vote of at least two thirds of the members present; nor shall the order of business, as established by the rules, be postponed or changed, except by a vote of at least two thirds of the members present." The 17th rule defines what class of persons shall be admitted upon the floor of the House. It is a downright breaking down of the rules of the House, if this resolution is entertained without one day's previous notice.

Cries of "Question!" "Question!"

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair concurs in opinion, individually, with the gentleman from Georgia; and but for the recent vote of the House overruling the decision of the Chair, he would sustain the question of order.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. This is another and entirely distinct point, and I call upon the Chair to decide it. I call also for the reading of the rules.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the committee suspended the rules, and are now acting without rules, as they intend to get the subject before the committee. [Laughter.]

Mr. STEPHENS. It then amounts to this—that we are in the midst of revolution. [Laughter.]

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. From that decision of the Chair I take an appeal.

Mr. CARTTER. I rise to a question of order. I understood the Chair to state that the resolution was before the committee for their action. After that decision of the Chair, and without an appeal being taken from it, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] first, and then afterwards the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. BAYLY] rise to questions of order as to the reception of the resolution in committee. Now, is it in order to do this after the committee have received it?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BAYLY] appeals from the decision of the Chair, deciding that the resolution was before the committee.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I wish to submit this to the consideration of the Chair, whether the 136th rule referred to does not apply to motions made in the House by individual members to change the rule, and not to reports of the Committee on Rules, or of the Committee of the Whole? The one day's previous notice is necessary on the part of an individual member, but not by a committee.

Mr. BAYLY. I will not embarrass this resolution in the Committee of the Whole, and will withdraw my appeal. I, however, give notice that I shall make all these points over again in the House.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio. Is it in order to move an amendment?

Mr. GIDDINGS. No. The question is upon rising and reporting.

The CHAIRMAN. The resolution is before the committee. The gentleman from Ohio proposes to amend the resolution, and it is certainly in order to offer any amendment the gentleman may think proper to submit.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio. I move to strike out all after the word "resolved," and to insert the resolution offered the other day by the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. CLINGMAN], embracing Governor Kossuth amongst that class of persons entitled to the privilege of the floor under rule 17th. My desire is to have a resolution adopted similar to the one passed in favor of another very distinguished friend of humanity, who came to this city about a year ago. I allude to Father Mathew. A resolution was passed simply giving to that distinguished man the privilege of this Hall.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. That was done by universal consent.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio. I hope there will be no objection in this committee to the passage of a resolution of that kind.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides the resolution of the gentleman from Ohio, offered as a substitute, is not in order, because it is upon a different subject, and proposes a change of the standing rules of the House.

Mr. MACE proposed the following amendment, viz: to strike out all after the word "resolved," and insert:

That the Speaker wait on Governor Louis Kossuth, and give him a cordial welcome, and introduce him to the members of the House of Representatives.

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. VENABLE proposed to strike out all after the word "resolved," and to insert as follows:

That the Speaker be authorized to invite Louis Kossuth to a privileged seat within this House.

Mr. VENABLE said: Mr. Chairman, I ask the indulgence of the committee whilst I submit a few remarks on the amendment which I have offered. For the distinguished stranger, whose advent has produced such a sensation, I feel all the sympathy which is due to one who has struggled, although unsuccessfully, for that national organization which suits his views of civil liberty. However I might differ with him as to what constitutes that liberty, I feel satisfied that in the struggle in which he has fallen he was sincerely contending for the constitution of Hungary. I regret, however, that I am compelled to remark, that this distinguished stranger has not sustained the high estimate which I had formed of him as a prudent statesman and a reliable patriot. I mean not to question the sincerity, but the practical reliability of his patriotism. Invited as a prisoner and an emigrant, he, before he reached the shores of England, became a propagandist. At Southampton, almost in hearing of the coast of Ireland, where the shrieks of the families of Mitchell and O'Brien had but lately rent the air, he eulogized the British Government, who had awarded to those patriots the fate from which the intervention of our Government had rescued him. Believing that there are no degrees in despotism, I did not comprehend the propriety or admire the taste of that eulogy. Since he has landed on our shores he has disavowed the character of an emigrant seeking an asylum in our country, but is an avowed propagandist of political heresy, so far as we are concerned—harmless, I admit, unless made mischievous by our indorsement. The coolness with which he announced in his speech to the New York Bar, that if Russia should disregard the policy of non-intervention which he recommended to our country, we must fight or be disgraced, left nothing to be disclosed as to his purpose or his policy. He has followed up that demonstration, until in Baltimore, recognizing a difference between the people and the Government, he calls for a pronunciamento as to the propriety of intervention should Russia interfere hereafter in the affairs of Hungary. Sir, I am opposed to any act which commits this Government to intervention in the disputes which embarrass and often convulse the Old World. Separated by oceans and by distance, the problem is left to us to work out, what can be done for human liberty by those who duly appreciate the principles on which it is founded? And here let me remind the committee, that there is a great practical evil in interference in the domestic affairs of other nations. He has read history with but little profit, and observed his own times without improvement, who has not learned that all communities who deserved and who could take care of civil liberty were in possession of that blessing. It is the natural result of a just appreciation of, and a determination to possess the full enjoyment of equal rights. Whenever the experiment is tried of making a people free before their time, it will result in compelling the reception of liberty by brute force—in the folly of sustaining the minority against the majority—which will be abundantly manifest when the assisting foreign force is withdrawn. It is a policy as unwise as that of furnishing a prodigal the means of wasteful expenditure. It is an undertaking in advance of the call of the people, and doomed always to disaster and defeat. Our own history teaches an important lesson. Three millions of people, scattered over a vast country, encountered and conquered the opposition of the most powerful nation on the globe.

A MEMBER. What if France had not interfered for us, would we have secured our liberty?

Mr. VENABLE. We were always free, and we fought, and fought successfully, against oppression in prospect—against the asserted right of taxation without representation. France interposed, but it was an act of war, so acknowledged and so regarded; and long were the dreary years before she exhausted the cup of bitterness the dregs of which she was compelled to drink, and which she had placed to her own lips. I do not believe that the havoc and the blood which mars and stains the history of France, from the commencement of the Revolution of 1790-'91, has resulted in any permanent good to human liberty or social rights. I rejoice that I am one who, four years ago, recorded my name amongst the forty-seven who refused to congratulate Europe and mankind upon the sudden appearance of the mushroom-republic of France, which has been in so summary a manner uprooted by the bayonets of Louis Napoleon. They have all the liberty which they can take care of—more would make them a nuisance to themselves and the world. I believed so four years ago, and ask no particular credit for sagacity in the conviction—time has demonstrated its soundness. But, sir, I repeat, all nations who desire and rightly appreciate civil liberty, acquire and preserve it, and are invincible in that cause.

[Mr. VENABLE was here interrupted by calls of "Question! Question!" from a particular part of the House.]

Mr. V. continued. Mr. Chairman, there are persons even in this Hall who, either from defective breeding or obtuseness of perception, place themselves beyond the pale of that courtesy which regulates the intercourse of gentlemen; and I can assure those persons who interrupt me by calls of

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

PUBLISHED AT WASHINGTON, BY JOHN C. RIVES.—TERMS $3 FOR THIS SESSION.

32D CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 1, 1852.

NEW SERIES....No. 11.

"Question! Question!" whilst I am in possession of the floor, that they only awake sensations in my bosom which it would be unparliamentary for me to designate in this House.

I would return, and remark, that we are not left to our own experience on this subject. I shall not go to the lore of Greek and Roman records. Look at Switzerland, surrounded by despotism, the object of hatred and the subject of assault: she stands like her own Alps, and, free as the winds which sport amongst her glaciers, unmoved and unsubdued. Her own Mont Blanc is not more fixed than the neutrality of Switzerland, because she understands and appreciates liberty, and is invincible.

I am unwilling to see our Government become a knight-errant in the great cause of national liberty and independence over the whole face of the earth. For this diffusive benevolence I have not much respect. Like other knights-errant, in the zeal to redress wrongs, there is no estimate of wrongs perpetrated. If Hungary is to demand our intervention, what shall we say to Poland, to Ireland, and to the revolutionists of Naples? Where will our mission end? I think the first and most obvious remedy for such a zeal would be the publication and diffusion of a cheap edition of the adventures of the Knight of La Mancha, familiarly known as Don Quixote. Sir, I, as a statesman and representative of the people, can neither encourage nor indorse the doctrines of Louis Kossuth in this country. I protest against any interference on the part of our Government, or its functionaries, as such, in the affairs of Europe, any further than they concern ourselves. I would reserve our remonstrances and our demonstrations for our own wrongs and insults, which are not wanting in the history of the present time; and I would refrain from giving the sanction of a representative of my district, to the opinions of one who demands intervention in the affairs of Europe, and calls upon the people to make pronouncements in his favor. I trust that my amendment may prevail, that the Speaker may invite the distinguished Hungarian to a privileged seat—such courtesy as Father Mathew and others have received—and leave him to the impression which speeches may make upon the public mind. Let all contribute who choose, but I protest against any act which seems to complicate our Government with the affairs of others who have no claim for our protection and no right to ask intervention. I am not afraid; but I know that the intermeddling in private life becomes contemptible, and it is equally true of nations. Let Kossuth be invited to a privileged seat, treated with due respect, welcomed with cordiality, and made free to come and free to go.

Mr. CARTER. I rise simply to say, that I did not desire myself to address the committee; and I trust we will not enter upon a general discussion of matters collateral to this resolution. I avowed the purpose, when I offered the resolution, that I introduced it simply as a peaceful act of courtesy, already made necessary by the previous action of this House and nation, and not for the purpose of bringing upon this floor any of the elements of discussion outside of this House. Although I would be glad, when the time arrives, to open the broad field of discussion that lies behind, yet, as foreign to this act of courtesy, I shall not do it at this time; and I hope that the committee will not do it. If we are to be involved in a discussion of the general topic, and that is settled, why I am ready to enter upon it, and the friends of the resolution are also ready. I hope the question may be taken, and the prevailing sense of the House realized. If it is adopted, I hope the act of passing it may be simply regarded as an act of courtesy on the part of this body, made necessary by the position in which it stands. That is all I intended. I hope, with this view, that the amendments may be voted down, and the original resolution passed, or defeated, without entering into any further discussion.

Mr. McMULLIN. Is it in order to offer an amendment to the resolution?

The CHAIRMAN. There is an amendment already pending. An amendment to the amendment might be in order.

Mr. McMULLIN. I desire to offer the following amendment, viz:

And that said committee also introduce to this House Colonel Scott Harris, and such others, now in this city, as were engaged in the late Cuban expedition, and who were taken prisoners by the Spanish authorities and have been since released.

[Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is not in order.

Mr. McMULLIN. Do I understand the Chair to decide that it is out of order?

The CHAIRMAN. I do.

Mr. McMULLIN. It is painful to my feelings to take an appeal from the decision of the Chair. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman take an appeal?

Mr. McMULLIN. I believe I will not. [Laughter.]

Mr. BROOKS. I intend to vote for the passage of the resolution of the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. VENABLE;] but I intend also to give the reasons why I vote for that resolution, because it often happens in this House that when votes are given, unless you seize the time of giving them, it is impossible to accompany them with any explanation. We are about to make a mark, a significant mark on the history of this Government; and while that mark is making, I desire to give the reasons why I aid in making it, and to accompany my vote with a translation. I do not intend that it shall be said, when I vote for this resolution, that I mean to intervene or interfere in the affairs of all this earth, not even of all this continent, or of any other continent. I intend merely to pay a political compliment to a political principle. While paying it I do not intend to pay it officially; I do not intend to pay it in behalf of this Government, but as an individual, as a citizen, as a member of our common society; for that reason and for no other. I cherish in my bosom a deep and warm sympathy for the political principles which not only Kossuth, but O'Brien, Meagher, Avezana, and Garibaldi, and others on the Continent of Europe, have contended for. The tribute of my heart, the tribute of my warm desire for their success, the force of the example which this country can set by peace and quietude, and by a good example—all these I am willing to give; but I stand, as a Northern man, upon one ground, upon one political principle, that is, non-interference with other people's affairs; and upon that breakwater alone can I defend myself from the surges which rise up around me, and which seek to deluge portions of this country, as well as other governments over sea. If once this Washington principle of non-intervention or non-interference with other Governments can be broken down, I see no land ahead, nay, nothing but a dark and stormy sea before me. If interference with other States or other people is ever to become the rule, or a leading principle in this Government, has it never occurred to gentlemen that it will not stop in Europe, but begin on this continent, and perhaps first in this country, in intermeddling with, and revolutionizing the peculiar organization and institutions of a portion of our own complex society? I am quite sure the thought has occurred at least to one gentleman I see before me—the shrewd, keen-eyed gentleman from Ohio, whose zeal and whose energy to-day, though a member of the peace society, in the general cause of war, can only be accounted for by his determination to break down the barrier of non-intervention and non-interference that stands between him and the society and governments of large portions of this country.

While preaching peace, bringing peace propositions within this Hall, denouncing all of us who will not vote against armies, and clamoring against all of us who are ever for war, even for just war—I see him anxious to-day, with others of his class, to sally forth upon the general principle of intervention and war—bella, horrida bella, with universal creation. I protect myself from the surges of social and domestic intervention which that gentleman and those who act with him would raise about me when they are clamoring for the principles of universal liberty—liberty for all races, all colors, and all breeds, by saying, "that it is my duty as a peaceful citizen, living within my own Government, to attend to my own business and concerns, and let other people attend to theirs." I am no Peter the Hermit. I have no chivalrous mission to go forth and enlighten the whole earth. I will not take my little candle and walk among the powder-magazines of all mankind and set those magazines on fire, and then rejoice at the general and glorious explosion. I defend myself from that gentleman and his associates when they assail our own State governments, and clamor for universal liberty, by the general declaration, that it is none of my business what is done in other State governments than my own—that I am opposed to intervention of all sorts. Attend to your own concerns, mind your own business, take care of your own household affairs, is the primary duty of a nation as well as of a family or individual. This, I am sure, is the duty of a good citizen and a good legislator. If we once lay down and establish the principle that this Government has a right to interfere and intervene and take up arms against slavery in Hungary, or any other portion of the continent of Europe, there stand in my own State more than a million of human beings who cry, "that there is no slavery on God's earth so horrible as the chattel slavery of the Southern States, and that our first duty, before we arm ourselves against European despots, is to seize the cannon, the musket, the torch, and the firebrand, go across the Potomac, and set fire to the whole southern country at once." I do not stop to discuss this question with such people theologically or economically; but constitutionally, I say Southern slavery is none of your business; you have no authority over, or right to interfere with it. If ever, then, this principle of non-intervention in the affairs of other people is broken down, it is in vain for me, and those who act with me, to attempt to resist the universal crusade which will sweep us, not towards Europe, but across the Potomac into the whole Southern country.

This Government was formed for peculiar and special purposes, and for none other. It was made a limited Government especially to make us attend to our own concerns. Nowhere in our Constitution can the power be found to intervene in the affairs of other nations, in Europe or on this Continent; and when such a thing in Genet's day was attempted, both Washington and Jefferson put it down. We can only protect ourselves and our institutions by that humble primary maxim of minding our own affairs.

I know, sir, that this is no popular speech of mine. It will bring me no cheers and secure me no votes if I desired them, and make me no friends where this excitability exists, and especially in the combustible city which I in part represent. It may be the popular excitement will for a moment sweep a man away. The hearts of my people are warm, and for a time their passions may run away with their heads; but when their judgments cool, and reason seizes the rudder again, the man who has done right, and fearlessly right, on all and every occasion, will in the end receive the popular support and the popular applause. I may be overthrown. I may be a victim to the resistance which I make to the wild passions which are hurrying on this country towards intervention in the affairs of the whole earth—toward universal war. I submit to the sacrifice. I care not what becomes of myself. I did not intend to vote for the resolution; I should not have uttered a word. But this translation must go forth with my vote; and when Kossuth reads—if he condescends to read—my humble vote upon this resolution, he will see in the translation to that vote, that however we may open our hearts to him; however we may cherish his principles, all we mean is sympathy, welcome, encouragement to him and his in their efforts to imitate our own bright and glorious example.

Mr. RICHARDSON obtained the floor, but yielded it to

Mr. GIDDINGS. I am astonished at the excitability of gentlemen on this floor. It would appear that no subject whatever can be introduced here but some minds will seize upon it and give it a connection with matters which are not legitimately connected with it. Most heartily do I concur with the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] in paying the tribute of my respect to this distinguished foreigner. I shall do it most cheerfully. The act is one simple in its character, and obvious in its tendency. But, sir, what right has the gentleman upon the present occasion to drag my name in and attempt to arraign me before this House and before the nation? Why attempt to charge me with a design of involving the nation in war? I have not uttered a word upon this question. I sat here in silence, without the remotest idea of mingling in this debate; and had I taken upon myself to address the committee, it would never have entered into my mind to connect this resolution with the question of slavery, as the gentleman has done, or to connect it with war, as the gentleman has wantonly accused me of doing. Far, far from my thoughts would have been such an idea, and I deny the right of that gentleman or any other, before I have spoken, to anticipate the positions which I should take, and arraign me before the House and before the country for those positions. Have I ever at any time hesitated to express my views openly, with perfect frankness, on any and on every question that has been presented to this body since I have had the honor of a seat in this Hall? I appeal with confidence to those who have served with me, to the country who have read my remarks and votes on every subject brought before us, against this unfounded, this ungenerous charge of the gentleman. My whole political life bears testimony in contradiction of it. Whenever a proper occasion shall present itself, I shall not hesitate to express my opinion on the subject of peace with other nations, and among all nations, in favor of universal peace. But I cannot be dragged into a discussion of those principles on a subject so unsuitable as that now before us.

What authority had the gentleman from New York, or any other gentleman, to charge me with inconsistency in relation to my avowed principles of peace? Certainly from nothing which I have said; nor from any vote which I have ever given. There is something most wanton in his charges. I surely had not provoked it at his hands. To him I would say, Your charge is unfounded and false; you have traveled out of your way to assail me; on those charges I will meet you most cheerfully at the proper time, or whenever the proper occasion shall arrive. The gentleman has spoken of popular sentiment, of which he appears to stand in great dread. I have no such fears. The popular mind is lighted by the intelligence of the people, and it will mete out justice, and no more than justice, to that gentleman and to myself. However much he may shrink from it, he must meet it. The gentleman appears now to tremble in view of the penalty of that "higher law" written upon the hearts of men by the finger of God. This law he has contemned and ridiculed. For the subversion of this law he has sent so many thousands of "lower law sermons" broad-cast throughout the free States. He must, however, meet the penalties of the popular will; he may fear and tremble and turn pale at its approach. It must come; he cannot avoid this supreme law, before which we must all bow. It is already inflicting its penalties upon him, and ere long will consign him to the charnel-house of political apostates.

Mr. Chairman, while on the floor I will take occasion to say that I shall most cheerfully and most heartily vote for the resolution. I wish to tender to the distinguished Kossuth not merely the homage of my own heart, but I wish this House, the representatives of the people, to do it officially, in the name and on behalf of the nation. For this reason I wish to see this resolution pass, and that speedily. I decline all attempts to drag me into a discussion of its merits; they will be appreciated by the people without any aid from us.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I was proceeding to say before yielding the floor, that I did not think there was much difference between the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. VENABLE,] who proposed this amendment, and the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. CARTER,] who submitted the original resolution; and it is for that reason that I am willing to vote for the proposition of either of those gentlemen. But I am unwilling to go any further. I perfectly concur in the sentiment which has been expressed by gentlemen who have preceded me in this debate, that we should not commit this country to war for any people except our own. I have read with a great deal of pleasure some of the speeches of Mr. Kossuth, and some of them with much less pleasure. If it is to be a struggle as to who shall rule in Hungary—if it is to be a question as to the independence of that people, and not a question of the elevation of the masses, then it is a matter of utter indifference to me. I do not care who shall govern in that country. But if it is a struggle for the freedom of the people, they have my sympathy, my wishes, and my prayer for their success. If it is to be a question of power, as to whether this man or that man shall govern the country with despotism, it is a matter, as I have said, of utter indifference to me. But, sir, I trust, I believe, I hope that the struggle has been to give liberty to the masses; and, believing that, I am willing to tender to Kossuth, as the representative of that country, the hospitalities of this. But I am not to be deterred from giving this vote because heretofore we have not been successful while expressing our sympathies for the millions of France, in securing their liberty. The liberties of the people of France have not been placed in proper hands, and they will fall in Hungary if they fall into similar hands. Whatever else may be done or accomplished in France, one thing has been accomplished: the divine right of kings to rule has been broken and destroyed.

We have heard a great deal said about peace and war, but, as I have said before, if this country is to be involved in a war, I want it to be on her own account. I never wish to see an American army guided by a power alien to us. I never want to see a war carried on except by the direction of our own legislation. I wish to see the American people carry it on under their own guidance and for their own purposes; otherwise that flag which has never trailed in the dust may be humbled. And I am unwilling, while I extend freely the hospitalities of the nation, and the hospitalities of the individuals of the nation, to Mr. Kossuth, to commit the nation to a policy until I know what that policy is. I repeat, if the struggle in Hungary is for the ascendancy of the individual who is to control, and not for the elevation of the masses, it is a matter of utter indifference to me whether they succeed or not; but if it is for the liberty of the masses, they have my ardent hopes and my best wishes for success.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. I do not regard the resolution before this committee as committing this Government to the doctrines which Kossuth has been attempting to propagate in the speeches he has made since his arrival upon our shores. If I so regarded it, it would not receive from me the feeble opposition which it will now encounter at my hands. On the contrary, if I regarded it in any such light, I should esteem it a solemn duty to my country to resist it with every energy with which God has endowed me. My opposition to the resolution is not of that high character; if it were, the resolution should never pass so long as opposition could delay it. If this Government should ever connect itself with the principles which Kossuth has been attempting to propagate, it would be to give it such a blow as it has never yet received, and which our liberties could not for any length of time survive. It would commit this Government to a course of policy which we have no constitutional power to carry out. I shall not attempt to elaborate this view of the matter at the present time, but I shall feel it my duty upon a proper occasion to go into it more at large. But I desire here, to say that I do not regard this Government as altogether blameless in its conduct in reference to Kossuth. There is evidently a misunderstanding between him and us. He obviously regards the Government as, in some degree, committed to his doctrines; and the Government ought not to allow this delusion to continue: if it does, it may involve humanity in Europe in an extent of suffering such as is not anticipated.

Suppose this delusion is permitted to continue upon his mind; suppose this Government does not, in some emphatic manner, repudiate his doctrines, and with the expectation of success from us, Hungary should again rise and she should again be put under the iron heel of despotism, and this Government should fail to interfere, as we all know, and with absolute certainty, that we should do, shall not we in a degree become responsible for the suffering and calamities which that people would be subjected to in consequence of permitting them to continue under the delusion which Kossuth is obviously now laboring under? If my counsel can prevail, he will not leave this country until there is a distinct understanding between him and this Government; such an understanding that nobody in Europe, or anywhere else, shall be deluded into acts with any expectation of success from us. There ought to be a distinct understanding. He is clear and explicit in what he asks; we ought to be equally so. I do not understand this resolution as committing this Government at all. My opposition does not grow out of any such impression; it is based upon this: I think we are offering an extent of adulation to Kossuth which his antecedents do not authorize. I have a feeling in respect to this adulation growing out of another circumstance, and a feeling which I confess has touched every patriotic impulse of my heart. Sir, Kossuth is not the first man who has fallen in the fight for liberty in Europe who has visited our shores. About 1793, I think it was, when the fires of liberty were burning in this land with a brightness with which they do not now burn; when the patriots of the Revolution were still living; when our Washington was still among us, Kosciuszko, with whom I will not undertake to compare Kossuth, because it would be doing injustice to the dead; Kossuth, who fell in the defence of the liberties of Poland—

A VOICE. No! Kosciuszko.

Mr. BAYLY. Did I say Kossuth? Of course I mean Kosciuszko; I meant that man of whom when he fell the poet said: "Freedom shrieked when Kosciuszko fell." His merits as a European patriot, I undertake to say, were at least equal to the merits of this man; death has canonized him, but I canonize no man until death has sealed his character. But his claims upon our gratitude did not stop with his claims to the title of "friend of freedom" in Europe. He was the companion in arms of Washington, and aided in achieving those liberties which we now enjoy. But when he came here and went hence, he received none of those adulations which are so lavishly poured out upon Kossuth. When I contrast the reception of that man upon his arrival upon our shores with the reception which it is now proposed to give Kossuth, I confess I look upon it not entirely without feelings of mortification and shame.

But, Mr. Chairman, when I took the floor, I did not design to go into this matter to the extent which my feelings have carried me. I wish to say here, and desire that it should go forth to the country, that from an intimate association with members of the two Houses of Congress, and having made it a frequent subject of conversation with them, I here assert—and I hope it may meet Kossuth's eye—that I do not believe there are twenty members in both Houses of Congress who would be willing to sanction the doctrines he has attempted to propagate in this country. And if there are those who are carried away by the enthusiasm which is running through the land, who will for a moment fall in with it, either from motives of popularity-hunting, or from other motives—I say, if there are twenty members of this Congress who are prepared to give way to that feeling—which I am quite sure is not the case—I believe that nineteen twentieths of the American people are the other way. From where I am now standing to the Rio Grande, I do not believe there are one thousand men of substance and character—men whose opinions upon matters of this kind are regarded with respect—I do not believe that one thousand men of this character can be found who would be willing to commit this Government to a policy which would involve us in an eternal strife between European Powers—which would bring upon us standing armies, heavy taxation, and national debts, such as are now pressing down the nations of Europe, and a greater part of which have been incurred in wars waged to carry out this very doctrine of intervention, or non-intervention, whichever you are disposed to call it. If our Government were to become wedded to this policy, I repeat, I do not believe our liberties would survive twenty years; and I believe this is the opinion of the American people. Upon this mere incidental motion, which I do not regard as committing the House to anything, I shall not go into this debate fully. I shall do it hereafter. I have only said what I have said with a view, if possible, of commencing that understanding between this Government and Kossuth, which, I think, ought to be perfected; and which, if I can have my way, will be perfected before he leaves these shores. He shall be told, in language which he cannot misunderstand, that this Government has no idea of involving itself in the policy which he so actively and industriously propagates.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky, said: I shall imitate the example of the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] so far as to send the vote I shall cast upon this question to the country, accompanied by the reasons which induce it; but, unlike the gentleman, I choose that my vote and the reasons therefor, shall harmonize with each other.

We are urged to pass the resolution offered by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. CARTER,] because it is said that the passage thereof is due as an act of courtesy, simply, to Mr. Louis Kossuth. We are told that it is intended as a mere personal courtesy; its introduction being accompanied by a disclaimer of any idea of committing the Government to a line of public policy. Mr. Chairman, I cannot be deluded by this disclaimer, nor by the want of pretension with which this act is heralded. We are here, not in the simple capacity of private citizens, or as a body of American gentlemen, only; we are here representatives of the American people—a constituted legislative body—a part of a constitutional Government; and whatever resolution we pass, is a governmental act, so far as we can manufacture a public act; whatever extent our act has, so far we commit our Government ex necessitate. Ah! but it is only proposed to introduce Kossuth to this House under the guidance of a committee appointed by the Speaker—no more. The gentleman from Ohio assures the House that he is as much opposed to “hearing a harangue” as any one can be, and that he contemplates no such result to flow from the passage of his resolution. Let me assure that gentleman, and this committee, that while his purposes are so praiseworthy, there are other gentlemen here who do contemplate the delivery of “a harangue” by the Hungarian chief, and who support the resolution because they expect to hear that harangue whenever Mr. Kossuth comes within this Hall. Let me assure the honorable member that the evidence is strong and persuasive that Kossuth himself expects to address this House, and that a few days since he sought temporary retirement from public observation, with the view of preparing the oration he expected to deliver to this Congress. Now, Mr. Chairman, I have more than the common stock of patience; but I confess that it has been exhausted by the manner in which this distinguished stranger has been treated by the people of the Atlantic cities, and by his “harangues” in New York, and thence to Baltimore, in presence of the multitudes and in reply to the societies which have addressed him. Sir, he is a man of genius, of talent, of wonderful oratorical facilities; but his sentiments are Quixotic, and especially they are not American sentiments, or calculated, by their impress upon the American mind, to promote the harmony and the happiness of this people, or the influence, and glory, and permanency of this Government. When I have read his speeches to the bar, the benches, the press, the people, and have remarked the care he has taken to teach that the lessons of our forefathers were crude, and can have no permanency as principles of national conduct, every drop of American blood in my frame flows faster with indignation at the estimate he must place upon American intelligence, and at the rapidity with which he uncoils himself under the warmth of our honest, hearty, and well-meant sympathy for him while chilled by misfortune. Look there at our own Washington, as his great image looks down upon this debate, and say whether it becomes us, as Americans, to hear within this Hall, sacred to the business of the people, an oration from a foreigner, the burden of which must necessarily be an attempt to unteach all that he taught; to loosen all the ties which his wisdom provided in our infancy as the guides of our manhood as a nation; to leave behind us forever the landmarks by which the vessel of State has thus far been steered through storms and tempest, and under this new pilotage to go careering over the sea in a crusade after the rights of humanity and the Utopia of universal liberty? I do not understand how, among well-balanced minds, there can be a difference of opinion as to our public duty in regard to this question.

Mr. Chairman, if this is an act of mere courtesy to which we are invited, then it is extravagant, under all the circumstances. Compliments, to be appreciated at due value, should be graduated by some standard. Precedent has furnished the standard by which the courtesy of an American Congress should, through all future time, be measured. There (pointing to the portrait of Lafayette) is the “token” of a man, the compeer and compatriot of Washington, to whom in his old age the United States designed to offer the very highest compliment they could bestow upon mortality. He had abandoned prosperity, the smiles of his sovereign, the adulation of a court, fortune, family, and had embarked his all in the struggle for American independence. He had bled freely in that cause. He had expended of his own means $140,000 to clothe our naked soldiery, and had from his own stores put shoes upon the bleeding feet of the American patriots who were fighting by his side through the Revolution. He was an adopted son of the Union. He understood the principles of our Government, because he was of the glorious band who laid the foundations of our freedom. He was the companion of Washington. He had illustrated his principles by a long career in Europe, ever devoted to the establishment of rational liberty. Congress, obedient to the national affection, invited Lafayette to leave his own homestead to revisit our shores that he might contemplate our growth and look upon the results of his own glorious services in our national development. When he came, the undoubted guest of America, Congress passed a resolution directing the Speaker to congratulate him upon his arrival, and to assure him of the satisfaction of Congress in being able to testify to him in person a nation's gratitude. He was introduced accordingly by a committee, and such honors paid as you now propose to accord to Kossuth! Are the cases parallel? Have we so fallen in love with Louis Kossuth that we are ready, without having any further acquaintance with him than is obtained through the mists of the Hungarian war and his own speeches, to pay him the same amount of honor that we offered to Lafayette, and more than we have accorded to Kosciuszko, to Father Mathew—to any man of foreign birth, or to any hero of our own free clime? If you so cheapen what has been offered to Lafayette, abolish the grades of compliment and avow that your courtesy means as little as that of the Spaniard, whose usual salutation is to request his visitor “to hold all his host possesses at his own disposition.” The universality of your politeness will then render it alike valueless to all. Sir, it must not be forgotten that the compliment bestowed upon Lafayette, of an introduction to the American Senate and House of Representatives while those bodies were in session, is the only instance of the kind to be found in the history of this Government. It is the only instance to be found in the history of any civilized government since the middle ages. Roman consuls had ovations, and returned from conquests attended by crowds of captives to pass under triumphal arches amid the buzzes of the multitude. These did no more. Even these halted at the steps of the Senate house. When gentlemen propose this exalted and extraordinary honor, therefore, to Kossuth—I say extraordinary, since the precedent is nowhere to be found save in the case of Lafayette—I may be well excused for the inquiry as to the cause of this undue excitement in his behalf. Is his extraordinary merit testified by honorable scars received in the fields of battle upon the plains of Hungary? Did he suffer amid the snows of Szolnok, or nerve the Honvöds to stand the dreadful charge of cavalry? Sir, I do not mean to criticize his participation in the struggle of his country. I award him willingly all the merit of patriotism, though in my limited reading I have been so unfortunate as never to have ascertained in what battle his laurels were won. I remember well when Ujhazy—the glorious old Governor of Comorn—came to this country from the fields of Hungary, such honors as these were not proposed in his behalf. He, too, was identified with Hungary as surely as Kossuth. He was a patriot-soldier in the cause of his country, and had fought her battles valiantly and well. He was commended to our consideration as that chief who patriotically held the garrison of Comorn to the close of the campaign against vast odds, and made the terms of his surrender the passport to his expatriation. When the Iron Crown of St. Stephen had fled the limits of Hungary, Ujhazy found a new asylum in a land of real liberty, where he has settled to the peaceful enjoyment of life as a Republican farmer. Now, I respectfully ask why a different grade of compliment should be paid to this Magyar from the mark that Magyar received, admitting both to have been equally patriotic, and equally conspicuous in the cause of their common country? Why shall we pay higher honor to the orator for his advocacy of the principles of liberty, than to the brave old soldier who fought and periled all, and finally asserted the principle in the very terms of his most honorable capitulation to an overwhelming force and necessity? I have indulged in these remarks to prove to this committee that we are asked upon this occasion to go too far, mere precedents considered. But, sir, for one, I am not willing to leave this subject with a cloud of doubt upon it in another of its aspects.

We are told that Kossuth is the invited guest of the country; that Congress sent after him in a national ship; that since his arrival Congress has welcomed him to the capital, and now that he has actually reached the city, Congress is bound, in the exercise of an ordinary courtesy, to welcome him into this Hall, and that the members of Congress shall be personally introduced, &c., &c. Now, Mr. Chairman, I voted in the last Congress, if I remember correctly, to suspend the rules to consider the resolution in regard to sending the ship after Kossuth; but I have no recollection that I voted for the passage of the resolution. I may have done so; I have no memory of the fact. But there was an understanding in Congress at that day that the lives of Kossuth and his associates were in danger; that the Sultan was in jeopardy because of his noble determination to perform the sacred duties of hospitality; that Austria wished the delivery of the exiles into her power; that Russia threatened to avail herself of this pretext to strike the long-meditated blow at the Ottoman Porte, and that, after all, and above all, that Kossuth was anxious to emigrate hither, and to follow Ujhazy and his companions to the far West, where the Magyar might plant his own vine under new and nobler auspices than he had yet known. In all these representations there was much to excite the sympathy of the American bosom. Sympathy for the exile from home and country is a common sentiment of humanity—an emotion of the savage as well as of civilized man. But here was a case of a patriot exiled from his native land, because he had contended for her freedom and her constitutional rights, not to say ameliorations, and we were informed that from his prison grates he looked wistfully to this great country, and probably depended upon our aid for his existence.

Sir, we did extend that sympathy, and actively too; but it was on the state of case already made out. When the flag of the Union floated from the quarter-deck of the Mississippi before the prison-house of Kossuth, and he saw its broad folds to protect him under the very Aegis of Liberty—when America was at Kilitiah to bear him from a dungeon to freedom, the cause of her intervention was distinctly announced in the preamble and resolution of Congress, which proclaims that Congress understood it was Kossuth's wish and determination, when released, “to emigrate to the United States.” Therefore it was the national ship was employed. Therefore it was the arm of this Government was extended to aid him to reach a shelter from the pitiless storm that pursued him, and to find here again a home and a country. I dare to aver no member of that Congress, at the time, dreamed of making Louis Kossuth the Nation's Guest, or of scenes through which we are now passing. Well, sir, in my opinion Kossuth was committed, by his acceptance of the conveyance furnished, under the character of a resolution that accompanied the offer of that conveyance, to the distinct acquiescence in the correctness of our supposition that it was his deliberate purpose, on being released, "to emigrate to the United States." When he came on board the Mississippi, it was in the character of an emigrant and of an exile from Europe. Who was to find upon these shores an asylum from oppression, and to raise here new altars to patriotism. If, then, Kossuth and Congress labored under mutual mistake as to the intentions of this distinguished character, surely, when we ascertained that his restoration to liberty was but the signal for his renewed activity in the field of European politics, all Christendom would have held us released from any further obligations springing from the exertion of our sympathy in his behalf. He availed himself of a very early occasion to announce that he did not intend to emigrate to the United States—that he was consecrated to the cause of Hungarian Independence, and that his mission was henceforth to preach that cause and to arrange the instrumentalities through which its success might be achieved. After these disclosures—even had he been invited hither as an emigrant—we should have been under no obligation to receive him as a political propagandist. His mission was distinctly proclaimed in England. He proclaimed it after he was free, and after he had abandoned the conveyance of the frigate Mississippi. Then we, as a people, and Kossuth were mutually released from whatever obligations to each other.

But, Mr. Chairman, the mission to which he has devoted himself brought him here, not our invitation—if it be still insisted that he was invited. True to that apostolical character he assumes, Kossuth commenced his labors in that mission immediately on his arrival at Staten Island. From his first speech there to this moment he has, on no occasion, failed to proclaim why he is in America; what brought him to America, and what results he expects to accomplish by his visit to America. He has accepted every demonstration of popular adulation, as an evidence of approbation of his doctrines. Emboldened by the passive submission of the people to these, his conclusions, and intoxicated by the more active and bold acquiescence in his political principles, by desperate politicians or mere holiday orators, he has at length commenced the work of polling the American population, in imitation of the mode adopted in the Hungarian comitats, making up an expression of the sovereign will of the people upon certain political propositions of his own propounding, which public will he is now bearing to the Government as testimony from the masses, to dictate future American policy! Methinks I can hear the sound and conservative voice of the interior, as it dwells with incredulity upon this insatiation—this folly. Yes, sir, it is a fact, that from the capital of Pennsylvania the programme of Kossuth has been returned to him, indorsed by the people, and he has proudly proclaimed the fact. In New York he directed a vote in a New York comital (God save the mark!) on the same propositions, and yesterday in the city of Baltimore, in a public assembly, with all the pomp and ceremony due to so imposing an occasion, and with a judge for his herald, the same profound propositions were again received with acclamations of popular applause, and adopted without contradiction!

These propositions constitute his published programme of principles whereby the family of nations is to be saved through the application of intervention, to enforce non-intervention. I shall not enter upon the discussion of these principles or of the policy they portend. I am not afraid of their adoption by my country. I allude to them now merely to indicate who it is—the character of the mission, and some of the virtues of the apostle we are called upon as an American Congress to receive here in our places with superlative forms of commendation, and compliment almost without a parallel in the history of civilized government. Mr. Chairman, it is worthy of remark that Mr. Kossuth enforces these (his) propositions with a strain of logic and oratory at once peculiar, and, to American ears, no doubt, felicitous. Not to go further back than to his speech in Baltimore, he tells our people that of all national policy, that which, in his opinion, is most important, is our foreign policy; that the foreign policy we have pursued from the era of the Constitution to the present time is "no policy at all," and that through the future our true policy is to be found in the programme of principles he has furnished, and which the people of Baltimore afterwards so clamorously adopted. He goes further. He says that the illustration of American policy heretofore, may be found in the economy of the silk-worm—"a poor, miserable insect," which wraps itself in its own self-woven web, from which it creeps only—to die. That America belongs to the family of nations, owes duties to the family of nations, or she may exile herself among the nations, and while she weaves at home a woof of comfort will, like the miserable insect in question, only come forth under the policy of Washington eventually—to meet death as a nation, consigned as a "miserable creature" to the contempt of those to whom we owed duties and from whom we withheld favors. Now, sir, this language and these illustrations are to my comprehension alike offensive and impudent. They explain the character of this foreigner, and serve to prove the folly of that popular adulation which has accompanied his progress so far on our Continent, in some places, Mr. Chairman, as observable in the case of a danseuse or a cantatrice as in the instance before us—to us, perhaps, not so remarkable, but exceedingly apt to intoxicate and mislead the deluded recipient of these bountiful ministrations. I am desirous to be distinctly understood upon this occasion. I listen with no patience to Mr. Kossuth, when he invites me to abandon the counsels of Washington, and to desert the ancient, time-honored, household gods of my own country, to follow him in the task of establishing those of Hungary, if need be, at the expense of war to the United States. I may be an admirer of the artist, of the eloquent advocate, of the enthusiastic patriot, of the knight-errant who preaches the crusade for Hungarian independence with all the zeal of Peter the Hermit,—I may be willing, as a private gentleman, to extend the courtesies and civilities due from an American to a distinguished stranger, and, indeed, may do him festive honors to testify "the passing noble emotions of the heart and the hour,"—I may be willing to the proposition of the member from North Carolina, which authorizes the Speaker to invite Kossuth to a privileged seat. But, Mr. Chairman, these duties of courtesy and these extensions of privilege are easily comprehended by the recipient and by the world.

I am unwilling to see the American Congress, as a legislative body, pass the resolution now before us. I know it will be the precursor of disturbance. I know it is the entering wedge for an order of things destructive of the stand we should occupy before our own countrymen. I am unwilling to turn this sacred Hall into a lecture room—a school house—where American statesmen may receive their lessons in political wisdom and be taught the propositions upon which are said to rest the prospective grandeur and the glory of the Union, from a foreigner who has not been yet thirty days upon our shores.

Mr. INGERSOLL remarked: It was with many regrets he had witnessed a discussion springing up on the resolution now before the committee. He had hoped that the bare announcement of the resolution of the honorable member from Ohio to this body would have elicited a prompt and universal response from all parts of the House; and coming as we do direct from the voices of the sovereign people of these States, we would respond to what he believed to be the wishes of that people, and award to the illustrious individual whose name forms a part of the resolution, that cordial welcome which, wherever he has gone, the friends of liberty have given him. He had witnessed with feelings somewhat akin to mortification, the course which the discussion of a resolution of welcome to Kossuth had taken in another end of this Capitol; and when he thought of the effect of that course upon the sympathizing friends of freedom in the Old World, and when he could almost hear the exultations of the minions of despotic and monarchical power when the news of that discussion shall have crossed the Atlantic and reached the ears of those despots who claim by "divine right" to awe into submission "their people," upon whose necks their feet are placed, he could almost bow his head in shame and sorrow. It had been his fortune, perhaps misfortune, to have spent the better portion of the last few years in a land of strangers to liberty and the rights of man. The greater portion of that period was spent within the dominions of that northern Autocrat whose hireling forces crushed the rising spirit of Hungary, and sent her illustrious leader a wanderer in other lands. He (Mr. I.) had witnessed the struggle and the defeat, (a temporary one, he trusted in God;) and knowing what he did of that struggle, and of the feelings in regard to it of the people of the patriotic State he had the honor in part to represent in Congress, he should be unworthy of a seat in that body, aye, of the name of an American citizen, could he hesitate for one moment as to his course of action upon the resolution now before the House. This was not, it seemed to him, the proper time and occasion to go into the history of the Hungarian war, the greater part of which Kossuth was. The time for speeches has passed—the time for immediate action has arrived. Kossuth is in our country, as he was before his arrival in the hearts of our countrymen. He is at our inner doors: shall we wound him in the house of his friends? How does he come here?—as an exile? Let gentlemen remember that a national ship received him from his exile in Turkey, and that before he put foot upon our shores he was received by a national salute—that salute fired from a national fortress—that fortress in the command of the Executive of these United States. Away, then, with the idea of Kossuth as an exile. No, Mr. Chairman, he is here as the great champion of freedom in Europe; and in view of what the Government here has already done towards receiving him, good faith and honor on our part, to say nothing of the dictates of humanity, demand that we should extend to him all the honors so justly his due.

But in voting for this resolution, he (Mr. I.) wished not to be understood as placing himself at this time upon the platform of armed intervention by the Government of this Union in the affairs of Hungary. That was not necessary in voting for this resolution. Indeed he would add, that, for his part, he was willing to abide by the counsels of Washington and the doctrines of Monroe in regard to intervention. He (Mr. I.) was not quite ready to send an American army to the Danube; and, in conclusion, he would remark that he had witnessed, with some forebodings, the position of men at the North who surrounded Kossuth during his sojourn in New York, and who were urging the intervention policy upon the Government and people of this country. He thought he saw in their movements a foundation for a plan, to be developed hereafter, to interfere in the affairs of our domestic States, as they now wish, on the same plea of humanity, to intervene in the affairs of foreign States. But he would not now go into this great question of intervention, and he hoped that the resolution would pass with great unanimity.

Mr. GENTRY. I should have preferred to have given a silent vote upon the proposition that is before this committee. I think that would have been in the best taste, in my own view of what is proper, and in view of what we owe to ourselves under the circumstances which surround us. But so much has been said pro and con, that I feel disposed to say a word or two by way of indicating the reasons which have influenced me, and will influence me in all the votes I may give in connection with this Kossuth question. If a man presents himself at my door when I know he comes for the purpose of asking me to indorse his note for $50,000, if he is a gentleman in character and position I will invite him into my house, and extend to him all the courtesies which are due to a gentleman, though I may know him to be insolvent, and though I may feel all the while that duty to myself and my children imperiously imposes upon me the necessity of refusing to indorse the note. I would be careful more especially to do so, if the doors of my house had been opened to him by myself, and I had invited him to come there upon another ground not connected with the indorsement of his note. I would invite him into my house if I supposed him a gentleman of high character, principles, genius, and talent—overwhelmed by a torrent of misfortune, though I might know he came to ask me to do that which would imperil the fate of myself and family, and though I could not give him all he came to ask. Still, respecting him as a gentleman—respecting him for his genius, the exalted principles and motives which I believe actuated his conduct—though I might believe that the wave of misfortune had buried him beyond all hope of resurrection, and I could do nothing for him except to give him my respect and sympathy, would I slam the door in his face and say, "Get away from here! you shall not ask me to indorse that note?" [Laughter.] Not at all. It would be an exceedingly painful operation, and therefore I should make my courtesies and hospitalities all the more abundant, because presently I should have to give a most unwelcome response to the favor which he asked of me.

That is the position in which we stand in reference to Louis Kossuth; and the only question in the American House of Representatives to consider is, that they shall be careful to demean themselves as gentlemen upon this occasion, and not as rowdies. The question of indorsing the note is an after question, which we are not called upon to consider now. We are called upon to extend the civilities and courtesies which the proprieties growing out of the circumstances that surround us demand at our hands. We are called upon to represent and take care of the dignity and character of this great nation in this regard. Whether in relation to what is passed we have done right or wrong, is not now the question. This gentleman is here. How is he here, and what are the circumstances under which he presents himself here? It surprises me that any debate or adverse opinions should have arisen here in relation to this subject. After the disastrous termination of the Hungarian struggle for national existence, when Louis Kossuth was a prisoner in Turkey, this Government, responding to the just, proper, and honorable feelings of the American people, in all the forms which it could employ exhibited its anxiety for his condition and fate. Much as I am opposed to embarking this nation in the affairs of Hungary, I am not ready to admit that we are called upon to be afraid to show we sympathize upon this or the other side of questions which may arise beyond our borders. Congress passed resolutions upon this subject. Our diplomatic representatives to European Governments were instructed and required to use the influence which they might legitimately and rightfully employ to release Kossuth from imprisonment. A ship was sent across the Atlantic ocean, and its commander was instructed to receive and bring him home to our shores, if he chose to come. Kossuth accepted the offer, and he is here, regarding himself as the guest of the nation. It is enough that the world so understands and regards it, whether we shall so regard it or not.

Now, the question is, what does propriety require at our hands? Though perchance since his arrival upon our shores, as an humble petitioner he may ask that which we cannot grant, yet propriety requires at our hands that we should receive him with all the civilities due to the occasion and the circumstances which surround him and us.

But gentlemen are afraid that he will make a speech—that he will overturn the long-established policy of the nation. They seem to be afraid that the American people in their admiration for Kossuth will forget Washington. I have no such fear. Let him speak as much as he pleases. Let him go into every Congressional district in the United States of America, and speak as often as he desires. His speeches will be harmless. I expect, if occasion should make it necessary, to resist, with as much firmness as any other man, the line of policy which he would induce us to take. Let him speak. Why, sir, I am so much of a Democrat—a real genuine Democrat—that I am willing to submit every and all questions which have arisen, or can possibly arise, involving the interests and honor of this Republic, to the arbitrament of the American people. If the people are not competent to solve safely for the Republic all questions that can be submitted to them, why, then our Government is founded upon a false idea, and it is needless for us to struggle against the ruin that is inevitable. If Kossuth can overturn this Republic, or unsettle the long-established and firm convictions of this people, and make them disregard the admonitions of Washington, so as to make them abandon the policy that has made them what they are, and which, if persevered in, is destined to make them infinitely more powerful than language can tell, or imagination conceive—if any foreigner from another clime can do all that, if our only safety is in not giving him a chance to speak, [laughter,] why, then this legacy which we have inherited from our fathers is not worth struggling or fighting for at all. In respect to the safety of this Government, and the stability of its policy, I consider Louis Kossuth as a very harmless individual. If I am wrong in that, I am wrong in believing the theory upon which this Government is founded. If this people can be made to forget the high destiny to which they are called, and the great responsibility which rests upon them—if they can be made to forget Washington for Louis Kossuth, why then our institutions are not worth a struggle, and the whole experiment which our fathers have undertaken, and which we are seeking to perpetuate, is a fallacy and is of no value. I do not believe a word of it. A rabble of fools and demagogues, in this or that locality, may shout at his heels, and profess themselves in favor of plunging this Government into any line of policy which he may request. Such characters as these are merely seeking to appropriate to themselves some small portion of the glory and eclat that surround the name of Kossuth; and after all it will presently be seen that they cannot really effect anything, either to save or destroy the Republic. Let them shout—let them huzza—it is all harmless. Who is afraid? [Laughter.] You need have no fear for the Republic in this regard. The intelligence and patriotism of the American people will take care of all these questions. The only thing we have to look to, is to take care of our dignity, and not permit the thing to be overdone. I have the most profound confidence in the capacity of my friend from Ohio [Mr. CARTER] [laughter] to form a just conception of what the proprieties of the occasion demand; and if this resolution shall be adopted, the SPEAKER will doubtless associate other sensible gentlemen with him, and such a committee will no doubt execute in good taste what a just conception of the circumstances of the case demands. Let Louis Kossuth be invited into this Hall, and let him take a seat within the bar of the House of Representatives, and let that be the end of it here. Let him speak elsewhere as much as he wants to, and I will give five or ten dollars to hear him. I have already subscribed a paper to give him a dinner. Let him speak, but he cannot un-Americanize me, or this Congress, or this nation. If I am wrong in that, I want to be undeceived. I desire to see the experiment tried. [Laughter.] Gifted though he be, eminently gifted, let us not be afraid of his genius. Is there no genius in America—are there none to plead as eloquently and as ably as he can do, for the United States, and the duties of this Government, in view of the present and coming generations, as well as those that are past? Do not be scared about it. [Laughter.] If gentlemen have any surplus cash—if you are disposed to be liberal, hand it over. [Laughter.] We are rich and prosperous, and can stand a little of that sort of individual and voluntary depletion. Gentlemen are afraid of Kossuth, lest he should make us forgetful of our duties as American legislators, into whose hands has been committed this great legacy of freedom, which we hold in trust for all mankind—not for this generation alone, but all coming generations. Let them dismiss their fears.

When it shall become necessary, we will tell Mr. Kossuth—and I desire to call him Mr. Kossuth distinctly, and for a reason, because it is the policy of this Government to recognize existing governments—governments de facto—and I conform to this established policy—we will tell Mr. Kossuth, that inasmuch as it was our example which animated him and his Hungarians to the great and glorious efforts which they made, and which, though unsuccessful now, we hope will be more successful in the future, we will keep that light of our example burning and shining upon the pathway of the nations, to guide them onwards like that cloud by day and pillar of fire by night which guided the Israelites from Egyptian bondage to the promised land. We will keep it burning upon their pathway, to guide them from the darkness of tyranny and despotism to the sunlight of liberty. But we will not imperil the good we have ourselves, and which we hold in trust for all humanity, by plunging into adventures as he invites us to. When the proper time comes for us to tell him this, we must tell it to him. But being here under all the circumstances in which he is here, we are called upon to behave towards him as gentlemen.

The Senate has passed a resolution, I believe, precisely similar to that which the gentleman from Ohio has offered. Now, is it in good taste for the two branches of the legislative departments of the Government to be at issue upon such a question as this—a mere question of courtesy, involving nothing beyond that? Let gentlemen do what is demanded of them as gentlemen, and as Representatives of the dignity and character of the nation, quietly, decently, and in order. The only danger is of its being overdone. There ought to have been no debate about the matter at all. There ought to have been an understanding among us as to what was the proper resolution to be offered, and it ought not to have been debated, but should have passed without any argumentation whatever.

Mr. Chairman, you must realize the fact—every gentleman here must realize the fact that if you were to go to the house of any gentleman where you understood you had an invitation, or, at least, an implied permission to go, and when you got to the door you found one half the family declaring that you should not come in, and the other half insisting that you should come in—a sort of intestine war in the household as to whether you should be received and treated with courtesy or not—though you might get in by and by, you would not enjoy yourself much. [Laughter.] You would wish to be away again.

Now I think that we ought quietly to pass this resolution, without further debate, and leave it to the discretion and good taste of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. CARTER,] and of the other gentlemen that the good sense of the Speaker will associate with him, to do this little mere matter of manners in that way which the proprieties of the occasion demand. We disgrace ourselves by talking on the subject.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I think that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GENTRY] has been quite as unfortunate in the analogy that he has submitted to the House as he has been in his argument. He has compared Kossuth to a poor man who comes to your door with a note of $50,000, which you know he cannot pay; but he asks, "Will you, therefore, refuse to admit him?" And he asks, Would it be civil to turn the door upon him? Sir, that is not the case. But I will give him one. Suppose that a man in the condition he represents, going through the gentleman's own town endeavoring to raise money, should receive a note on the street by a messenger from the gentleman, inviting him into the gentleman's house—into his parlor—and after he gets in, the gentleman should say, I cannot indorse your note: would it be civil to send for the man barely to tell him that you would not aid him in the matter? I ask the gentleman who has been lecturing us to-day about good taste, and manners, and courtesy, if he does not think that it would be rude to send out on the highway and ask a man into his house to treat him in such a manner? Would it not be much more courteous at least to wait until he should come and knock? Mr. Kossuth, we all know, wants money, or "material aid." It is true he has not yet knocked at our door—but we all know it—and the gentleman says that he does not intend to grant it? He has said so here to-day. Why, then, do you ask him here? why invite him into your house, unless it be to tell him that he cannot get the "aid" he desires? If, Mr. Chairman, Louis Kossuth was here as the representative of the principle to which the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] referred, I might extend this courtesy to him. But I do not look upon Louis Kossuth on the continent of America as Louis Kossuth in Hungary. He is no longer the representative of the principle of constitutional liberty that was overthrown in his native land. The only principle that he is now the representative of is the principle of intervention to prevent intervention. That is the principle which he is now urging—the object of his mission is to carry out this principle. Does he advocate any other wherever he goes? Did he not make the issue distinctly in New York? "I do not want to be feasted," said he. He does not ask your courtesy or your compliments. He wants nothing short of armed intervention, if need be. He wants you to change the settled policy of your Government—and he wants no mistake about it. I admire his candor. He said he wished not to steal into our feelings "by any easy, slippery evasion." He is here, I say, as the open, avowed representative of this great principle, and there can be no mistake about it. If, then, we take him by the hand, and extend to him the privileges of this floor, do we not do it in approbation of the cause which he styles his mission? Can we do it without giving countenance to that principle?

The gentleman from Tennessee tells us that he is not afraid of Louis Kossuth; and he says "don't be afraid." Sir, I do not know whether the gentleman thinks Kossuth a little man, and, therefore, not to be feared. I will tell him, however, that I am by no means in a panic. But I am not one of those who seem disposed to attribute too little importance to the powers of this man. I believe him to be a man of great abilities—a man of rare talents. In my estimation he stands forth as one of the first of his species. Every speech, everything that he says, bears the marks, the deep unmistakable impress of mind, of intellect, and of genius of the highest order. It is because I admire him, and believe that he has the mind to appreciate sense and intellect, that I wish not to go through with the solemn mockery that gentlemen here would urge upon the American Congress. Let us not ask him in the House that we may tell him that we do not intend to indorse this new principle of his. If we do not intend to give him the indorsement, let us treat him with that dignity that will become him and ourselves. But, sir, the gentleman says again, "don't be afraid." Well, I will say to him I was not very apprehensive myself of the effect of this illustrious foreigner's influence upon the American mind until I came here this morning. Since then, I must confess my mind has had reason to undergo a change on that subject. It is true, we are told with an easy air and grace not to be afraid that the legacy of Washington will be thrown away! Sir, those were wise and patriotic words that fell from the lips of Patrick Henry, "The price of liberty is eternal vigilance." I have received a new lesson upon that subject here this day. We are here in the American Congress, having intrusted to us, if you please, that legacy. I hold in my hand the Constitution of the United States, which imboodies that language, and which we have all sworn to support—that this Constitution says that the members of this House shall make rules for their government. We have made rules in the exercise of this power granted. Here they are. These rules are the law of this House—as much binding upon every member of it as any law of the land. The 17th of these rules declares who shall be entitled to a place or seat on this floor. All others are excluded. Louis Kossuth does not come within either of the classes of persons herein named as those who may be admitted upon the floor. The 136th rule declares that there shall be no change or alteration of either of the standing rules of this House without one day's notice. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CARTER] comes in here and moves a resolution giving the privileges of the floor to a person not now entitled under the 17th standing rule, and without any notice. Not only this, but he moves this resolution in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, where, according to all parliamentary law, no original matter can originate; and yet I have here this day seen a majority of this House disregard precedent, usage, and the express law of the House under the Constitution, and sustain this unheard-of proceeding—carried away, I suppose, by this late contagious sympathy for the cause of intervening in other nations' affairs in order to give and secure universal liberty to mankind. And I have seen the gentleman from Tennessee himself acting with that majority—riding "rough-shod" over the laws of this House to be civil and courteous to a man who comes here to teach us that Washington did not understand the interests of this country as well as he does—this, too, in the very presence of the Father of his Country, as his noble countenance beams from yonder canvas. It comes, sir, with a bad grace from the gentleman to tell me, in the midst of these scenes, and what I have here this day witnessed, not to be "afraid that the legacy of Washington will be thrown away." Here the gentleman stands, and here a majority of this House stands, presenting the strange spectacle to the world of taking the initiative step for assuming jurisdiction over the liberties of all the rest of mankind by grossly violating and overriding the laws of their own Government. Poor defenders, gentlemen, you will prove yourselves to be of other people's liberties when you will not maintain the bulwarks of your own! And never would I, if I were Kossuth, place much reliance on the promises of any people to defend the liberties of my country, when they paid so little regard to the principles of their own.

Sir, I say again, I was disposed to have little apprehension of the effect of Kossuth's progress here till I saw that his coming had disorganized the American House of Representatives. Answer me, answer me, any man upon this floor, whether you can pass the resolution to-day without beating down and battering down the law by which you are governed, and with it one of the safeguards of the Constitution of your country? You cannot do it. Gentlemen speak a great deal of down-trodden Europe and liberty. Sir, I am an admirer of liberty; I am a friend of liberty; but the liberty I have attachment for is constitutional liberty. It is not a wild unrestrained licentiousness, but it is a liberty defined and regulated by written law. It is such liberty as I find in my own country, and nowhere else on the habitable globe. For this reason I love my country—this "my fatherland." And when we look out upon the nations of the earth and see our country rising up as the great light of the world to cheer up the spirits and gladden the hearts of the victims of power and misrule elsewhere—when I look upon it, as the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GENTRY] says, as "the pillar of cloud and of fire" to direct other nations in their exodus from tyranny and despotism—it may not be impertinent to ask ourselves, what is it that makes it so? What are the massive columns that uphold this towering dome of American liberty in its majestic might—in that grandeur which challenges the admiration of the world?

My countrymen—for so shall I appeal to you this day while you are acting, as you now are, upon this resolution in violation of the law of the House—I address you as a town-meeting, for you have no rightful power to consider this resolution but by an overthrow of your own rules and in open disregard of public law—I say to you, that this great work of American liberty, my countrymen, this great achievement which no other nation or people have ever attained, depends solely upon the supremacy of the law. This is the whole secret—a strict maintenance of the law. The first step towards despotism is a disregard of law. When the restraints of law are removed, anarchy reigns until force is called in for self-preservation; and I call upon every man that regards his own country, not only to stand this day by the laws of this House, but by the principles upon which his own Government was founded, and do not, in an eager desire to be conspicuous in giving evidence of a surpassing liberality abroad, overthrow and demolish the outposts of liberty at home.

Mr. GENTRY. In reply to my friend from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS,] I will say, in all frankness, that although I have been a member of this House a good many years, I have not scanned and studied the rules with great care. I have thought that, generally, business was more expedited by acquiescing in a wrong decision, than by debating questions of order; and hence I generally put myself under the protection of the Speaker, or the Chairman, as the case may be, and in most cases am willing to abide their decision. Thus frankly disclaiming everything like pretensions to a very accurate knowledge of the rules of the House, and of parliamentary law, I must say that the gentleman's argument rests mainly upon an assumption, which, in my humble opinion, is unfounded in fact. In my opinion, the House has not overridden its rules, as contended by the gentleman. If you look into the copy of the rules before you, you will find it noted there, that in the early history of the Government no proposition touching an appropriation of money could originate elsewhere than in a Committee of the Whole House. That being found inconvenient, the rule was changed in that regard. My opinion is, that when the House chooses to resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole upon the state of the Union, the Committee of the Whole may make any report back to the House which it may believe to be demanded by the exigencies of the Union. That is my belief; but I will waive that. I will not argue it. It is needless to do so.

In answer to the gentleman's argument that to pass the resolution now under consideration will be to change a standing rule of the House, in palpable violation of that rule of the House which requires notice to be given in advance of such proposition, before it can be made, I maintain that by the action now proposed we change no standing rule of the House. We only make an exception to the operation of a standing rule. I hope that this distinction will be borne in mind. We change no standing rule of the House. We agree to invite Louis Kossuth upon this floor, but the standing rule remains unchanged. We simply, by virtue of power residing in this House, in view of reasons satisfactory to ourselves, choose to make an exception to a standing rule, which we have prescribed for our everyday ordinary government; and that standing rule still remains unchanged as the common law of the House. We choose, for reasons satisfactory to ourselves, to make an exception to the standing rule for this present necessity. I have so high an opinion of the fairness and candor of the gentleman who has spoken, that I cannot even intimate that he has indulged in any intentional sophistry upon this question. I think, however, that when the excitement of the hour has passed from his mind, when he reviews his argument, he will see that he has not to-day met this question fairly and squarely, as he usually meets questions. I think he has not exhibited his usual candor. I think the skill of the advocate has pushed aside the candor of the man. I think he plays the lawyer a little upon this occasion.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Will the gentleman allow me to put a case to him which tests the sophistry.

The CHAIRMAN stated that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. RANTOUL] had yielded the floor to allow an explanation to be made, and he did not conceive the gentleman had a right to yield it to others.

Mr. RANTOUL yielded the floor.
Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. We have a standing rule of this House that bills shall be offered in a particular manner. Suppose an individual member arises and moves as an exception to allow his bill to come in, would it be sophistry to urge that the House should not change the rule? No, no, I move barely this as an exception to the standing rules. You cannot make an exception to a standing rule, but by changing it. The rule has to be removed to make the exception. I think the gentleman would so decide, could he see through the Kossuth fog which has come over his brain.

Mr. GENTRY. I would gladly answer the question propounded to me by my friend from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS,] but another gentleman was talking to me when he propounded it, and prevented me from hearing or comprehending him. It is by no means essential to the purpose of this debate, waiving all question of rules, I assume here, and do it fearlessly, that while ordinarily due deference and observation ought to be paid to the rules we have instituted for the regulation of the ordinary business of legislation, an occasion may arise when the rules may be set aside by the will of the House, in deference to what the public necessity may demand. We do it every day upon the most trivial questions, and I am surprised that the thunders of my friend's eloquence have not heretofore been heard upon this floor, when he has seen questions of order decided one way to-day, and reversed the next day. We have constantly recurring examples of opposite and contrary discussion upon questions of order, just according to the humor of the House. I am sure this declaration will be supported by every gentleman who has any experience on the floor. This habit has, I think, grown into an abuse that ought to be corrected. However, admitting what he says is true, I stand where I stood in regard to the proprieties of the occasion. I do not admit the arguments or conclusions of the gentleman. He says if we invite the gentleman in we are bound to indorse his note. I am willing to rest it there. I say if a man of high character, of honorable and high aim, one as he has been so known and recognized through his whole life, shall be overtaken and overwhelmed by misfortune, although I may believe he had come to my house to ask me to indorse his note for $50,000, which in view of what was due to myself and children, I would be bound to refuse, yet I could not, as a gentleman, shut the door in his face, because I knew he had come to ask a favor which duty would not permit me to grant. Am not I, under such circumstances, bound to invite him in? Am not I bound to extend to him every civility, which a gentleman, and especially a gentleman overwhelmed by misfortune, has a right to demand? Am I not all the more bound to be thus courteous, because of his misfortunes; because those misfortunes will make him more sensitive to the slightest omission of courtesy? And am I not bound to be more assiduously observant of such courtesy, because I know that presently I will be under the painful necessity of refusing him a favor? I will not argue it. I refer it to your hearts. I refer it to your feelings as gentlemen. I say, in regard to this point there can be no question.

Well, suppose Kossuth asks us to overturn the settled policy of the country—supposing him to come to us, as he says he does, an humble petitioner in behalf of his downtrodden and ruined country, to try to induce us to enter into a line of action which he thinks will resuscitate, resurrect, and restore his country to national existence, although we know we cannot grant his request consistently with the duties and obligations which are binding upon us, still shall we treat him rudely? Cannot we excuse him for a little extravagance in this regard? Suppose he sees the advice and views and opinions of Washington standing in his way, and that he, in the extremity of his desire to make an impression upon us, to accomplish something for that bleeding and ruined country of his, which he has left behind—suppose he shall argue and try to persuade us to disregard even the policy of Washington—we will not do it, I trust—cannot we pardon something in the motives that animate and the object which impels him in these efforts for his countrymen and his annihilated country? If we believe his motives to be high and honorable, cannot we sympathize with him in those motives and objects, although we see, as in the case of the unfortunate gentleman who comes and asks us to be responsible for $50,000, that we cannot indorse the note without ruining ourselves, yet we must treat him with all possible courtesy? We must not offend or regard him as a madman, because in his enthusiasm he believes he will be able to convey us harmlessly through the enterprise—like the unfortunate gentleman who asks you to indorse his note, and who, in his anxiety to escape from the hands of the sheriff and marshal, and save his wife and children from poverty and ruin, may ask us to trust in HIS HOPE, rather than in any reasonable and rational prospect. That is the precise posture of the question, and we ought to be unanimous. I do not wish to be understood as reproaching any gentleman. My opinion is, the whole argument against this resolution is founded upon erroneous assumptions and false premises. I regret this debate. We ought to have acted unanimously, and I hope we may do so yet.

Mr. RANTOUL. I desire to say that I shall vote for this resolution, not because I consider Louis Kossuth to be identified with the great cause of European liberty—although I sympathize strongly with all who are the champions of that cause,—nor simply because he stands before the country as a champion of national independence—although there is no holier or higher cause in which man can be engaged than that; but because he comes here the representative of a principle heretofore almost peculiar to our own institutions. The case of Hungary is the case of a sovereign independent State united with other States under one common executive for limited and specific purposes, that sovereign State reserving her own rights, and Louis Kossuth stands here before the country, the first European that ever stepped upon our shores, the champion of State rights. It is that principle which he personifies, and no other man ever came from the Old World that could be said to personify it. That is the highest claim which he has upon my regard, and, as I believe, upon the regard of the civilized world. What was the case of Hungary for several hundred years? She had constituted a part of a confederated Empire—she had had her own rights and guarded them with jealous care, and she had her separate State independence and sovereignty, which perished through the encroachments of the central power—a power created originally under express limitations. If this Republic shall go the downward path which every republic has gone whose history has been written, from what cause will it perish? I stand here to welcome Louis Kossuth because I love this Union and pray that it may be eternal; but I see in this Government a symptom of mortality, and what is it? If this Government shall perish, it will perish by the encroachments of the central power upon the reserved rights of the separate States. And here stands a man whose whole life has been devoted to the vindication of State rights against consolidation and centralization. That is the principle he embodies, and it is for that we should welcome him here, if we welcome him at all—as I trust in God we shall do cheerfully and with our whole hearts.

Now, what is the reason why liberty has been impossible in Europe from the earliest times down to the present day? Simply because they have had no contrivance there for dividing the powers of the Government among many different administrations. How was it that that great man—the apostle of liberty in two worlds—and his compere failed to establish constitutional government in France? Why is constitutional liberty impossible now in France? For one reason, and one only; and that is, because all the powers of the Government are intrusted to one central power. And that power must of necessity be altogether too strong for liberty to exist anywhere.

And, sir, when I see here in this country the universal tendency of power to attract to itself power; when I see that there must, some day or other, come up the question, Shall this cluster of Republics cease to be a cluster of Republics? Shall it become a national Government? When I see a party sometimes calling itself national, because it carries national powers further than other men are disposed to carry them; when I see such tendencies—I allude not to the present time particularly, but to different periods since the foundation of our Government—when I see that that is the great danger against which every man in this country ought to contend who desires the preservation of our institutions; and when I see here a man who has devoted his life, his energies, his genius—a genius which I will not now pause to characterize, for I trust all around me appreciate it as I do—a man who has devoted all the powers that God has given him to the single purpose of defending the institutions and independence of his country against the central power of her Federal Government, I ask myself, is it possible that any man who sees in the rights of the several States the bulwark and safeguard of our liberties, can for a moment hesitate to welcome such a man? The mystery is to me incomprehensible. I confess I cannot fathom it; and nothing that I have yet heard in the debate upon this floor has given me any assistance in understanding what is at the bottom of this unwillingness to welcome our brother, our friend, our copatriot in the defence of that great principle which lies at the foundation of all our institutions.

If, sir, Louis Kossuth had not been brought here in a government ship—if he had come in his own vessel, at his own expense—if he had never been heard of except as the champion of the principle which I have already specified—that alone would have been claim enough on me. And when such a man has been brought here at the national expense, are we to stand parleying while he is at the door, and debating whether we will let him in or shut him out? What new light have we on this subject? Are we to say that by admitting Louis Kossuth we sanction all the opinions that he has ever uttered? If that be so, we never should have invited him here. He had uttered a good many opinions before he came to this country in which I for one could not agree with him. But I say that we must take the man as the glorious representative of a glorious cause. As such we can take him to our hearts, differ from us as he may on a great variety of questions, and important questions, too, that may arise. All honest men, having sound intellects, do differ. When I find two men agreeing precisely in opinion, I take it for granted that they are either both fools, or that one of them is a fool and is controlled by the other. This man has a right to his own opinions. Let him express them, and express them fearlessly. I do not say by my vote that I indorse any of his opinions. I simply say that I glory in welcoming to America the peculiar champion of the great principles of American institutions.

With this exposition I am willing that my vote shall go forth to the country; and whatever course Kossuth may hereafter take, I shall not feel that I have reason to regret that vote.

Mr. EWING. I am gratified to have the opportunity of making a brief explanation (and I promise it shall be nothing more) of the vote which I shall give upon this resolution. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CARTER] will observe the inconsistency in which his own position upon this subject involves him, when he speaks of our being committed to this act by steps heretofore taken, upon this ground calls upon us to adopt the resolution now before us, and yet tells us we cannot possibly be committed to anything further by what we are now to do.

It seems to me, sir, that the time has already come when we should stop and inquire how much further we are to go. If we are committed, first by the offer of a vessel under a misunderstanding, to extend a national welcome, and then by this welcome forced to lavish these extraordinary honors upon this individual, patriot though he be, and unsatisfied with the hospitality so liberally extended by the people, to turn this great council-house of the nation into a reception room, we have a right to stop, and before we go further to demand whether we are tending, and how much further we are to be driven on and on and on, by the consequences of one act to the perpetration of another. He tells you with sufficient plainness, his view of the matter, and we owe Mr. Kossuth—(I ask his pardon if I do him injustice in denying him a title)—we owe him a debt of gratitude for his candor. He has proclaimed over this land, that if we are once committed to say to Russia, in diplomatic phrase, as has been proposed already by some gentlemen on this floor, that we will not be indifferent to a second interference on her part; and if she does not subvert her whole policy in deference to our protest, we must then go to war, or be degraded before the eyes of the civilized world! Startling commentary upon this new doctrine of precedents and commitments!

It is said that he comes here as the representative of State-rights doctrines. I much fear me the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. RANTOUL,] who has just taken his seat, has learned that doctrine too recently fully to appreciate or comprehend it. State-rights doctrines! Let me ask those gentlemen, who have hitherto complained of the encroachments of the Federal Government in the exercise of implied and doubtful powers—who have complained of the latitudinarian construction of the Constitution—whether the teachings of Louis Kossuth are in conformity with a strict construction of that instrument?—which, as much as he may despise the political philosophy of its framers, tells us, in language too plain to be mistaken, that it was formed “to secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity,” not to Hungary or any other people on earth. Let me ask those gentlemen who have been so much shocked at the idea of expending two or three pitiful millions in the improvement of the navigation of our streams, where they find the power for the expenditure of untold millions in a scheme of knight-errantry to redress the wrongs of every oppressed people, and if of every people, of course of every oppressed individual upon the face of this broad earth? Every subject of Austria has rights as sacred as those of her Hungarian subjects, and have, too, many of them, struggled to assert them. Without kinship, with no ties of relationship, we are called upon to go to the extreme boundaries of civilization, even to the borders of barbarism itself, upon a crusade in the cause of liberty, while tens of thousands of us; American citizens with Irish blood flowing in our veins, have looked idly, passively, inactively on while Great Britain has denied those sacred rights to Ireland. But in this new crusade the Crescent and the Cross are to be united in the same cause! Those banners which are floating in so strange a combination over our great capitals, which are kissing each other in so new and extraordinary a friendship, are no more to flout defiance at each other, as they have hitherto done upon so many a battlefield; but the Union Jack and the Stars and Stripes, the Crescent and the Cross, are henceforth to march side by side in the van of the armies of Liberty! In this reunion of the ancient oppressor and the revolted colonies, we might well inquire who is to be the annexer and who the annexed? We should not be over confident in our own past success, for the conqueror of India and of Canada, upon whose dominions the sun never sets, may with some reason boast her greater proficiency in this rival art. What new developments are to be made, sir, in our relations with the world? what new system to be built up on the ruins of the ancient policy of our fathers? Again I ask, whither are we tending, and to what point are we to be driven?

Mr. ORR. I move that the committee do now rise.

Cries of "Oh no!" "Oh no!"

The question was taken, and 55 rose in the affirmative.

Mr. CARTTER demanded tellers, which were ordered; and Messrs. BRIGGS and WILDRICK appointed.

The question was then taken, and the tellers reported—ayes 81, noes 60.

So the motion prevailed.

The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker, having resumed the chair, the chairman of the committee reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had the Union generally under consideration, and had come to no conclusion thereon. [Laughter.]

Mr. FICKLIN. I rise to a question of order. I make this point. It is the duty of the chairman of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to report the facts as they existed in the committee. Now, a resolution was introduced and debated in that committee, and various amendments were proposed; and I submit with all due deference to the chairman of the committee, [Mr. JONES,] that he should have reported the introduction of that resolution to the House.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I concur fully with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FICKLIN] in the position he has assumed, that the chairman of the Committee of the Whole should report the state of the facts as they occurred to the House. But I tell you and the House that I have reported the facts. I say that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union always have the state of the Union generally under consideration; and further, that the chairman of that committee never makes a report of anything unless something is done. When you, Mr. Speaker, called him to the chair this morning, the first business in order on the calendar was the message of the President of the United States, which had been referred to that committee, and a resolution had been introduced in relation to it by the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. Housen.] If that resolution had been adopted, your chairman would have reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the annual message of the President of the United States, and had come to no conclusion thereon. He would have said nothing about the resolution which had been adopted, or any resolution which had been introduced. He would have made no reference to anything which had not been referred to it by the House. I take it that the chairman of the committee can make no other report without the special instruction of that committee.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FICKLIN] that he sees no good reason for impugning the motives of the chairman of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. He thinks the report made to the House was a correct one.

Mr. FICKLIN. I do not want to embarrass the Chair, nor do I desire to make any reflection upon the honorable chairman of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. But I make the suggestion, that when the House go into the Committee of the Whole upon the state of the Union, they go there for the consideration of a particular bill, and I think the chairman should make his report in relation to that bill.

Mr. CLINGMAN. There is nothing now before the House. I move the usual resolution stopping debate on the Kossuth resolution in half an hour after the House shall have again resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and upon that motion I call for the previous question.

Mr. MILLSON. I move that when this House adjourns it adjourn to meet on Friday next.

Cries of "No! no!"

The question was then put, and the motion was not agreed to—ayes 53; noes not counted.

Mr. ORR moved that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. KING, of New York, demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered; and the question being taken, there were—yeas 90; nays 57, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abercrombie, Aiken, Allison, John Appleton, William Appleton, Ashe, Averett, Thomas H. Bayly, Barrere, Bacoek, Bowne, Brenton, Brooks, Albert G. Brown, Barrows, E. Carrington Cabell, Caldwell, Lewis D. Campbell, Churchwell, Clark, Cobb, Cullom, George T. Davis, Disney, Dockery, Dunham, Edmundson, Ewing, Ficklin, Fitch, Henry M. Fuller, Thomas J. D. Fuller, Gentry, Gilmore, Goodenow, Gorman, Grey, Hall, Harper, Isham G. Harris, Sampson W. Harris, Haven, Hebard, Hendricks, Hillyer, Howard, John W. Howe, Thomas M. Howe, Jackson, Andrew Johnson, James Johnson, Robert W. Johnson, George W. Jones, George G. King, Landry, Letcher, Lockhart, Humphrey Marshall, Martin, Mason, McDonald, McMullin, Meacham, Miller, Milson, Miner, John Moore, Morehead, Murphy, Olds, Orr, Porter, Powell, Richardson, Savare, Schermerhorn, Scudder, Scurry, Origen S. Seymour, Smith, Snow, Stanly, Benjamin Stanton, Alexander H. Stephens, Taylor, Wallace, Watkins, Addison White, Williams, and Yates—90.

NAYS—Messrs. Willis Allen, Bartlett, John H. Boyd, Briggs, Buell, Joseph Cable, Carter, Chapman, Cleveland, Clingman, Conger, John G. Davis, Dean, Doty, Durkee, Edgerton, Florence, Floyd, Fowler, Gaylord, Giddings, Green, Grow, Hascall, Horsford, John Johnson, Daniel T. Stanton, Stratton, Stuart, Sutherland, Sweetser, George W. Thompson, Thurston, Townshend, Tuck, Walbridge, Walsh, Ward, Washburn, Welch, and Wildrick—57.

So the motion prevailed, and the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

• WEDNESDAY, December 31, 1851.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

RECEPTION OF LOUIS KOSSUTH.

Mr. STANLY. I rise to a question of order upon the proposition offered yesterday by my colleague, [Mr. CLINGMAN,] to stop debate in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union in half an hour after we shall again go into such committee. I beg leave to call the attention of the Chair and the House to the 136th rule. That rule provides that whenever any bills are referred to the Committee of the Whole by the House, the House may, according to that rule, discharge the committee from the further consideration of them after acting without debate on all amendments pending, and that may be offered. The rule contemplates only bills referred to the committee on the part of the House. This resolution relates to no bills, nor to any action upon a bill referred to the committee by the House. And I submit that if Mr. Kossuth comes in this House at all, he should not come here by force of any gag resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will remember that the resolution before the House is not debatable; and further, that no question of order arising out of that proposition can be debated.

Mr. STANLY. I only rise to make an inquiry of the Chair. I wish to state my point of order so that the Chair may understand it.

The SPEAKER. I did not intend to interrupt the gentleman in stating his point of order. I desire to give him every reasonable facility for doing so.

Mr. STANLY. I wish to have my point of order understood; and if I succeed in doing so, I will acquiesce in the decision of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The rule to which the gentleman refers, does not in terms specify resolutions. But it has been the uniform practice under that rule to consider in Committee of the Whole, not only bills, but also resolutions, the President's messages, and whatever other matter may have been referred to it by the House. The Chair would refer the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. STANLY] to an authority contained in the Journals of the last Congress, directly to the point, which the Clerk will read to the House. The debate upon the President's message, in that case, was stopped by a resolution similar to this one now before the House.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. The Speaker can only know what has transpired in the Committee of the Whole House upon the state of the Union, from the report of the chairman of that committee. That chairman did not report that the President's message was under consideration, and he could not have so reported, for such would not have been the facts in the case.

Mr. GIDDINGS. Is there an appeal from the decision of the Chair?

The SPEAKER. It is the opinion of the Chair that the resolution introduced by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. CLINGMAN] is in order. [Great confusion in the Hall.]

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I call for the reading of the resolution.

Mr. STANLY. I do not understand the decision of the Chair. I did not hear a word of it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair decides that the resolution is in order.

Mr. STANLY. I did not understand the Chair as giving any reasons for such decision.

The SPEAKER. The Chair stated that it had been the practice of the House, under the 136th rule, for the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to consider not only bills, but also resolutions, and whatever else may have been referred to it by the House.

Mr. STANLY. I would like to hear of a case in point establishing such a practice. I never heard of it before.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read from the Journals.

The Clerk then read the authority referred to by the Speaker, from the House Journal of the second session of the Thirty-first Congress, on page 33, as follows:

"Resolved, That the debate in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, on the President's message, shall cease in five minutes after the committee shall again resume the consideration of the same, (if the committee shall not sooner come to a conclusion upon the same), and the committee shall then proceed to vote on such propositions as may be pending, or offered, in reference to the same; and shall then report it to the House, with such propositions as may have been agreed to by the committee."

Mr. STANLY. How did the Kossuth resolution get before the committee? It has not been referred to it by the House.

The SPEAKER. The President's message was before the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and it makes direct reference not only to Kossuth, but to his arrival here, and the manner of his reception by this House.

Mr. STEPHENS. I call for the reading of the resolution submitted by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. CLINGMAN] referred to.

Mr. STANLY. That resolution does not cover the case in point.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That all debate in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, upon so much of the President's message as relates to Louis Kossuth, shall terminate in one half hour after the committee shall again resume its consideration, (if the committee shall not sooner come to a conclusion on the same,) and the committee shall then proceed to vote on such propositions as may be pending, or offered, in reference to the same: and shall then report it to the House, with such propositions as may have been agreed to by the committee.

Mr. STANLY. And this resolution stops the debate in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, when that part of the message which refers to Kossuth comes under consideration.

The SPEAKER. It does; and the Chair decides that the resolution is in order.

Mr. JONES. I appeal from that decision.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. I wish to make an additional point of order. It is this: we cannot stop debate upon a part of the President's message any more than we can upon a section or part of a bill.

Mr. KING, of New York. I call the gentleman to order.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. JONES. It is difficult to state a point of order; my object in taking an appeal is not upon the ground that a resolution to stop debate upon the President's message is not in order, but upon the ground that you cannot stop debate upon one part of that document and not upon the remainder.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order taken by the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. JONES. Then I appeal from that decision of the Chair, and upon that question I ask the yeas and nays.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I desire that the rule may be read which authorizes the stopping of debate in a Committee of the Whole.

The 136th rule was then read, as follows:

"The House may, at any time, by a vote of a majority of the members present, suspend the rules and orders for the purpose of going into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and also for providing for the discharge of the Committee of the Whole House, and the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union—January 25, 1848—from the further consideration of any bill referred to it, after acting without debate on all amendments pending, and that may be offered.—March 11, 1844.

Mr. TUCK. I move that the appeal taken by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] be laid upon the table.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I call the yeas and nays upon the motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I wish to inquire of the Chair if it has not been the uniform practice of this body, that when we have arrived at a conclusion upon one resolution touching any one portion of the President's message, to report that to the House before the other parts of the message have been disposed of, and without reference to them?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has stated to the House, that it has been the practice of this body to pursue the course now proposed by the resolution. There can be no doubt about it.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. The Chair states that it is the practice of the House to do what is now proposed to be done. I ask the Chair if any instance can be given, by any member upon this floor, when the House has, by such a resolution as this, discharged the Committee of the Whole from the consideration of any separate portion of the President's message?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not aware of any practice upon that particular point.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. The Chair stated that such was the practice.

Mr. TAYLOR. I wish to inquire of the Speaker what would be the effect of laying the appeal upon the table? Whether it would cut off all further debate upon the resolution?

The SPEAKER. The effect will be to sustain the decision of the Chair. The question is upon laying the appeal on the table; upon which motion the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question was then taken, and the appeal was laid upon the table—yeas 91, nays 65; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Willis Allen, Allison, John Appleton, Babcock, Bartlett, Bissell, John H. Boyd, Breckenridge, Briggs, Buell, Burrows, Busby, Joseph Cable, Carter, Chapman, Chastain, Cleveland, Clingman, George T. Davis, John G. Davis, Dean, Disney, Doty, Eastman, Edgerton, Ficklin, Florence, Floyd, Fowler, Thomas J. D. Fuller, Gaylord, Gentry, Giddings, Gilmore, Gorman, Green, Grow, Rascall, Hendricks, Henn, Horstford, John W. Howe, Thomas M. Howe, Ingersoll, Ives, John Johnson, Daniel T. Jones, Preston King, Kubus, Letcher, Mace, Mann, Mason, McDonald, Meacham, Molony, Nabers, Newton, Peaslee, Penn, Pennington, Perkins, Riddle, Robie, Robinson, Sackett, Scudder, David L. Seymour, Origen S. Seymour, Skelton, Smart, Snow, Benjamin Stanton, Frederick P. Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Stone, Stratton, Stuart, Sutherland, Sweetser, George W. Thompson, Thurston, Townshend, Tuck, Walbridge, Walsh, Ward, Washburn, Welch, Addison White, and Wildrick—91.

NAYS—Messrs. Aiken, William Appleton, Ashe, Averett, Thomas H. Bayly, Barrere, Bell, Bocoek, Bowne, Brenton, Brooks, E. Carrington Cabell, Caldwell, Lewis D. Campbell, Churchill, Clark, Cobb, Conger, Cullom, Dockery, Dunham, Edmundson, Fitch, Goodenow, Hall, Hammond, Harper, Isham G. Harris, Sampson W. Harris, Haven, Hebard, Hillyer, Hunter, Jackson, Andrew Johnson, James Johnson, Robert W. Johnson, George W. Jones, George G. King, Landry, Lockhart, Humphrey Marshall, McMullin, Miller, Millson, Miner, John Moore, Morehead, Murphy, Olds, Orr, Porter, Povel, Schermerhorn, Seury, Smith, Stanly, Alexander H. Stephens, Taylor, Venable, Wallace, Watkins, Wilcox, Williams, and Yates—65.

So the decision of the Chair was sustained.

The question then recurred upon the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio. I would inquire if it is in order to move an amendment?

The SPEAKER. It is in order.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I would remind the Chair that I moved the previous question, on yesterday, on the adoption of the resolution to close debate.

The SPEAKER. The Chair's recollection is that the previous question was demanded by the gentleman.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I call for the reading of the Journal, to see if it was or not; because my recollection was the other way. But I will be governed by the Journal.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I remember the fact. I do not know how the Journal is.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recollects that the gentleman made such a motion.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I paid strict attention to the reading of the Journal, and it does not state the fact. I rely upon the Journal, and it corroborates my recollection.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I know I made the motion.

Mr. STEPHENS. I will ask the Speaker if there is any record of it?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state his recollection of the proceedings. There was a good deal of confusion at the moment. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. CLINGMAN] offered the resolution, and, according to the recollection of the Chair, called for the previous question. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. Orr] then moved that when the House adjourned, it should adjourn till Friday next. Another gentleman moved that the House adjourn. The Chair first put the question upon the adjournment to Friday, and it was voted down; then upon the adjournment, which motion was carried, and the House adjourned. But previous thereto, upon the introduction of the resolution, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. CLINGMAN] arose to a question of order, in regard to which the Chair replied he would be heard after the motion was disposed of upon the adjournment.

The Chair did not state to the House the demand made for the previous question, the other matters intervening; but it is his recollection that the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. CLINGMAN] demanded it.

Mr. GENTRY here read an extract from the report of yesterday's proceedings as published in the "Globe." The extract is as follows.

"Mr. CLINGMAN. There is nothing now before the House. I move the usual resolution stopping debate on the Kossuth resolution in half an hour after the House shall have again resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and upon that motion I call for the previous question."

The SPEAKER. That is the recollection of the Chair.

Mr. GENTRY. The Journal is subject to correction.

The SPEAKER. Upon this resolution the previous question is demanded.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio. I do not consider the newspaper as any authority at all. I would inquire if it is not necessary that there should be a motion to amend the Journal, so as to show that the previous question was demanded, before we shall be called upon to vote to second the previous question?

The SPEAKER. There is no necessity of amending the Journal.

[Cries of "I object!" "I object!" "I object!"]

The SPEAKER. The Journal can be amended; but the Chair does not regard the omission as controlling any decision which he gave. The motion does not, it is true, appear upon the Journal; but, according to his recollection, the previous question was demanded, and it is the duty of the Chair to put it. Does the gentleman appeal from the decision of the Chair?

Mr. CAMPBELL. If I understand the Speaker to decide that the demand for the previous question can now be made, as the Journal stands, without amending it, then I take an appeal.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order pending the demand for the previous question.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I was not debating it.

The SPEAKER. The decision of the Chair is, that the previous question was demanded by the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. CLINGMAN,] and that he had a right to do so.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Then I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Cries of "Question!" "question!" "question!"

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I have something to say upon the appeal.

The SPEAKER. No remarks are in order.

Mr. FICKLIN. I move to lay the appeal upon the table.

Mr. MARSHALL demanded the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I understand that the motion to correct the Journal is a privileged one, and takes precedence of all other motions, and therefore I move that the Journal be corrected in that respect.

The SPEAKER. It is not in order at this stage of the proceedings to move to amend the Journal.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I merely wish to say, that there are many in this immediate neighborhood who do not know what the precise question is before the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will, then, state it. The Chair declares that, according to his best recollection, and about which he has no doubt, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. CLINGMAN] introduced his resolution upon yesterday evening, and demanded the previous question thereon. There are gentlemen upon this floor who think that the Chair is mistaken about it. The Chair has no pride of opinion or memory to gratify, as it is a question of fact, and not of parliamentary law. The Chair decides that the gentleman had demanded the previous question, having a right to do so; and it is the duty of the Chair to propound that question to the House. From that decision the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CAMPBELL] takes an appeal.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I understand the Speaker to decide that, as the Journal stood, the question could be taken upon the demand for the previous question. I do not deny the fact, that the gentleman from North Carolina may have made the motion, but the Journal does not show it.

The point I make is this: that you cannot take a vote to sustain the demand for the previous question until the Journal is amended to show the demand. An additional point I make is this: that a motion cannot be made to amend the Journal while I have the floor, proposing to amend the resolution which is to be reported to the House.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Do I understand the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CAMPBELL,] as having resigned the floor for the purpose of having the question of order decided?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I have resigned it only for that purpose.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I must insist, according to the practice of the House, that the motion to amend the Journal must be acted upon and take precedence, though the previous question had been sustained upon a previous day and we had adjourned over. My motion is right, and will take precedence of a motion to amend this resolution, or any other motion. It may be I am not entitled to take the floor while the gentleman from Ohio has it. The moment he sits down, if I have the floor, I may make that privileged motion; which motion must be acted upon before the House proceeds to the other question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will decide the points in the order in which they are made. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. CLINGMAN] asked for the previous question on yesterday upon this resolution. The Journal does not show that fact. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CAMPBELL] takes the floor, and moves to amend the resolution. The decision of the Chair at the moment was, that the demand for the previous question must be put. The gentleman from Ohio now assumes that he has the floor upon the proposition to amend the resolution, and that the floor cannot be taken from him to supply defects and add to what should have been in the Journal, and in that state of things no motion can be made to amend the Journal. That is what I understand to be the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio. The Chair decides that it is competent even in that condition of things to move to amend the Journal, as he regards it as one of those privileged motions which must be put. The Chair is therefore of the opinion that the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina to amend the Journal is in order.

Mr. OLDS. I move to lay the appeal upon the table.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Can I rise and deprive a member of the floor, to make a privileged motion? I cannot take the floor from him and move an adjournment as a privileged motion, or to bring a question of privilege before the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CAMPBELL] was not entitled to the floor at all, the previous question having been demanded. It is moved to lay upon the table the appeal now taken by the gentleman from Ohio, for it has changed its character somewhat.

Mr. WILLIAMS demanded the yeas and nays; and they were not ordered.

Mr. CABELL, of Florida, called for tellers on the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and Messrs. STONE, and STEPHENS of Georgia, appointed.

The count was made, and the yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will again state the point of order upon which the appeal has been taken. The question is simply this: that the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. CLINGMAN] had a right to move to amend the Journal. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CAMPBELL] appeals from the decision of the Chair. The motion is now made to lay that appeal upon the table, and upon that motion the yeas and nays are ordered.

Mr. CABELL. I desire to be informed as to the point of order, and if I am mistaken, I desire to be corrected. The Chair has decided, that while one member had the floor, another member had the right to move to amend the Journal.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has made no such decision; for, if the demand for the previous question was pending, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CAMPBELL] had no right to the floor.

Mr. CABELL. The gentleman from Ohio was upon the floor, and was recognized by the Chair.

The SPEAKER. He had no right to it.

Mr. CABELL. He was recognized by the Chair.

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen will preserve order.

The question was then taken on laying the appeal upon the table, and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 109, nays 41; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Aiken, Willis Allen, Allison, John Appleton, William Appleton, Ashe, Averett, Bartlett, Bell, Bissell, Bowne, John H. Boyd, Bragg, Breckenridge, Brenton, Briggs, Buell, Burrows, Busby, Joseph Cable, Carter, Chapman, Chastain, Clark, Cleveland, Clingman, Cobb, Conger, George T. Davis, John G. Davis, Dean, Doty, Durkee, Eastman, Edgerton, Ficklin, Florence, Floyd, Fowler, George W. Fuller, Thomas J. D. Fuller, Gaylord, Gentry, Giddings, Gilmore, Gorman, Green, Grow, Hall, Sampson W. Harris, Hascall, Hendricks, Henshaw, Hillyer, Horsford, John W. Howe, Ingersoll, Ives, Johnson, Daniel T. Jones, George G. King, Preston King, Kuhns, Letcher, Lockhart, Mace, Mann, Mason, McDonald, McMullin, Meacham, Milson, Minor, Molony, Nabers, Newton, Olds, Orr, Peaslee, Penn, Pennington, Perkins, Powell, Richardson, Riddle, Robie, Robinson, Sackett, Schermerhorn, Schoonmaker, Scudder, David L. Seymour, Origen S. Seymour, Skelton, Smart, Frederick P. Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Stone, Stratton, Stuart, Sutherland, Sweetser, George W. Thompson, Thurston, Townsend, Tuck, Walbridge, Wallace, Ward, Washburn, Welch, Addison White, Wildrick, and Yates—109.

NAYS—Messrs. Babcock, Thomas H. Bayly, Barrere, Bocoek, Bowie, Brooks, E. Carrington Cabell, Caldwell, Joseph P. Campbell, Lewis D. Campbell, Churchwell, Cullom, Disney, Dockery, Dunham, Grey, Hammond, Harper, Isham G. Harris, Haven, Hebard, Hunter, Andrew Johnson, George W. Jones, Landry, Humphrey Marshall, Martin, Miller, Morehead, Murphy, Porter, Savage, Scurry, Smith, Stanly, Benjamin Stanton, Alexander H. Stephens, Taylor, Venable, Walsh, Watkins, Wilcox, and Williams—41.

So the appeal was laid upon the table.

The question recurring upon Mr. CLINGMAN's motion to amend the Journal; and being taken, it was decided in the affirmative.

So the Journal was ordered to be so amended.

ADJOURNMENT UNTIL SATURDAY.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I desire to make a privileged motion. To-morrow is New Year's day; I see that there are to be a great many houses open, and members will doubtless be visiting them, and perhaps they will not be in a very good condition for business the day after. I therefore move that when the House adjourns to-day, it adjourn to meet on Saturday next.

Mr. TUCK. Will not the resolution to adjourn till Saturday be quite as much in order after the adoption of the Kossuth resolution as it is now?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will decide that question when it arises properly.

Mr. FOWLER demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered; and the question being taken, it was decided in the negative—yeas 74, nays 59; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Aiken, John Appleton, William Appleton, Ashe, Averett, Thomas H. Bayly, Barrere, Bell, Bocoek, Bowie, Bragg, Brooks, Brown, Burrows, Busby, E. Carrington Cabell, Caldwell, Lewis D. So the motion was not agreed to.

The question then recurring upon seconding the demand for the previous question.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, demanded tellers; which were ordered, and Messrs. STEPHENS of Georgia, and RICHARDSON were appointed.

The question was then taken, and the tellers reported—ayes 89, noes 48.

So the previous question received a second.

The main question, viz: on the adoption of Mr. CLINGMAN's resolution to close debate, was then ordered.

Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee, moved to lay the resolution on the table, and called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the question being taken, it was decided in the negative—yeas 56, nays 100; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abercrombie, Aiken, Ashe, Averett, Thomas H. Bayly, Barrere, Bocoek, Bowie, John H. Boyd, Bragg, Brooks, Albert G. Brown, E. Carrington Cabell, Caldwell, Lewis D. Thompson, Thurston, Townsend, Tuck, Walbridge, Walsh, Ward, Washburn, Welch, Addison White, and Wildrick—100.

So the House refused to lay the resolution upon the table.

The question recurring on the adoption of the resolution, it was taken, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 102, nays 56; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Willis Allen, Allison, John Appleton, Bartlett, Bell, Breckenridge, Briggs, Buell, Busby, Joseph Cable, Carter, Chapman, Chastain, Clark, Cleveland, Clingman, Cobb, Conger, George T. Mr. CARTTER moved that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

ADJOURNMENT UNTIL FRIDAY.

Mr. STANLY moved that when the House adjourns to-day, it adjourn to meet on Friday next.

Mr. VENABLE demanded the yeas and nays; which were not ordered.

The question was then taken on the motion, and it was agreed to, on a division; ayes 98, noes 46.

The question recurring on Mr. CARTTER's motion, it was taken, and agreed to.

So the rules were suspended, and the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, in the chair.)

The CHAIRMAN stated the business before the committee to be the annual message of the President of the United States, in relation to which a series of resolutions had been offered by the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. HOUSTON], and an amendment to that resolution by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. SEYMOUR].

Mr. CARTTER. I move that the committee do now take up that portion of the President's message which relates to Kossuth.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. I rise to a question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The entire message of the President is before the committee, and the only question pending is the resolution of the gentleman from Alabama and the amendment thereto offered by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. SEYMOUR].

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York. As I had the honor of proposing that amendment to the resolution offered by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, and as that gentleman is not now present, I hope, by general consent, the resolution and amendment will be passed over, and the committee will proceed to take up the resolution which was under consideration yesterday. I make that motion.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I submit this point of order: the business which was before the committee on yesterday—that is, the resolution of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CARTER]—was left unfinished, and I ask if that is not the regular business before the committee?

Mr. SEYMOUR. I insist upon my motion to lay aside the resolution of the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. HOUSTON,] and the amendment which I had the honor of proposing to that resolution, and that we proceed to take up the resolution which was under consideration yesterday, offered by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. CARTER.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides that a motion to postpone any particular part of the President's message is not in order. The President's message and resolution of the gentleman from Alabama are now regularly before the House, and the Chair thinks they cannot be postponed in part.

Mr. SEYMOUR. My amendment relates not to the consideration of the message, but to one of the specific resolutions offered by the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. HOUSTON,] I suppose it is in order to move to postpone that, if not all the resolutions offered by the gentleman from Alabama, and take up the resolution offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CARTER] yesterday, which relates also to the message. If the Chair decides that motion to be out of order, I shall be constrained to take an appeal from that decision.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that the committee, when last in session, having had a resolution introduced which was not based upon the questions referred by the House to the committee, that it does not come up as unfinished business of a former session of the committee. The Chair is further of the opinion that the motion of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. SEYMOUR,] proposing to postpone a particular resolution to distribute the message, is not in order. The only legitimate course for the committee to pursue, the Chair thinks, is to proceed with these resolutions in the order in which they stand on the calendar.

Mr. SEYMOUR. I take an appeal from that decision.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The gentleman from New York, [Mr. SEYMOUR,] as I understand it, proposes to lay aside the resolutions introduced by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means and an amendment proposed by himself to one of those resolutions. Does the Chair decide that motion to be out of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides that it is not in order to move to lay aside those resolutions unless the whole message goes with it. It is upon the same principle as when a bill is pending in the House and an amendment thereto: if a motion be made to lay that amendment upon the table, and the motion prevail, it carries with it the whole bill.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I want to make one single inquiry. The effect of the motion is to be decided hereafter. The right to make that motion has never been questioned in committee. In my opinion the Chair is clearly in error in deciding that the gentleman from New York [Mr. SEYMOUR] has not the right to make a motion to lay aside these resolutions.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RICHARDSON] is clearly right in saying the right to make the motion has never been questioned; for if the Chair is correct, such motion has never been made in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. The Chair adheres to its decision. From that decision the gentleman from New York [Mr. SEYMOUR] appeals.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I made a point of order which comes up first. I desire to appeal from the decision of the Chair—if it is competent for me to do so—upon the point I made, that the business pending when the committee rose was so much of the President's message as relates to Kossuth and the resolution in regard to it. That resolution was not disposed of yesterday, and, as I understand it, comes up here as unfinished business to-day, and is the regular order. The Chair, as I understand him, decides that it does not so come up. From that decision I desire to appeal.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point made by the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. CLINGMAN,] The Chair will state further, that one of the resolutions before the committee proposes to make a reference of so much of the message as relates to Louis Kossuth. The resolution to which the gentleman from North Carolina refers, as having been before the committee at a previous sitting, has no relation to and does not connect itself with the President's message at all.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Whether it relates to the President's message or not, it is before the committee under the Chairman's own decision. I care not whether it is connected with the message; it has come up before the committee, and stands as the unfinished business. It is upon that ground that I take an appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides that the President's message, and the resolution of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, are now the business before the committee. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SEYMOUR] moves to lay aside all of the message except so much as relates to Louis Kossuth, and to proceed to the consideration of that part of it. The Chair decides that the motion is not in order, and from that decision the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. CLINGMAN] appeals.

Mr. CLINGMAN. The Chair misunderstands me. My point is, that the resolution under consideration yesterday is now the regular business before the committee. I understand the Chair decides differently. It is from that decision that I take an appeal.

The CHAIRMAN. The rules of the House prescribe the mode of proceeding in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and those rules prescribe that the business shall be taken up in the order in which it is referred and stands upon the calendar. The committee cannot go back, as the Chair conceives, and take up anything as unfinished business, but must take up the business as it stands upon the calendar, as the rule prescribes.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I desire to ask a single question.

The CHAIRMAN. There is an appeal now pending which was taken by the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. CLINGMAN,] The question is, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Committee?"

Mr. RICHARDSON. But I desire to ask the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. CLINGMAN] a question in relation to this very matter. I think that gentleman is clearly wrong in the point he has made. I submit to that gentleman if, when the compromise measures were before the last Congress, it was not the invariable practice of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to take up the business as it stood on the calendar at each sitting and lay it aside? I think, according to the invariable practice of the committee, the course proposed by the gentleman from North Carolina is wrong; and that proposed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SEYMOUR] is right.

Mr. GENTRY. I desire to ask one question. Did not the House this morning decide that all debate in Committee of the Whole upon the state of the Union should cease upon this resolution in a half hour after the committee commenced its session, and that the committee should proceed to vote upon this resolution? If this is so, I submit if the House has not decided these questions about which there seems to be so much difficulty?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The resolution was then read, as follows:

Resolved, That all debate in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, upon so much of the President's message as relates to Louis Kossuth, shall terminate in one half hour after the committee shall again resume its consideration, (if the committee shall not sooner come to a conclusion on the same,) and the committee shall then proceed to vote on such propositions as may be pending, or offered, in reference to the same, and shall then report it to the House, with such propositions as may have been agreed to by the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will remark, that the resolution provides for terminating the debate upon so much of the message as relates to Louis Kossuth; but the entire message is before the committee, and the resolution does not terminate debate upon any other portion of the message.

Mr. CARTER. I wish to ask this question: I want to know whether any motion can be made which, in the judgment of the Chair, will be in order; and which will bring that portion of the President's message relating to Kossuth before the committee?

The CHAIRMAN. If the Chairman were a member upon the floor, there are several motions which he thinks he could make in order, but he does not deem it his province to instruct gentlemen as to the proper motions to be made. It is his duty to state to the committee the business as it comes up; and the good sense and knowledge of gentlemen will certainly enable gentlemen to proceed with the business of the committee.

Mr. FICKLIN. In connection with these questions of order, I ask that the last paragraph on page 150 of the Manual, be read.

Mr. CABELL. We seem to be in the midst of great confusion. I move that the committee do now rise; and upon that motion I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. FULLER and WILLIAMS were appointed.

The question was then taken, and the tellers reported—ayes 36, noes 86.

So the committee refused to rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is now upon the appeal of the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. CLINGMAN,]

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York. Before the question is taken, I ask of the Chair if two appeals can be taken at the same time?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina appealed from the decision of the Chair before the gentleman from New York submitted his; but it was not put to the House, and is therefore, now, the only one pending.

Mr. FICKLIN. I now ask that the paragraph in the Manual be read.

The CHAIRMAN. It will be read, if no objection is made.

A MEMBER objected.

The question now being "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Committee?" tellers were demanded and ordered; and Messrs. MARSHALL of Kentucky, and ORR were appointed.

The question was then taken, and the tellers reported—ayes 36, noes 75—no quorum.

[Cries of "Call the roll!" and "Recount!"]

Mr. CLEVELAND. I call for another count. The CHAIRMAN. Another count is called for. If there is no objection, it will be done.

[Cries "I object!" "I object!" all over the House.]

The CHAIRMAN said the roll would be called to ascertain the names of the absentees.

The roll was then called and the absentees noted. The committee rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the Chairman of the Committee [Mr. JONES, of Tennessee] reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had the state of the Union generally under consideration, and especially the President's message; and having found itself without a quorum, caused the roll to be called, and had instructed him to report the facts to the House, with the names of the absentees.

The CHAIRMAN also stated that Mr. HOUSTON, of Alabama, is confined to his rooms by sickness, and that he had been requested to state that fact to the House.

A quorum being now present, the committee resumed its session; and the question being taken on the appeal of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. CLINGMAN] from the decision of the Chair, the tellers (Messrs. MARSHALL, of Kentucky, and ORR) reported—ayes 29, noes 89.

So the appeal was sustained, and the decision of the Chair overruled.

The CHAIRMAN. By this decision the committee have decided that the message of the President of the United States is not before the committee; but that the resolution introduced to the committee when last in session by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. CARTER,] proposing to appoint a committee of five to receive Louis Kossuth, is before the committee; and upon that question the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DISNEY] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. I rise to a question of order. I do not understand that the committee has decided that the President's message is not before the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair stated distinctly that the message was before the committee. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. CLINGMAN] made a question of order that the resolution of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. CARTER,] introduced to the committee on a former occasion, was the business before the committee as unfinished business at its last session. The Chair decided against him; and from that decision an appeal was taken, and the committee overruled the Chair. The Chair is therefore constrained to say that the resolution is now before the committee as the unfinished business.

Mr. STANTON. I am not disposed to appeal from the decision of the Chair that the President's message is not a part of the question before the committee, being satisfied that the statement of the Chairman cannot alter the facts.

Mr. DISNEY. Had it been the pleasure of the House on yesterday to have permitted me to speak when I first obtained the floor, I should probably then have said much, very much, in relation to the merits of the resolution before the committee, which I shall now refrain from uttering. I shall now abstain from presenting any extended views. I see around me indications too evident to allow me to doubt the propriety and, indeed, absolute necessity of action instead of debate. Influenced by considerations of this sort, and animated by a desire to bring this matter to a final decision, I will not avail myself of the privilege of discussion even to the extent which I may under the resolution, limited as it is to one half hour. I propose to trespass upon the patience of the committee but for a very brief period indeed; but I regret the conclusions to which I have been forced to come in this respect, and the mode in which circumstances will compel me to handle the subject, the less, because, independently of all other incidental questions and of the various views in which this matter may be presented, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GENTRY] has in fact practically presented the entire actual question before the House for its decision. It is a wise and safe rule which teaches us that when we have one point upon which a case may be properly decided, we never should seek for another. But as I have obtained the floor, and may, under the rules, occupy the attention of the committee for a few moments, I will take the occasion, before I sit down, to utter some sentiments. It may be that they are peculiar to myself; that may be so; they are at least quite different from the general course of remark I heard yesterday uttered in this Hall—I allude, sir, to the idea of intervention. And here, once for all, let me say in advance, that intervention stalks no spectre in my path. It cannot startle me from my notions of right and wrong; but as I shall say something upon this part of the matter before I take my seat, I will, in the first place, ask leave to address myself to some of the questions of order, which I see evidently will, when this committee rises, be raised in the House for its decision. First, it is objected that this resolution is not properly before the committee. Now, every one at all familiar with parliamentary law and the history of the origin of committees, knows that all committees, of whatever character, whether special, select, or standing, have full power to act in each and every case upon such subjects as may be embraced in the general scope of the authority conferred upon them by the rule or order creating and establishing them, as well as in all other matters which may be specially referred to them by order of the House. Committees of the Whole were constituted for particular purposes. They were to relieve the legislative body from the rigor of the common laws, if I may so express myself; to place the House in its address; to permit it to consider the subject on two different occasions—the one with freedom and with ease, unrestrained and untied down by these formal ceremonies or principles of the law; and in the other case, to consider it according to the rules and ceremonies which custom, reason, and, I may add, common sense combined, have established for the government of legislative bodies. The very essence and existence of committees of the whole are to be found in the freedom with which you can discuss and handle subjects. One attribute of all committees is, that when any particular subject may have been referred to them, they may act with regard to it, and, in the language of the law, report upon it either by bill or otherwise. Read the Manual, and you will find that when any paper or subject is referred to the committee, they may originate matter concerning it, either by resolution or by bill, and report it to the body who has appointed such committee. In truth, as I understand this matter, it seems to be conceded upon all hands, that if the subject-matter of this thing shall be fairly before the committee—that is, the subject out of which the resolution may have legitimately grown, or may legitimately grow—that then the resolution may be acted on, and properly reported to the House. That being conceded, the only question that remains for us to inquire into is simply whether there is now legally before this committee any subject-matter out of which a resolution of this sort can come? The House has decided this question. I flatter myself, if I had been heard upon this subject yesterday, that I could have convinced gentlemen that the introduction of the resolution was right, because such subject-matter did exist; but I am saved the necessity of the attempt to-day, by the decision which this House came to this morning, in relation to a resolution offered by the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. CLINGMAN,] by and in which you asserted and decided that so much of the President's message as relates to Louis Kossuth, was and is before this committee, and that out of it this resolution has grown. I say, that point is already decided by the resolution of the gentleman from North Carolina; but I waive all these positions. They are not necessary or essential to the decision of this question. The latitude to which I have adverted, as belonging to committees of the whole, is established and known to the law. Still you, by your usages and rules, have not been content with that, but have gone further, and created another committee of the whole, with higher and broader privileges, and less restrained in regard to the freedom of debate, or its mode and manner of procedure. You have not only a Committee of the Whole, but you have a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—a committee unknown to the common law, and in which you exercise a latitude of debate sanctioned by immemorial usage unknown even to those allowed even in committees of the whole.

What is your every-day practice, no matter what particular subject may be the matter pending before the committee? A gentleman rises in his place, and presents his views upon any subject within the range of human comprehension. He does not talk at all about the matter upon which he is going to vote. He is tied down by none of the rules of order as generally known to the common law. He is not put down by those motions and actions which usually govern committees of the whole. As we have been told here, the practice of the House has been to originate bills in this committee, as in the case stated by the gentleman of a bill being introduced in the committee for the admission of California. It originated in the committee, consequently in conformity to the general provisions to which I have alluded before in regard to the powers of the committee. Then, in my judgment, it is sufficient to rest this matter upon the general fact, that the Committee of the Whole upon the state of the Union, having the Union generally under consideration, and this matter pertaining to the official action of the Government—having relation to the Government as a Government—is within the scope and authority of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. But I will not trespass further upon this point. Time flies rapidly. Another objection is raised, and it is, that the resolution proposes to refer a subject to the action of another committee. I apprehend that the gentlemen who read that resolution carefully will find it proposes no such thing. It does not propose that this committee shall refer any subject to the action of another committee; for I admit, in that it is well established that no committee—neither the Committee of the Whole, nor any standing or select committee—can refer a matter of which it has the charge to any other committee. Does this resolution propose to do any such thing? I apprehend not. What is that resolution when fairly and fully written out? "Resolved by the House of Representatives, That a committee be appointed," &c. I know not whether the technical phraseology is in the resolution or not; but if it be there, gentlemen will discover afterwards, upon the very face of the resolution, that it does not propose that this committee shall refer this matter to another committee; but it proposes that the House shall refer this subject to the action of the proposed committee—a committee to be raised by the order of the House. This committee is only discussing the propriety of recommending to the House this matter. But, sir, I stated, when I got up, I had no intention of trespassing long upon the attention of the committee. I feel myself, and I know that in that feeling I participate with a vast majority of the members of this House, that the committee will prefer action rather than either words or ideas.

But before I take my seat, I must say that I feel also that, in justice to myself, I ought to enter my dissent from the doctrines and opinions advanced upon this floor yesterday in reference to the reception of this distinguished person. It has been intimated that favorable action upon this poor resolution involves some matter of principle—that it will commit the House to the doctrines advanced by Louis Kossuth. I was pleased to hear the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations admit that, in his judgment, it involved no such committal. Nor does it. I apprehend that this is the sound conclusion to which every gentleman will come, and must come, who sits down and calmly looks over the whole matter. What are the facts before us in regard to this subject? You have invited him to your country; you have passed resolutions inviting him to your seat of Government; and now the only question before this committee to decide is, whether you will appoint a committee of a few gentlemen as a part of the arrangement to introduce him? It is objected by some that he is a foreigner, and they do not desire to be taught the doctrines of republicanism, or the true policy of our foreign relations, or the principles of our institutions of government, by foreigners. How very alarming! how well founded! But, really, is there anything to startle us from our propriety? What are the bare and naked facts? Here comes a man under the circumstances I have stated—a man who needs no eulogy from my hands. I attempt no eulogy upon Louis Kossuth. I make none. No, sir; no. No, I shall do no such silly, foolish thing. He is too far beyond my power of praise. He has written his own eulogy. He has written his name—he has written himself a MAN upon the historic page of the present age, and he has written it in the broad character of living, enduring light, which will be read as long as the history of the human race is read. He is beyond all eulogy at my hands. His fame will be perpetual, no matter what may be the action which we may take in regard to this petty resolution. I say petty, because it contemplates a ceremony involving nothing of principle, but, as the gifted gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GENTRY] so forcibly and eloquently said, does involve somewhat of our own dignity.

It is objected that he, a stranger, comes forward and advocates doctrines gentlemen cannot assent to. Sir, he would be false to his mission, coming here to beg for his suffering and down-trodden country, if he did not seek to obtain your aid by every means and argument that the powers of his mighty intellect could suggest. Great as Louis Kossuth is, he comes here in a mightier character than even all of his own ennobling qualities can make him. He comes here as the representative of a people. It is a nation that talks to you when Kossuth speaks. Hungary appeals to you through him. Read the page of history from the earliest time, and nothing is more common than missions for assistance from one people to another. But our Government is peculiar. On the continent of Europe, where monarchies and kingly crowns exist, these missions are settled in the audience of the Prime Minister, who, under those Governments, represents the Government and the power of the nation; but we have no such government here. A man to reach this Government must appeal to the representatives of the people; and it is for this that Louis Kossuth seeks to address himself to you, and if possible, to persuade you, by every means and argument, to his convictions. Is there anything wrong in this? Is there anything indelicate in it? Is there anything in it to startle gentlemen in the fear that they may subject themselves to the charge that they were learning the doctrines of American republicanism at the hands of a foreigner? I repeat it, that he would be false to his mission if he did not seek to have an audience before you—you the representatives of this mighty Republic—and if possible, to convince you of the righteousness of his cause; to enlist your sympathy and aid in his behalf. This is his object, and for it he desires to make his appeal. Are we afraid that he will convince us? Are we afraid that if we are convinced in the cause of human freedom, and in relation to the great rights of nations, that if we acknowledge the fact that the confession will involve some cost? And shall we shrink under such an apprehension? Such is not the temper of the American people. No one believes more sincerely and cordially than I do in the profound wisdom of the doctrines laid down by the early founders of our Government. Interference with foreign nations in our infant condition would have been unwise, so the men who formed that Government understood it, and hence the Father of his Country distinctly recommended us to avoid them. The recommendation at the time was wise, but the principle was but the principle of policy. It was, as I have said, wise, just, sound, and becoming in a nation of some three millions of inhabitants; but, sir, it would not be wise in a nation of twenty-five millions of people, with a commerce spreading itself throughout the globe, with powers hardly yet developed, but developing themselves with a rapidity which amazes and startles both. Sir, never in my life did I feel prouder of myself as an American citizen than when I read the letter of the present distinguished Secretary of State to the Austrian. It has been my lot, it may have been my misfortune, to have differed with that gentleman all my life in reference to other questions, yet I confess that my blood in my veins tingled to my finger ends under the glow of patriotic admiration as I read that specimen of noble American pride—that expression of a just consciousness of American power, as well as of American right. The records of your negotiations heretofore are marked by a creeping caution, a fear of giving offence, and a shrinking, no evidence of which you find in the letter to which I now refer, and which spoke out as became not only a Republic, but as became a nation of twenty-five millions of freemen, freemen proud of their character, and, if it please you, sir, proud, in a righteous cause, of their power, too.

Mr. WILLIAMS. With the permission of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. DISNEY,] I desire to ask him a question. The distinguished gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BAYLY] announced to the House yesterday, seemingly with great pleasure, that there were not twenty members in this Congress that indorsed the doctrines of Louis Kossuth. I thought then that he was mistaken, and I desire now to ask the gentleman from Ohio whether we are to understand him as indorsing the doctrines of Louis Kossuth?

Mr. DISNEY. If the gentleman will honor me by listening to my remarks, he will understand precisely where I stand.

I desire, then, to say briefly and rapidly—for I will trespass but little longer upon the committee—that, in my opinion, the day has gone by when this country may wrap itself up in its own selfishness and have nothing to do with the affairs of other nations. I regretted to hear, on yesterday, the sentiment advanced by the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. VENABLE,] that the nations of the earth that had no liberty, deserved to have none. God cannot love the wretch he starves.

Mr. VENABLE. The gentleman misunderstood me: I said that they were not ready for liberty.

Mr. DISNEY. My time is nearly out; I must hasten. Sir, we are a living antagonism to the despotic Governments of Europe, and they never can have peace and quiet there so long as this country exists with the prosperity and happiness with which it now exists. There is not a steam-packet which floats upon the waves of the broad Atlantic, as it bears the letters from emigrants in this country to their friends on the European continent, but carries the seeds of liberty to that continent. There is not a gale which wafts your commerce across the ocean—there is hardly a billow which breaks upon its broad bed which does not bear upon its bosom the seeds of republicanism as they are borne upon their way to Europe's despotic shores. The very pictures of happiness and prosperity existing in this country, as the emigrants here describe them, must favorably impress their friends in Europe as to the effect of republican institutions. These letters are read throughout the neighborhoods to which they are dispatched, and thus we are hourly furnishing a constant and steady supply of republican thoughts to the people of Europe. And, sir, when our institutions are having this constant effect upon Europe, it is all idle for you to shrink back and say, that because your immediate, peculiar, and personal interests are not directly and immediately concerned, that you will not interfere. Such is not the law of nature; it is not the law of God; it is not the law which God himself has stamped upon humanity.

In our daily pursuits, how often does the sentiment to which I have adverted rise up in the bosom of every man, and tempt him to step aside and do that which the instinct of which I speak tells him is right? This country cannot wrap herself up in any such miserable, selfish policy as would refuse every generous appeal. This country has a mission to fulfill. It is a high and noble one; and though some of us may seek to postpone the hour, yet it is rolling on—destiny impels us onward, and the time must come, and will come, when our institutions will come in conflict with those of the despotic Governments of Europe. The battle must be fought. It would require no very great ingenuity to show by argument that it even may be sound policy, even in an interested and selfish point of view, to interfere when any great infraction of the laws of nations shall have been perpetrated by any of the great monarchical Governments. The laws of nations are but the laws of right, as established by common sense and sanctioned by human reason; and when these laws are violated and trampled down by the strong arm of power, it is the duty alike of nations and of individuals to protest against the outrage.

It is not necessary that I should refer here to particular cases. I have not the time. But it is both the right and duty of the Government to lay down her broad and general principles of right, and to protest against the wrong; and if the protest shall be disregarded, it will be time sufficient for the country to determine upon its course when that hour arrives and the case presents itself. But, in my humble judgment, looking to the power and the future destiny of this country, it is its bounden duty, in the position which it occupies on the theatre of the world, to protest at any and every and at all times against any and every of those terrible infractions of the laws of nations that may be and sometimes are perpetrated by the hands of power; and I would protest against them, no matter how great or formidable may be the guilty power. It does not follow as a matter of course, that because you protest against infractions of the sort, you are therefore bound to intervene with armed force upon all occasions. No, sir; you place yourself right before the world by the protest. You give the moral power of your position to the doctrines which you announce; and if the particular case does indeed require it, why then you can intervene—aye, if necessity or honor calls, intervene by force of arms. Having exhausted the time allotted to me, and thus hurriedly, rapidly, and imperfectly expressed my views, I take my seat.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio. I have not time now to reply to the remarks of my colleague, [Mr. DISNEY;] I will, however, send to the Clerk's desk an extract, which I wish to have read to the committee, from one who, though dead, yet liveth, I trust, in the hearts of his countrymen; it is from the Farewell Address of Washington.

The Clerk then read the following extract:

"The great rule of conduct for us in regard to foreign nations, is in extending our commercial relations, to have with them as little political connection as possible. So far as we have already formed engagements, let them be fulfilled with perfect good faith. Here let it stop.

"Europe has a set of primary interests, which to us have none, or a very remote relation. Hence she must be engaged in frequent controversies, the causes of which are essentially foreign to our concerns. Hence, therefore, it must be unwise in us to implicate ourselves by artificial ties, in the ordinary vicissitudes of her politics, or the ordinary combinations and collisions of her friendships or enmities.

"Our detached and distant situation invites and enables us to pursue a different course. If we remain one people, under an efficient government, the period is not far off when we may defy material injury from external annoyance; when we may take such an attitude, as will cause the neutrality we may at any time resolve upon, to be scrupulously respected; when belligerent nations, under the impossibility of making acquisitions upon us, will not hazard the giving us provocation; when we may choose peace or war, as our interest, guided by justice, shall counsel.

"Why forego the advantages of so peculiar a situation? Why quit our own to stand upon foreign ground? Why by interweaving our destiny with that of any part of Europe, entangle our peace and prosperity in the toils of European ambition, rivalry, interest, humor, or caprice?"

Mr. CAMPBELL, (resuming.) No better argument can be presented by any living man, upon the proposition just made by my colleague, [Mr. DISNEY,] than the one which has been read at the desk. I do not propose now to add to it a single word. But I do desire to understand from my colleague fully and unequivocally the extent to which he proposes to go. I desire to know from him whether it is his design to advocate the doctrine of intervention, as it has been proposed by Louis Kossuth in the various speeches that he has made? I desire to know from him whether he intends to advocate the position that this Government shall declare to Russia, in the event of a struggle between Hungary and Austria, that she shall not interpose; and whether he would be prepared to back that declaration by war?

Mr. CARTER (rising to a question of order) inquired whether the half hour allowed by the resolution closing debate had not expired?

The CHAIRMAN stated that it had just expired.

The resolution and the pending amendment were then reported, as follows, viz:

Resolved, That a committee of five be appointed by the Speaker to wait upon Louis Kossuth and introduce him to the House of Representatives.

Mr. VENABLE had moved to strike out all after the word "resolved," and to insert,

"That the Speaker be authorized to invite Louis Kossuth to a privileged seat within the House."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it proper, under the curious circumstances under which the committee is now acting, to state, that in the opinion of the Chair the resolution which was adopted in the House this morning terminating debate upon "so much of the President's message as relates to Louis Kossuth," does not apply to the resolution now under consideration. The Chair is of that opinion, because this resolution does not connect itself with the message by any language which is contained in it.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I appeal from that decision.

Several Voices. "You cannot get the floor."

Mr. CLINGMAN. I have a right to appeal.

Loud cries of "Order!" "Order!"

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio. I have not yielded the floor, nor do I design to do so unless I am decided to be out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair made the point of order himself, and stated it to the House, and he thinks that gentlemen have a right to appeal. The question now is, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?" If the decision of the Chair shall be overruled; it will be regarded by the Chair as a decision that this resolution of the gentleman from Ohio, with the pending amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina, is before the committee, and that the resolution adopted by the House terminating debate upon so much of the President's message as relates to Louis Kossuth, should be applied to that resolution.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. Is the appeal debatable?

The CHAIRMAN. As the question of order on which the appeal is taken grew out of a resolution to close debate, the appeal, in the opinion of the Chair, is not debatable.

Mr. ORR demanded tellers on the appeal; which were ordered, and Messrs. VENABLE and WILLIAMS appointed.

The question was then taken on the appeal, and the tellers reported—ayes 8, noes 99—no quorum voting.

Loud cries of "Call the roll!" "Call the roll!"

The roll was then called, and the absentees noted. The committee rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the chairman of the committee [Mr. JONES] reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had the Union generally under consideration, and, having found itself without a quorum, ordered the roll to be called, and instructed him to report this fact to the House, with the names of the absentees.

A quorum being now present, the committee resumed its session.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I move that the committee rise.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, demanded tellers; which were ordered, and Messrs. FOWLER and McMULLIN appointed.

The question was then taken, and the tellers reported—ayes 10, noes 95; no quorum voting.

[Cries—"Call the roll!" "Call the roll!"]

The roll was again called and the committee rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the chairman of the committee reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, having again found itself without a quorum, had caused the roll to be called, and instructed him to report the facts to the House, with the names of the absentees.

Mr. SWEETSER. I rise to a privileged motion. I move a reconsideration of the vote by which this House resolved to adjourn over until Friday.

The SPEAKER. No motion is now in order under the rules and practice of this House. A quorum of the House being now present, the chairman of the committee will resume the chair.

Mr. KING, of Rhode Island. Would it be in order to move a call of the House?

The SPEAKER. No business is now in order before the House.

A quorum being now present, the committee resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now before the committee is on the appeal taken from the decision of the Chair by the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. CLINGMAN.]

Mr. LETCHER. I move that the committee rise, and report the resolution offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CARTER] to the House, with instructions that it pass.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion of the gentleman from Virginia is not now in order. The question is upon the appeal taken by the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. CLINGMAN.]

Mr. ORR. I move that the committee rise. It is getting late.

Mr. FOWLER. I rise to a point of order. It is this: We have just taken the question upon rising, and no business has been done since. It cannot be in order to move that same question again at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts is mistaken.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. As I understand it, the committee rose for want of a quorum while there was an appeal pending.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina moves that the committee now rise.

Mr. CARTER demanded tellers; which were ordered, and Messrs. CARTER and Brooks were appointed.

The question was then taken, and the tellers reported—ayes 52, noes 85.

So the committee refused to rise.

The question now being upon the appeal taken by the gentleman from North Carolina,

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky, demanded tellers; which were ordered, and Messrs. CARTER and Fowler were appointed.

The question was then taken, and the tellers reported—ayes 5—and while the noes were being counted—

Mr. CLEVELAND said, I rise for the purpose of asking the Chair to discharge his duties according to the rules of the House.

[Cries of "Order!" "Order!" "Order!"]

Mr. CLEVELAND. But I ask—

[Cries of "Order!" "Order!" "Order!" all over the House.]

Mr. CLEVELAND. Mr. Chairman, may I ask—

[Cries of "Order!" "Order!" and great confusion.]

The tellers then reported the vote on the appeal of the gentleman from North Carolina, and there were—ayes 5, noes 89. No quorum voting.

Mr. CLEVELAND. Yesterday, sir, we listened to—[Cries of "Order!" "Order!" "Hear!" "Hear!" and great confusion in the Hall.]

Mr. CLEVELAND. I call upon the Chair to enforce the rule which requires that every member in his seat shall vote.

[Cries of "Order!" "Order!"]

Mr. CLEVELAND. I find many of those who were yesterday denouncing the friends of the resolution as violators of the Constitution and the rules, now sitting in their seats and doing that of which they accused those who differed with them in opinion merely.

[Cries of "Order!" "Order!" and great confusion.]

Mr. CLEVELAND. It is alike disgraceful to the House and the country.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Connecticut come to order? No debate is in order.

[Great noise and confusion.]

Mr. RIDDLE. I move that the House do now adjourn. [Laughter and great confusion.]

The CHAIRMAN said, that the roll would be called, to ascertain the names of the absentees.

The roll was then called, and the absentees noted. The committee rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the chairman of the committee reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, having found itself without a quorum, had ordered the roll to be called, and instructed him to report the facts to the House, with the names of the absentees.

A quorum being now present, the committee resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?

Mr. MARSHALL. I move that the committee rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?

Mr. MARSHALL. I move that the committee rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee? The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee? The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?

Mr. DEAN. I would like to make an inquiry: Have we not a rule in this House, that every member must vote?

The CHAIRMAN. That is the rule of the House, but I have never yet seen any one forced to vote.

Mr. McMULLIN. We are not governed by rules. You voted down all rules.

The CHAIRMAN. The decision of the Chair is, that the resolution adopted in the House, terminating debate upon so much of the President's message as relates to Louis Kossuth, is not applicable, and does not stop the debate upon the resolution, which the committee had before it.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Do I understand the Chair that we cannot make a motion to rise?

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee? The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee? The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?

Mr. VENABLE. If the Chair will pardon me, I rise to make a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. There is one point of order already pending.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I beg the House will indulge me for a moment—

[Cries of "I object!" "I object!" "I object!"]

Mr. STEPHENS. I wish to say a word to the committee, if they will indulge me. I will on this question vote to make a quorum, in order that the Chair can entertain a proposition that the committee rise. As the case now stands the motion cannot be made.

The CHAIRMAN. The question will be again taken by tellers.

The tellers (Messrs. CARTER and Fowler) having resumed their places, the question was again taken, and there were—ayes 35, noes 99.

The CHAIRMAN. The decision of the Chair is overruled, and the committee determines that the resolution adopted this morning, terminating debate and discharging the Committee of the Whole from the consideration of so much of the President's message as relates to Louis Kossuth, applies to and terminates debate upon the question now pending in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BOCK. I move that the committee rise.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, demanded tellers; which were ordered, and Messrs. MEACHAM and VENABLE were appointed.

The question was then taken; and there were 61 ayes and 83 noes.

So the committee refused to rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. VENABLE,] to strike out all after the word "resolved," in the original resolution, and to insert the following, viz:

That the Speaker be authorized to invite Louis Kossuth to a privileged seat within this House.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I move to reconsider the vote by which the decision of the Chair was reversed.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair must remind the gentleman that a motion to reconsider cannot be made in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. I offer the following amendment to the original resolution:

Provided, That by the adoption of the pending resolution this Government does not depart from its long-established doctrine of non-intervention; and does not intend to indorse the doctrine of Kossuth, if that doctrine be direct interference by this Government with foreign Powers.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio. I must insist upon it that I am entitled to the floor. [Laughter.] At the time the question of order was raised I had the floor, and proposed to amend the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. VENABLE.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. CAMPBELL] will recollect that he was occupying the floor under the half-hour rule, when he was arrested in his speech, and the committee determined that he could not proceed under the rule. Of course he was cut off, and did not have the floor.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I beg leave to say to the Chair, that I distinctly stated at the time that I desired to introduce an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman cannot be prevented hereafter from offering his amendment. He is certainly, in the opinion of the Chair, not entitled to the floor, as, under the time which was assigned before, the half-hour had expired. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. CHURCHWELL] offers his amendment to the amendment.

Mr. BROOKS called for the reading of the amendment as amended.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that the amendment relating to Kossuth, and the doctrines he has maintained, is in order.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. Mr. Chairman, the amendment which I offer is intended as an addition to the resolution. I do not desire to oppose the proposition to welcome Kossuth; but I do desire to inform him that in giving this welcome Congress does not intend to indorse the views which he seems to entertain. The honorable gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. DISNEY,] while he declares himself to be in favor of direct interference by this Government, asks if we are afraid to encounter the spectre of non-interference in our path. I can answer that gentleman—we have no fear, nor have the people I have the honor to represent. They are the people of Jackson—liberal, generous, and brave. Nor am I, sir, to be frightened from the path of duty. I come with liberal views, and when I say that my heart is full of sympathy for those who struggle in the Old World for a change of government, and manifest a desire to adopt the institutions under which we have grown prosperous and powerful, I only express the feelings of my people. We should be glad to see the institutions which we so much prize, and which are so dear to us, established throughout the civilized world. But while we entertain these views and are animated by these feelings, I do not feel prepared to go the length which Kossuth seems to desire. I am not willing to see resolutions adopted by this Assembly touching the great question of intervention, without expressing my dissent.

There are no people who are more generous in their feelings than those that I have the honor to represent; but while they would be willing to welcome the distinguished Hungarian, they would not agree that he should be the recipient of the nation's honor if by that honor gentlemen mean to indorse his views. The high position of our Republic demands that we do not compromise its dignity. The teachings of that man who is without a model, the immortal WASHINGTON, who speaks to us from yonder canvas as though animate with life—the recollection of JEFFERSON, the sagacious statesman—the memory of JACKSON, who rests in the bosom of his mother earth at the Hermitage in my own native State,—forbid us to take a step which has no parallel in the records of the history of our country.

Kossuth asks, yea, demands the aid of the young American giant in his behalf. Sir, for such direct interference I am not prepared, nor are the American people. We have advanced to the high station we now occupy, commanding respect both at home and abroad, by adhering to our Constitution and respecting the precepts of the sages who framed it. Sir, suppose we give him our sympathy as it was given four years ago to the French people, who it was supposed were anxious to enjoy free institutions, will you not bestow it unworthily? Grant that you give him the nation's sympathy, give him men, give him money—for like Cæsar he demands them—and who can foresee the result? May we not expect to behold in a few years the novel spectacle of Kossuth being crowned Emperor of the Republic of Hungary? We gave our sympathy to the French people. Bonaparte is a Republican Emperor. France is not free.

We are happy and independent. We have always recognized the feeling of independence wherever manifested, and given it our countenance without interference. And, sir, let us, for the high respect we entertain for the honored dead, pause, and consider the step we are now invited to take. For myself, I am opposed to the adoption of the resolution unamended; and I am unwilling that it shall go to the country, especially after the eloquent speech of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. DISNEY], in favor of direct international interference, without the expression of my dissent. Kossuth has been honored on his way to the capital. More fortunate than most men in adversity, he has been taken by the hand and welcomed by our distinguished men; grey-headed men—men who have grown up with the Republic, and whose heads are crowned with laurels for services in defence of the cause of liberty in their country, have taken him by the hand and given him a hearty welcome to our shores. The Empire City has done him honor. The roar of the American cannon has scarcely died away that announced his arrival. What more can he ask? It is true he has been unfortunate in the controversy at home; but are we prepared to undertake to restore him? The Bourbons were long out of power.

There seems to be a strange, wild infatuation pervading this assembly. Indeed, sir, I am at a loss to conjecture from what political wardrobe gentlemen have dressed themselves within the last few days. I well recollect that before I had the honor of a seat upon this floor, there were resolutions introduced here proposing to furnish "material aid" for the Mexican war, in which our own country was justly engaged. Sir, there are gentlemen here who voted against those resolutions who are now the advocates of that which is before us. I feel a license to speak freely on this subject, because, with others of both the Senate and the House, I have united to give a banquet in honor of the distinguished stranger.

Mr. BISSELL. I desire to say one word upon the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee. It is too indefinite, and I cannot vote for it. I intended to vote, and still intend to vote for the original resolution, or something like it—designing thereby simply to render an act of courtesy to a distinguished individual—nothing more, nothing less. I wish this explanation to go forth to the country, that in voting for the resolution I mean to do nothing more than I have stated. But I am free to say, also, that Louis Kossuth has advanced some doctrines here which I am not prepared to sanction. While I make this declaration, however, I admit he has advanced other doctrines and principles in regard to intervention and non-intervention, which I am willing to indorse. I believe in the right to act precisely as Kossuth seems to desire it should. I am willing, when the time comes that makes it necessary, be it sooner or later, that our Government should make such declaration formally as Kossuth desires. But the time has not come, and there is nothing existing which calls for it. I am willing to pass the naked resolution, therefore, not coupling it with any conditions, explanations, or qualifications. Whenever the occasion arrives—I trust it may never come—which will make it important or necessary for our Government to make such a declaration as Kossuth would have us to make now, and to follow up that declaration with war; if it is necessary, I am ready for it. But this amendment is too indefinite; and I should not know what I was voting for or against if I vote for that amendment. What is the well-established doctrine and principle of this Government in regard to non-intervention? Can that gentleman tell me? It would require many pages and almost a volume to tell us, what is the principle of this Government in regard to non-intervention. Again, what is the doctrine of Kossuth in regard to this subject? The hints he has thrown out are entirely too crude for me to form any very accurate and definite notions as to his own ideas upon this subject. If that amendment be adopted, as it now stands, who shall say that we are authorized to interfere even with the affairs of this continent? Suppose that England, France, or any other foreign Power, should attempt to subjugate Mexico, would we not be estopped from interfering in such a case, if we were to adopt that amendment? I say again, therefore, that the amendment is too indefinite; and, in voting upon it, I should not know what I was voting for or against.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Cries of "Question!" "Question!"

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York. Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN. No further debate is in order.

Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee. I desire to offer an amendment to the original resolution.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. VENABLE] was a substitute for the one introduced by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. CARTER.] The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. CHURCHWELL] proposes to amend the original resolution. It is perfectly in order to perfect the original resolution before the question is put upon a substitute.

Mr. HARRIS. That is precisely what I intend to do.

The CHAIRMAN. An amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. CHURCHWELL] is in order.

Mr. HARRIS. I offer the following as an amendment to the amendment:

And that said committee be instructed to inform Louis Kossuth (when they shall wait upon him) that the settled policy of this Government is: "Friendship with all nations—entangling alliances with none."

Mr. WILLIAMS. I would suggest to my colleague, [Mr. CHURCHWELL], that he withdraw his amendment, and let the question be taken upon the amendment of my other colleague, [Mr. HARRIS.]

The CHAIRMAN. That cannot be done except by unanimous consent.

Objection was made.

Mr. HARRIS. Then I move to insert my amendment as a substitute for the amendment of my colleague, [Mr. CHURCHWELL.]

Mr. HARRIS said: The whole course of Kossuth since he reached our shores has been characterized by an amount of candor and frankness that is at least worthy of our imitation. Immediately upon his arrival in this country he announces distinctly the mission upon which he comes. He tells you plainly that he comes not for the purpose of partaking of your empty hospitalities or your empty compliments, but that he comes in the character of a political propagandist—upon a political mission. He comes to ask this Government to interfere in the struggles that are going on in Europe; and after having thus distinctly announced to you his object, it is but natural that he should construe every act of courtesy that you extend to him, as an indorsement of that object; at all events, it is quite clear that he does so construe them. If gentlemen doubt this, I refer them to his speech at New York: in noticing the passage in the Senate of the resolution of welcome, he said "that it was said that the passage of this resolution had no political meaning; but THAT HE KNEW THAT IT HAD."

Indeed, sir, if this resolution passes without my amendment, while the speech of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. DISNEY], and the speeches of other gentlemen in favor of intervention are ringing in his ears, what can he understand from it but a declaration in favor of that policy?

Sir, in my opinion the time has come when we should understand ourselves, and let Kossuth, the country, and the civilized world, understand precisely how far we do intend to go in this matter. If it is the intention of the House to commit itself to the policy of intervention in the affairs of other Governments, vote down the amendment that I have proposed, and let Kossuth and the country understand that we no longer adhere to that principle of non-intervention taught us by a Washington and a Jefferson. But if, upon the other hand, it is intended to pay Kossuth a mere personal compliment, without indorsing the policy that he urges upon us, then adopt the amendment that I have offered, and deal fairly, candidly, and honestly with him, with the country, and with yourselves.

For myself, I desire to say, that while I am as ready as any gentleman upon this floor to extend to Kossuth a personal compliment, I am equally ready to resist to the last extremity upon this floor, any attempt to commit this Government to the desertion of that principle of non-intervention which we have cherished from the earliest infancy of our Government up to this hour. And if gentlemen intend no more than a personal compliment, why should they object to the adoption of this amendment, which tells him plainly and frankly, that that is what we intend—that it is all we intend? His frankness with us demands at least this much at our hands.

It is said by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. DISNEY], and others, that the principle of non-intervention was a very proper one for the adoption of this Government when an infant Republic, but not so now when we have grown to be a great and powerful nation.

My own opinion is, that the principles and policy which were then necessary for the healthful development of the genius and powers of the young republic, are equally necessary now, to protect the strength and purity of that Government when grown great and powerful; and if this principle was worthy of our adoption then—and experience has sanctioned its utility from that time to the present—it is certainly worthy of our maintenance, now and hereafter.

If, then, the House intends to do no more than pay to Louis Kossuth a personal compliment, they will join me in adopting this amendment; and in paying that compliment. But if it is the intention of the House to do more than this, let them vote down the amendment, and Kossuth and the country will understand it as a declaration upon the part of the House of Representatives of the American Congress, against that great and vital principle of non-intervention upon the part of this Government in the affairs of other governments, bequeathed to us as a rich and last political legacy by the Father of his Country.

Mr. CARTER. I do not rise for the purpose of prolonging this discussion, or, at least, for the purpose of following the vein of discussion sought to be introduced here by the amendment of my friend from Tennessee, [Mr. HARRIS.] The great mistake in his position, in connection with the resolution that has been offered, is the identifying of the line of political and national action with the subject of the resolution. Now I protest, as I did when I offered the resolution, that the committee should perform the naked office that it professes to perform—that it should not be incumbered with the doctrines of intervention or non-intervention. While I would not wish to see ingrafted upon it the doctrine of intervention, I protest against ingrafting upon it the doctrine of non-intervention.

Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a single question?

Mr. CARTER. Certainly.

Mr. HARRIS. Can the speech of the gentleman's colleague [Mr. DISNEY] be understood by Kossuth or the country in any other connection?

Mr. CARTER. They can understand just as much from the speech of my colleague as from the speech of the honorable gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. HARRIS], that neither of them represents the sentiments of the entire American people, and neither of them represents the sentiments of the entire House of Representatives! That is what they will understand. They will understand just as much by it as if the sentiment had been uttered by any other gentleman. But one thing has been said which is legitimate to the resolution by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. HARRIS.] That gentleman says that Louis Kossuth repudiates the honors we are about to pay to him. Now, I look in vain for any such avowal upon the part of Mr. Kossuth. It cannot be found in any of his speeches. But, on the other hand, every speech he has uttered breathes a spirit of pure devotion to the great principles of this nation, and pure devotion to the great American character, and an acknowledgment of gratitude in the receipt of American notice. That is the inference which I draw from all he has said; and I proposed the resolution in the first place, and I support it now, because I regard it as involving considerations only personal to Kossuth, although I protest that the resolution was not offered with a view of settling the principle of intervention or non-intervention. Yet it does incorporate the sentiment of the American heart, that it sympathizes always and everywhere with the sentiment of liberty; and that it sympathizes always with every person who may be involved in the misfortunes of oppression. Now, that is the real soul of the resolution; and I hope the friends of it, whatever may be their feelings in relation to intervention or non-intervention, will suffer this simple tribute, thus unincumbered, to go forth from this Hall without attempting to ingraft upon it the principle of non-intervention. I shall vote against the amendment."

[Here the hammer fell.]

The question now being on the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. HARRIS] to the amendment of his colleague [Mr. CHURCHWELL,] tellers were demanded and ordered, and Messrs. CLINGMAN and HALL were appointed.

The question was then taken, and the tellers reported—ayes 82, noes 53.

So the amendment was adopted.

The question then was on the adoption of the amendment as amended.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, called for tellers; which were ordered, and Messrs. PENN and HUNTER appointed.

The question being then taken, there were—ayes 71, noes 77.

So the amendment as amended was not agreed to.

Mr. COBB moved to amend the original resolution by inserting after the word "Kossuth," the words "and his associates in exile."

Mr. C. said: I desire it to be distinctly understood that I intend to vote for the original resolution; but at the same time my sympathies are not confined to the distinguished chieftain. Whilst we remember the epaulettes, let us not forget the knapsack. Whilst I admire Louis Kossuth as much as any man upon this floor, my sympathies do not stop there. I admire also those of his gallant associates who are now in this city with him; and I contend that it would be a personal indignity to those brave men to confine our invitation to the distinguished individual whose name now stands alone in the resolution. If you will revert to the language of the resolution adopted by the last Congress, you will see that Kossuth and his associates in exile were invited to come to our shores. They are here to-day; and shall we make a distinction between them? I offer this resolution in good faith. I hope it will be adopted. I trust that when Kossuth is admitted to this Hall, his companions in exile will be admitted likewise. Whatever inference might be drawn from my votes upon this resolution since its introduction, I have stated in private conversation long since, that although I was willing that Kossuth should be admitted to a seat upon this floor, I yet repudiated his doctrine. I repudiate it to-day. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GENTRY] asked "Who is afraid of Kossuth's speeches?" I answer, Not I. I am not afraid of Kossuth's eloquence or power. He may go into my own district and promulgate his doctrine there. If my people choose to indorse it, let them do it; but, for one, I will not.

I have voted throughout for the resolution to introduce Kossuth into this Hall. I want his doctrine to be promulgated here in the very midst of the Representatives of the American people. Let them hear it from his own lips. I understood it when he landed at New York; but when I told Kossuth's friends that he entertained such opinions, they denied it. I was in hopes that Kossuth would be allowed to speak here, and that our Speaker, in receiving him, would have so addressed him as to have required him to be explicit in his answer. Thus his doctrine would have been disseminated through the land without the possibility of its being misrepresented.

Mr. NABERS. I had not the most distant idea in the beginning of this discussion that I should trespass for a single moment upon the attention of the committee. I had intended to content myself with my vote, to explain to my constituents and the country my views in relation to this matter. I will say, however, by the courtesy of the committee, that every single syllable that I have heard urged against the adoption of the original resolution has only tended to confirm me in the belief that it is right and just and proper that we should adopt it in the form in which it was first presented to us. What has been said in opposition to it? Every word which has been said in opposition to it has been based upon an assumption which does not apply to the resolution. Has anybody here proposed intervention? No, sir; and it would be just as proper to charge those who oppose this resolution with being the apologists of the Emperor of Russia—aye, sir, with being the apologists of the bloody butcher Haynau, as it is to charge the friends of this resolution with desiring to plunge the country into a war of intervention.

Again, let me ask who will be offended at the adoption of this resolution? Will it offend anybody whose good opinion we now have? No, sir. It may offend the iron-hearted despots of Europe; but do they love us now? Did they ever love us? They would have strangled us in our infancy if they could. They would do it now if it was in their power.

Now, I desire to make a kind of home application of this matter. I have the honor to represent that gallant and magnanimous constituency, the first Congressional district of the glorious State of Mississippi, and I undertake to say that there is not a man or a woman in that district who would not welcome Kossuth to their roofs and their fire-sides. And what would they say to him? Would they say to him, "Mr. Kossuth, we are sorry that Haynau did not butcher you and your wife"? Would they tell him that it would have been well for the world if Haynau had butchered him and his wife and children? Would they talk in that way? No, sir; not in my country. [Laughter.] They would tell him that they regretted the fatal calamity that overtook the Hungarian cause. But would they put on their knapsacks the next morning and go to Hungary to fight for her? I think not. And yet gentlemen tell us that if, after adopting a resolution of welcome to Kossuth, we now raise a committee to carry out that resolution, the construction will be put on it that we are prepared to take up our arms and go to war for the Hungarian cause. I repeat again that every syllable I have heard urged against this resolution is based upon a false assumption. In other words, you build up a man of straw and then knock him down. [Here the hammer fell.]

[Cries of "Go on!" "Go on!"]

The question was then taken on Mr. Conn's amendment, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. DEAN moved to amend the resolution by striking out the words "the Speaker," and inserting in lieu thereof "this House," so as to make it read,

Resolved, That a committee of five be appointed by this House to wait upon Louis Kossuth and introduce him to the House of Representatives.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. I rise to a question of order. The point I make is, that this being the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, we have no right to change the power which appoints the committees of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. This committee can do nothing final. Whatever is done here must go to the House, and one of the standing rules of the House is, that all committees shall be appointed by the Speaker, unless otherwise ordered by the House. The Chair therefore thinks the amendment in order.

Mr. DEAN. I am entirely satisfied with and shall vote for the original resolution, and should not have offered this amendment were it not perfectly evident, from what we have seen in this city and the action of this House, that there is an organized opposition, who are determined not only to defeat this resolution, but, if possible, to offer insult and indignity to the illustrious guest of the nation. Any man who witnessed the arrival of Louis Kossuth yesterday, and saw him received in the capital of the country by a crowd of boys and three shabby carriages, with a single pair of crow-be-spoken horses harnessed to each of them—(much laughter)—I say, that any one who witnessed that disgraceful scene, that miserable apology for a public reception, and who has seen the conduct of a portion of this House, must be perfectly satisfied that there is reason for proposing this amendment.

We have witnessed here a deliberate attempt, which has been for two days systematically persisted in by a factious minority, to defeat the will of a majority of this House; and I for one, want that the whole action of this body should go forth before the people of this country, that they may understand who it is that thus endeavors to thwart their will, and from what quarter this movement proceeds. There is another thing which makes it proper that this amendment should be offered—and that is the hypocritical conduct of the present National Administration toward Louis Kossuth. The President, after having, by direction of Congress, sent a national ship to bring him to our shores; after naming him in his annual message, and directing the attention of Congress to his expected arrival—calling him in that message, Governor Kossuth; after having sent a special messenger to New York, with the resolution so unanimously passed by this Congress, welcoming him as the nation's guest, and thus impliedly inviting him here, we now find that the organ and the friends of the Administration are secretly stabbing him to the heart, and attempting, by every means in their power, to give him a cool reception—and they have thus far succeeded. But the people of this country, when they come to understand it, will indignantly frown upon this conduct, and will by their action reverse the decision which has led to this reception. For these reasons, sir, I want a committee appointed by the friends of Kossuth, or the majority of this House—not a committee who will go to him and say, "We come to perform an unwilling duty"—but a committee who, with warm hearts, will rejoice to welcome and introduce the representative of free principles in Europe to the representatives of the only free Government in the world. Let, then, the friends of Hungary, the friends of universal freedom, the opponents of Russian interference and of Haynau, be appointed on this committee instead of the friends or apologists of either.

I have said I should vote for the original resolution. I shall do so, because I consider myself so instructed by the almost unanimous voice of the citizens of my State. The people of the Empire City—the commercial emporium of the whole Union—have, by their enthusiastic reception of Governor Kossuth, and the people of the capital of that State have, at a public meeting, instructed me to vote for such a resolution. But I needed no such instruction. I should do it cheerfully, from the dictates of my own heart. No man needs an apology for voting for such a proposition, sustained as it is by the voice of the whole country; for I had rather trust the generous sympathies—the spontaneous sentiment of a free people—than the cool calculations of the shrewdest politician.

[In the middle of this sentence, the Chairman's hammer fell.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. I desired very much, on yesterday, that I should have had an opportunity to place my views and opinions with regard to this whole Kossuth matter fairly before the country. I have only five minutes now, but I feel disposed to express those opinions in an unbridled manner. The pretence—the hollow pretence that that resolution is merely designed for the purpose of doing honor to Kossuth, has been stripped of its plausibility, and the proposition now stands nakedly before the gaze of the American people. My colleague and friend from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] offered a proposition here in the language of George Washington, that we are prepared to enter into "friendly relations with all, entangling alliances with none." That was a plain and simple proposition, that could not have offended Louis Kossuth or anybody else, but it was voted down by this committee.

Sir, the assertion that Louis Kossuth was invited here as the guest of the nation by the last Congress, is not warranted by the records of the country. We found him an exile from Hungary, having voluntarily abandoned his high position as Governor of Hungary, and wended his way to a Turkish prison, and we offered him an asylum here. He lands upon our shores, and declares that he scorns your sympathy unless you follow up that sympathy, and declare to the world that you are the propagandists of universal emancipation. That is the language of Kossuth in all his speeches. He proclaims to you that his country is in the attitude of a man who is drowning in the surf on the sea-shore, and if you delay assistance he is lost; just so, he says, is it with Hungary—if you fail, or even delay to decide this question in favor of intervention, it is death to her liberties, and to the liberties of the other European countries. And yet, notwithstanding this declaration, the House and the country have witnessed in New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore, not merely the rowdies, but men of high character, and who occupy a high position in the American nation, following Kossuth, and cheering him on, and sustaining him by contributing to a popular excitement unsurpassed in the history of our country. Even now whilst I am speaking, that popular excitement is beating against the very base of this Capitol, and prompting the American people to disregard their cherished principles, and to proclaim that they are now in favor of intervention. Why, we have already heard that doctrine proclaimed in this Hall, and I predict that in the approaching presidential canvass, it will be a leading element in the contest.

32D CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 3, 1852.

NEW SERIES... No. 12.

Sir, I have been surprised to hear the sentiment uttered on this floor by the gentleman from Ohio, and by other gentlemen in private conversation, that it is the duty of this House to proclaim to the world that they are prepared to sustain the blood-stained banner of Louis Kossuth. For one, as an humble representative on this floor—as an American citizen, I reject indignantly that blood-stained banner. My first, my last, my great, my only duty is to my own country. Louis Kossuth seems to be devoted body, soul, and mind to Hungary. May I not imitate his example? May I not go for my own country? and should I not be a traitor to that country, and to the blessings by which we are surrounded—

Mr. DEAN asked if it would be in order to withdraw his amendment?

The CHAIRMAN stated that it could only be withdrawn by unanimous consent.

[Loud cries of "Object!"]

The question was then taken on Mr. DEAN'S amendment, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia, moved the following amendment:

Provided, That nothing in this resolution contained shall be construed as expressive of a design to involve ourselves in entangling alliances with European governments.

Mr. FICKLIN. I rise to a point of order, in reference to this amendment. I inquire if this amendment is not in substance the same as one offered some time ago?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not in the same language. I believe there is no rule or practice of the House which says an amendment once offered and voted down shall not be again offered.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. It is not the resolution in substance of my honorable friend from Tennessee, [Mr. HARRIS.] His resolution instructed the committee, which the original resolution proposed to raise, to inform Louis Kossuth that the settled policy of this Government was, friendly relations with all nations and entangling alliances with none. This resolution differs from it in this: it does not say what is our policy, but only declares a purpose upon our part to express by his reception here no design of involving ourselves in alliances. On yesterday, I took the ground that the resolution as it stood did not commit our Government to the principles which he was propagating; but, sir, a change has come over the spirit of the dream of some of us. We have heard it avowed here to-day that intervention in European affairs might be the policy of this Government; all I call upon this committee now to declare is, what I maintained upon yesterday, that this resolution commits us to nothing except the showing of an act of courtesy to Kossuth. I was opposed to that resolution on yesterday for some reasons I stated. I said on yesterday I was not willing to canonize any man until death had fixed its seal upon his character. Two years ago if Louis Napoleon had come here there would have been somewhat such a demonstration in his favor as there is now in behalf of Kossuth.

Mr. CARTTER. Not at all.

Mr. BAYLY. It was made to some extent without his coming, by the two Houses of Congress. Without the inspiration of his presence, there was to some extent a manifestation of this unjustifiable disposition in the American character to idolize and to prematurely canonize—for that is the expression—these European advocates, as they are called, for liberty. I confess I am no great admirer of them. They are too transcendental for me. Louis Napoleon, who now stands before the world as arrant an usurper as the world ever saw, two years ago received adulation. If his illustrious uncle, when at one period he stood before the world as the friend of freedom, had come here, and a disposition had then prevailed which now does to go mad over foreigners, he would have been deified; and ovations would have been made to him, not surpassed by those made to Kossuth; and yet afterwards he became the scourge of humanity. I do not wish to commit this Government in any respect. I am free to say that I have not that admiration for those transcendental European advocates of liberty which I have for those who founded our Government and gave it a character. And I am not willing to abandon the policy of the fathers of the Republic in a fit of enthusiasm for Kossuth. This amendment does not undertake to say what our policy shall be, but it precludes the idea that it is anything more than what the friends of the resolution claim that it is—an act of courtesy that commits us to nothing. And, I ask, who can object to it?

Mr. SWEETSER. It seems to me that the time for disguise is gone by, and that I should fail to discharge the duty which I owe to my constituents did I not endeavor to give utterance to what I believe to be their views and sentiments upon this question. Those gentlemen who have seen fit to oppose this resolution for the reasons which they have assigned to the House and the country, have undoubtedly represented truly their constituents. I differ from those gentlemen. Whatever may have been the policy of this Government hitherto, I believe that the time has come, in this nineteenth century, when the power of this nation, with its twenty-five millions of people, is not only to be felt in a moral point of view, but is to be felt with all the force we can command. Two of the counties that compose the Congressional district which I have the honor to represent upon this floor, being the central counties of the great State of Ohio, have spoken out upon this subject; and while they, in common with the whole people of this country, understand the issue which Kossuth desires to make in coming here, they have, by their resolutions, instructed me to say in my place here that so far as relates to the mission of this man to our country—so far as relates to the principles which he maintains, they are prepared to declare not only to this Congress, but to the world, that the time has come when the American nation, with twenty-five millions of people, will enter their protest against such atrocities as characterized the interference of Russia in the recent contest between Hungary and Austria. They have, by their resolutions, authorized me to say this; and in saying it they have not been unmindful of the precepts given to us by the Father of his Country. Prudential motives alone stimulated that illustrious man and the patriots of his day to recommend that policy. Prudential motives authorized the passage of the neutrality laws of 1816, which I desire to see repealed. Their execution and construction have made their repeal necessary. The condition of the nation has changed since that time.

No man who has watched the signs of the times can shut his eyes to the fact, that Europe is at this time on the very brink of an outbreak—an outbreak that will not be confined to Hungary alone. And shall the American Government and the American people, whom we represent upon this floor, remain silent and adhere to the policy of non-intervention? As one of the representatives of the people, I declare, in my place here, that whatever may be the consequences, it is the duty of this Government, if there should be another outbreak in Hungary, to say to the Autocrat of Russia that he shall not go there for the purpose of beating down the flag of freedom. We are determined to see a fair fight. Whatever may be the consequences of that act, I take upon myself to say that one hundred thousand freemen from the central district of Ohio are prepared to back me in the sentiments which I express to-day. If I was authorized to speak for the whole American people, and had the voice of ARTICULATE THUNDER, I would tell the despotic Governments of Europe that henceforth in contests for liberty—where constitutional freedom has been trampled under foot, there must be no such interference as there has been in the past. And, sir, whatever may be the responsibilities that attach to this declaration, I will no longer remain silent. I will pledge that portion of the people of my State that I am authorized to represent, that they will, when the time comes, protest against the interference of Russia in another contest in Hungary for liberty. I say this in the Capitol of the Union. I hope that, if Louis Kossuth takes the trouble to read the debates here, he will find that Ohio, in this contest, is not only prepared to do him this simple act of courtesy, but is also prepared to say to the world that we are here to-day for the purpose of representing the people of this country, and not for the purpose of representing the Autocrat of Russia or the other despotic Powers of Europe.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee, moved to amend the amendment by adding thereto the following:

But if, in any great emergency, the Government of the United States can secure the liberties of Europe, by preventing the intervention of despotic powers, this Government will not refuse to maintain the laws of nations by any practicable exertion of its power.

Mr. S. said: My object in offering this amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia, is to do what I am sure I shall have no other opportunity of doing, to express my opinion in favor of the original resolution without any amendment whatever.

I am opposed to any declaration in connection with this resolution of the disposition of this Government, either to interfere in European affairs, or not to interfere. My disposition is in conformity with that of the mover of the resolution—that is, to pass a simple resolution for the purpose of recognizing a great principle—a principle that lies at the foundation of our Government, and all free governments—by doing honor to Louis Kossuth. But while I am disposed to do this, apart from any declaration, I am prepared to say at the same time, that I believe the propositions made to the American people by Governor Kossuth, are worthy of the deliberate attention of the American Government. I do not think it improbable that the time will come, and is near at hand, when every man in this House will be prepared to take the position which Governor Kossuth at this time advises, requests, and begs the American people to take. Now, what is the condition of Europe? An armed force of two millions of men holding in subjection three hundred millions of people. You see that, by the will of a single man, some of the greatest men—some of the purest patriots in Europe are sent to the dungeon without law. You see the constitution of a great nation struck down and trampled under foot. You see Thiers, Cavaignac, and other distinguished men, legitimists and republicans, sent to prison by the will of a single man; and this state of things is maintained in Europe by two millions of armed men against three hundred millions of people. Suppose the people of Europe were to rise—suppose that, in an extraordinary state of affairs, any reasonable intervention on the part of the Government of the United States would secure the liberties of Europe by one blow—suppose that the hands of Prussia may be stayed, will the Government of the United States refuse to intervene? I say, that the Government of the United States will not refuse. I say that you, sir, Mr. Chairman, whatever may be your opinions now, would not refuse. I say, that the majority of this House, whatever may be their views at the present time, would not refuse, because circumstances may arise which will render intervention necessary. It is not because they have arisen, but because they may arise, that I am unwilling to see this Government commit itself to a declaration that we will not interfere, under any circumstances, for the purpose of securing the liberties of the down-trodden nations of Europe. I say, when we can intervene, it is our duty to do it, and we will do it.

Mr. VENABLE. Mr. Chairman, if I had been doubtful before as to the propriety of caution on our part in relation to the course to be pursued towards M. Kossuth, all my difficulties would have been removed by the events occurring in this House and during this debate. Although it was manifest that he was for intervention on our part in the troubles of Europe, we had seen no indorsement of that policy by the representatives of the people in Congress. This is no longer the case. We have heard more than one distinguished member of this House announce that intervention in favor of universal liberty was our destiny and mission. We have more than once been reminded that we had nothing to fear, and there has been even some merriment at the apprehensions of those who thought it prudent for our Government to avoid the hazards of entering the whirlpool of European revolutions. We have been admonished, that although the doctrines of General Washington's Farewell Address were suitable to the infancy of our Republic, they were no longer applicable to the grown-up power which now stood forth amongst the first on the platform of nations; that a new destiny and new duties had been revealed; and that to be insensible to them was inexcusable. Those whose ignorance or timidity induced them to advise caution have, by one gentleman from New York, [Mr. DEAN,] been spoken of as the apologists for the Butcher Haynau. I can assure him that the days of Anacharsis Cloots—the orator of the human race—are among the things which have passed by never more to return; that Red Republicanism is at a discount even in France; and that it will neither exalt his reputation for practical wisdom or as the possessor of the qualification of the elements of profound statesmanship, to fix a policy upon our country which shall present a future history like the roll in the prophet's vision, written within and without with "mourning, lamentation, and woe." I fear no just quarrel of our own—I apprehend nothing from the consequences of war in such a quarrel beyond the calamities necessarily belonging to that condition; but I shrink from that causeless and unholy strife which drenches a country in blood and strews the fields with the slain; which is productive only in the nurture of a savage and destructive spirit, the tears of widows, and the sorrows of orphans. We have even seen the platform of Kossuth recommended for our adoption, and one and another has openly avowed our duty to declare to the world our purpose to aid the oppressed in their struggles for liberty. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. STANTON] speaks of the present condition of Europe, where two millions of bayonets hold down and oppress more than one hundred millions of people. If the removal of this evil be our duty, we have indeed a great work before us, one concerning which I think we ought to prudently pause and ponder the consequences of the undertaking. He speaks of the present condition of France, whose liberties have but just been overthrown by Louis Napoleon. He speaks of the imprisonment of Thiers, Cavaignac, and other deputies, and more than intimates that the time is near for us to intervene in such affairs. Sir, I think that the bursting of this French bubble is full of instruction to us. We ought to learn the folly of being premature in even an expression of approbation for the measures in which national identity is destroyed. France has fallen by the institutions which were chosen by the people themselves. The army, which kept their liberties, has taken them for their own use, and a mushroom republic bids fair to find its maturity in a finished despotism. I admit that the imprisonment of the representatives of the people is a great outrage on the part of the President of France, and I do not wish to see it reenacted here. Should the doctrines of those gentlemen who see our duty in a mission of destiny prevail, we must keep on foot such an army as shall enable us to fulfill it; and we may live to see the representatives of our people forcibly ejected by our own troops, conveyed to dungeons by our own Executive, and he perpetually seated and kept secure in authority by the army, who were to be the missionaries of universal emancipation. Sir, neither the dread of being identified with the defenders of Haynau the Butcher, nor the shame of being considered an antiquated politician, whose views are fitted only for the infancy of a great republic, can deter me from making resistance to the doctrines advanced in this debate, or protesting against the adoption of the troubles of every foreigner, who, visiting our shores, can by his eloquence and his tact excite the passions of the masses who may listen to his orations. If to study the interests of my country, and my whole country—if to adhere to the policy under which we have grown great and powerful—if to remember that we have inherited the office of the keepers of the Temple of Liberty, and to be resolved that no hand shall apply the torch to it whilst vigilance and patriotism can prevent it, constitute an antiquated politician, I glory in the name. I shall never blush at the remembrance that I was unwilling to forget my country's dignity, under any excitement, or compromise that dignity by a departure from those rules of propriety amongst nations, so essential to the comfort and prosperity of individuals. With those who suffer for the cause of liberty in Europe I feel, as I trust, a proper sympathy, but I do not perceive the wisdom of an intervention which can only compromise us and do them no good.

[Here the hammer fell, the five minutes having expired.]

Mr. V. intended to have continued his remarks, by observing, that if we felt very much inclined to look for a quarrel, the questions involved in the policy of England in relation to the Mosquito kingdom, the firing into the Prometheus, and the assumed guardianship by the English Government of the locum tenens negro king, to the injury of our commerce and the insult of our flag, would afford at least temporary employment for the zeal of those who are inclined to seek for wrongs to redress. I propose that we adjust our real quarrels before we engage in amateur disputes.

The question was then taken on Mr. STANTON'S amendment, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. TAYLOR moved the following amendment to the amendment, viz:

Resolved, That the vote of welcome heretofore given by this House and the Senate of the United States to Louis Kossuth had no political meaning, but was intended to carry out the kind intention of the United States in their joint resolution, approved March 3, 1851, in relation to Kossuth and his associates in captivity, to afford them a secure asylum in the United States.

Mr. TAYLOR. Now, Mr. Chairman, I have listened here for several days to a debate which I think would have been more profitable if we had had it at the time when the resolution of welcome was under consideration. I have sat here quietly for many days, anxious to engage in the public business, and do justice to our fellow-citizens all over the United States, by taking up the great questions of public policy which are pressed upon our attention by the millions of people we represent. I have, sir, noticed with disgust the movements of men who seek high places in your country, since the unfortunate exiles of Hungary landed upon your shores; yea, sir, from the time he took his departure from your frigate-of-war Mississippi, to become a propagandist in England first, to excite a feeling in that country, and then in this, to induce us to depart from that wise policy—that straight-forward policy recommended to us by Washington, and which we have carried out from the foundation of our Government. I have looked at the progress of this business from its inception. No class of men have been more anxious to do honor to Louis Kossuth, and to show him the kindness which did honor him, than the politicians of the country, and for the purpose of upholding their own fortunes. Look around this House, and see what a billing and cooing there is here of persons from the most extreme sections.

Sir, if there is one man upon this floor, who will pretend to sympathize with the Hungarian exiles more than another, he does dishonor to himself and a great injury to his fellow-members. We all sympathize with the exiled Hungarians in their great struggle for liberty, and the best evidence of it is found in the fact, that when we learned that about four thousand refugees had taken refuge in the Turkish empire, this Government took the initiative step to express the sympathy of this nation for them. We, on the 3d of March, 1851, passed the joint resolution to which I have referred. For what purpose? Merely to liberate these Hungarian exiles? No, sir; but to afford them an asylum in the United States of America; a home, as emigrants to this country. They intimated their desire to live under our glorious stars and stripes, and to become citizens of the United States. Now, what do we see? Do you suppose that, if it had been known on the 3d of March, 1851, that Louis Kossuth would come here to undertake to incorporate a new principle—a great principle in the foreign policy of our Government—which we have abstained from and kept aloof from until this time, under the advice of the great Washington, the Father of our country—do you suppose that if he had announced that as his intention at that time, that we should ever have passed that joint resolution? Never, never! We passed it to aid the Ottoman Sultan in liberating, from extreme danger, the unfortunate exiles who had fled from their own country for life, and to afford them, as I say, a secure asylum in the United States. I think, sir, in passing that vote of welcome a week or two ago, we exhausted all our duty to him as members of this House; and by that vote welcomed him to the country, its protection, and to its hospitalities, if he should choose to become a citizen of the United States. I am opposed to the whole proceedings now before us—the original resolution of my colleague from Ohio, [Mr. CARTER,] and all the amendments. I say, this House is not called upon to take any such step. Let us treat this gentleman with the utmost kindness; but to do more, to carry out the objects he now proposes, would be a departure from the national policy which has enabled us to become the admiration of the world. I would cheerfully unite, as a citizen of the United States, in promoting their settlement in this country, and rendering it a safe retreat and secure asylum to Kossuth and his associates in captivity. But, sir, let us adhere to the settled policy of the country—let us avoid "entangling alliances" with foreign nations, and show, by exact justice in our intercourse with foreign nations, and wise legislation, for the benefit of our own country, that our constitutional form of republican government is the wisest and best to promote the true interests of the people, and our example will be powerful for good in all the nations of the world.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I believe we should be doing better justice to our own reputations as statesmen, if we were to proceed in the ordinary mode of legislation upon the subject-matter before us, and avoid all reference to matters not legitimately under consideration. I believe, sir, it is due to ourselves, as the representatives of the people of this nation, that we do the business which is presented to us, and do it in the ordinary forms and in the ordinary manner, without factious opposition, and without any extraneous matters being brought in for investigation. I make these remarks because, from some experience in this House, I am constrained to say, that, from this factious opposition which we have sometimes seen displayed in this body, we have never seen any good result. It does not serve to raise our reputation with the American people, nor does it increase our own self-respect. I sincerely hope we may proceed to vote upon this resolution; but while I am up, I am constrained to notice the extraordinary inconsistency of certain gentlemen upon this floor. If I mistake not, my colleague who has just taken his seat [Mr. TAYLOR] voted for a certain resolution, of a direct character, interfering and proclaiming our sympathies with a foreign and European nation in a cause of freedom. I ask the Clerk to read the resolution I have sent him.

The Clerk then read the resolution referred to, from the Congressional Globe, of 1847-'8, vol. 18th, page 592, as follows:

Resolved, That in the name and behalf of the American people, the congratulations of Congress are hereby tendered to the people of France, upon the success of their recent efforts to consolidate the principles of liberty in a republican form of Government.

And be it further resolved, That the President of the United States be and he is hereby requested to transmit this resolution to the American Minister at Paris, with instructions to present it to the French Government."

Mr. GIDDINGS, (continuing.) Mr. Chairman, how men's minds alter and change! My colleague who has just taken his seat, [Mr. TAYLOR,] there pronounced this in relation to an European nation and an European people.

Mr. TAYLOR, (interrupting.) Who were they?

Mr. GIDDINGS. Has my colleague forgotten? [Laughter.] Sir, it becomes politicians to have memories. If for nothing else they should know what to do. [Great laughter.] My colleague is not the only man—

Mr. TAYLOR, (interrupting,) made a remark inaudible to the reporter.

Mr. GIDDINGS, (continuing.) If I stand here to be interrogated by every one who is contradicting his former actions, I may be kept here till morning. [Laughter.] The honorable chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, whose holy horror has been called up here, and who has expressed himself in such eloquent language, he, too, voted for this very resolution, and now he turns round and proclaims anathemas to every man who will vote a welcome to Louis Kossuth! Again, the very eloquent gentleman from North Carolina—

A Voice. Venable? [Laughter.]

Mr. GIDDINGS. Yes, sir, my friend from North Carolina, whose sympathies thus flowed out in eloquent language in regard to that foreign people, he too, has forgotten the sentiments he then held. [Laughter.]

[Here the Chairman's hammer fell.]

[Cries of, "Go on!" "Go on!"]

Mr. GIDDINGS. Mr. Chairman, I only want to say that when resolutions of sympathy shall come before the House, I will discuss them, and I will express my sentiments freely and frankly; but I will not express them upon subjects altogether foreign to the subject-matter before the House.

The question was then taken on the amendment of Mr. TAYLOR to the amendment, and it was rejected.

The question recurring on the amendment of Mr. BAYLY, tellers were called for and ordered, and Messrs. JOHNSON, of Arkansas, and SACKETT were appointed.

The question was then taken, and the amendment was rejected—ayes 50, noes 85.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. I offer the following as an amendment to the resolution:

Provided, That by the adoption of the above resolution a compliment only is intended to the distinguished Hungarian.

I am astonished at the wild enthusiasm which seems to pervade this assembly. We are told that this distinguished foreigner comes among us, not seeking our interference with the Powers of Europe—not asking us to enter into an entangling alliance. What! do gentlemen recognize the speech which I hold in my hand, in which he says: "I desire the young giant of America to raise his arm in favor of that principle?" What principle, I ask, is it that he desires this young giant to adopt? He gives the answer in the preceding sentence of his own speech. He says, "we do not wish to fight against the world; the only thing which we desire is fair play." Yet gentlemen tell us that he comes not here seeking an intervention with foreign Powers! Why, he puts the question distinctly to the American people as a court and jury, and waits for the decision from the American Congress. Here is his concluding remark: "When that tribunal speaks, I must hear with sentiments of joy, if it is joyful, but with resolution and not despair, if it is not joyful. I have pleaded my cause." We are told by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. CARTER,] that perhaps we do not represent the views of the American people. Mr. Chairman, for one, I claim when I speak upon this floor to speak for the people of my district. I oppose this resolution not for the mere purpose of opposition, but because I believe the effect of the resolution will be to commit this Government to the doctrine of intervention, and I am not willing that it should pass without being accompanied by such a proviso as I have offered.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BISSELL] asks me where I get my notions of a long-established doctrine of non-intervention. I answer the gentleman, that it is in the language of Jefferson: "Friendship with all nations—entangling alliances with none."

I hope, if the resolution be adopted, that the amendment will also be adopted. If gentlemen, as they say, only intend to compliment Kossuth by the adoption of the resolution, why not express it in so many words? He has been frank; let us be equally so. I do not desire to detain this House longer, and with a simple reference to resolutions adopted by the Legislature of my own State honoring Kossuth as Kossuth, I yield the floor.

Mr. McMULLIN. I regret that the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CARTER] was permitted to introduce this resolution originally. I have risen now, not for the purpose of protracting this debate, which has already continued too long, but for the purpose of defining my position, and setting myself right upon this question before the country, and especially before my constituents. I avail myself of this opportunity of tendering my congratulations, and not only my congratulations, but those of my constituents, for the stand he assumed when this matter was first presented to the House. Although that gentleman is a young member among us, yet I regard his position as a manly one before this House and the country. It is true he acted somewhat rashly in maintaining that position, but still I regard him as deserving the thanks of this House and of the country.

Mr. Chairman, I, for one, would be willing, and more than willing, to tender my hand to the distinguished Hungarian in his true character—as a champion of freedom. But I deny that we have any right to indorse his principles which he is seeking to propagate in this country. What, I ask you, was the phraseology of the joint resolution of Congress which invited him to our shores? It was, that if he and his countrymen, then in exile, desired to emigrate to this country, we would tender to him and them the use of a national vessel. And what is the condition of things now? Why, here, in this last day of the year 1851, we see the Congress of the United States gravely considering whether we shall appoint a committee upon the part of the House to wait upon this same personage, whom we only invited to emigrate to this country, and pay to him honors similar to those which were paid to Lafayette—the second Father of his Country. And permit me, in this connection, to remark, that in the other end of this Capitol, where Senators have thought proper to associate him with that distinguished man, I could not regard it otherwise than as an insult to the memory of Lafayette. It is true, I voted the other day for the resolution inviting him to this capital; but I gave that vote under a protest; and I take this occasion to declare, that if that vote had not been given, I would not now give it. But the invitation has been given, and while, under the circumstances, I am willing that the Speaker should receive Mr. Kossuth and introduce him to the members, I am unwilling that, in order to extend to him those civilities, we should ride over the rules and trample down the rights of the House; and I cannot sit here quietly and see its rules thus disregarded. I here solemnly enter my protest, as the representative of my constituents, against this proceeding. I say again that I am willing to extend to Kossuth the hand of friendship, as a man and as a patriot. But I am not willing to countenance him in the attempt which he has made to lecture the American people upon the character of our institutions. What do gentlemen mean when they tell me that they do not intend to commit this Government to his doctrines? Has not Mr. Kossuth told you that he does not desire your sympathy? And if he does not want your sympathy, what does he want? Why, it is men and money to fight the battles of Hungary. But I tell gentlemen that he will neither get men nor money by my vote. I repeat that I am willing that the Speaker should tender to him the same hospitalities that were tendered to Father Mathew, although the latter gentleman is doing much more good to our country than is Mr. Kossuth; but I am not willing to go further.

Mr. APPLETON, of Maine. I move to amend by striking out the word "only."

I desire once more to bring back this committee to the original resolution which was proposed by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. CARTER.] When that gentleman offered that resolution he expressly stated that he repudiated any idea of intervention or non-intervention. He only asked that it should be considered merely as a matter of courtesy. I agreed with that gentleman then in that opinion, and I do not mean now to be driven from that position by anything which I have heard since. It is only a matter of courtesy. Why, sir, we have gone too far in this matter now to recede. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. McMULLIN] expresses the same opinion when he says that if he could give his vote over again upon the resolution inviting Kossuth to this capital, that he would give it against that resolution. But that vote cannot be recalled. The question is decided; the issue has been made; and, sir, there was a previous question to that. We invited Kossuth to our shores; we sent a national vessel for him; and we adopted a resolution of welcome to him after his arrival in this country, by a large majority of both branches of Congress. However gentlemen may refine about it, he must be regarded in some sort as the nation's guest. I know very well that it has been said by gentlemen upon this floor that Kossuth was not invited here as the guest of the nation—that the object of the original resolution was merely to rescue him from imprisonment and give him a home among us; but that only shows that we did not know the man with whom we were dealing. He had a loftier character than we gave him credit for. He had been through a long struggle at home, and by power and treachery united, he had been signally defeated. He had been a wanderer and an outcast—separated from his family—deprived of his home—cut off from his country—and obliged to seek Turkish imprisonment as a shelter for his life. Even in that retreat, the threats of Austria had been constantly sounding in his ears, and he was compelled almost daily to feel that his hospitable host placed in jeopardy his own peace and power for the purpose of protecting him. Under such circumstances, we gave him the means of escape, and might almost be pardoned for believing that he would be glad to forget his past sufferings in future comfort, and soothe his broken spirit amidst the quiet of a western home, where he would be sure to find sympathy for his misfortunes, and a generous approval of his republican course. Yet it was not so. It was no poor broken-hearted dreamer, sighing for personal care and comfort, and almost regretting the sacrifices which had made him an exile from his home, that the steamer Mississippi received on board, when Kossuth came upon her deck at Constantinople. No, sir; but the moment he stood beneath a free flag, and trod upon a free deck, and saw around him the men and the arms of a free country, his great spirit swelled to its old dimensions, and the love and power of liberty were renewed in his veins together. Not for him a cottage in some far retreat. Not for him the delights of a homely fireside, and all the comforts of ease and competence. Not for him the plough and the sickle, and the peaceful employments to which they tend. Far other visions occupy his mind. His thoughts are with his countrymen who are still oppressed; and the pale and bleeding form of Hungary seems to walk constantly before him, and to beckon him onward to the great work of her deliverance. Sir, in all this, I find nothing to diminish our estimate of the man, but much rather to increase it. The patriotism and self-sacrifice which he has thus shown give him a new title to our regard, and justify by fresh reasons the welcome which we have given him. Sir, I believe he has deserved that welcome by his past services, and I hope he will deserve a still more illustrious expression of our regard, by the events of his future career. All this, I think it has been the right and the duty of the American Congress to declare—and to declare it with no scanty phrases, no bated breath, and no trembling voices—but in tones loud enough to be heard alike by the despots and the subjects of the Old World, and firm enough to carry the conviction wherever they go, that we mean what we say. To this extent we have high authority to justify us, as well as the teachings of our own minds.

And beyond this it is not necessary now to declare ourselves. I do not intend to go into the broad questions of national policy which have been opened here to-night. Upon these questions I have nothing to say. They do not belong to this debate. But I recognize in Louis Kossuth the great master-spirit which has been evoked by the late European excitements. It is almost a law of revolutions that they create their own chief guides and leaders. From out the stormy waves of the French convulsions emerged Napoleon Bonaparte, who seized with an iron hand the helm of Europe; and wrote his name with the point of his sword in ineffaceable characters upon the history of the world. In our own Revolution, also, Providence raised up the man for the times, and gave as that Washington whose fame is yet the dearest treasure of his countrymen, and whose name is honored wherever liberty is praised. But in looking over the late agitations of the Old World, no man, it seems to me, appears who can fairly contest the palm of supremacy with Kossuth. When revolution had failed everywhere else, and the old darkness was settling over the nations, it was he who kept Hungary alive with freedom, and so animated her with his own spirit that she beat Austria from the field, did not tremble before Austria and Russia combined, and only bowed her head at last before the treachery of one of her own sons. Sir, for what this man has done I am willing to give him my cordial thanks, and I care not how loudly and how warmly he may be welcomed to our shores. I am willing to see the people load him with honors, and make him the almoner of great wealth. All this they have a right to do, and there is no power on earth which can control them. Nor do I fear that they will ultimately go too far. I have great and abiding confidence in their "sober second thought." But I warn gentlemen that any abatement of a proper courtesy on our part towards the illustrious Magyar may awaken an indignant feeling among the people, which may react in favor of those very doctrines of his which some of us do not see fit yet to avow.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. GROW. It was not my purpose thus early in the session to mingle in the debates of this Hall, nor would I at this late hour of the day trouble the House with any remarks but for the charge that has just fallen from the lips of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. McMULLIN.] I cannot refrain from replying, when I have the words of Kossuth to do it with. Let his own language defend him against the charge of audacity. He comes here advocating the rights of crushed humanity and the cause of his native land, and asks the American people for their aid against the despots of his country. Frankly he lays his claims and wishes before his hearers, and asks their consideration. He asks them as men standing under the shadow of Washington, to consider the cause of humanity; and for this he is charged with being guilty of the greatest impudence! Are his requests unreasonable, that they should not be heard? He brings to their elucidation the light of his master intellect, and the impulses of a warm heart. In what consists his impudence? Does he make a demand upon this Government or people, and attempt by threats or intimidation to coerce it? He presents his cause and reasons, and asks you for a voluntary decision; and if in his favor, then he will leave your shores—the herald of glad tidings to enthralled nations. But if you answer no, in his own language "you will see a mournful tear in the eye of humanity—its breast heaving with a sorrowful sigh—yet the answer must be accepted." "If you answer, you would rather be on friendly terms with the Czar than rejoice in the liberty and independence of Hungary, Italy, Germany, and France, yet dreadful as it is I will wipe the tear of sorrow from my eye, and say to my brethren, let us pray, and go to the Lord's last supper, and then to battle and to death. I will say to them, there is no help for us but in our trust in God, and in our own good swords. I will leave you with a dying farewell, and bless you with the warmest wishes of my heart, and pray to God that the Sun of Freedom may never decline from the horizon of your happy land." If this be "impudence," in what way would you have an apostle of liberty appeal for the sympathy and aid of a people whose country has drank the life-blood not only of its own martyrs, but of the martyrs of every clime? Is it impudent for a man just escaped from Austrian dungeons and Turkish exile to stand up in the face of nations and advocate the conscious rights of man? Is it "impudent" for the representative of a brave people to present the claims of his fatherland to the sympathies of the descendants of Washington, Franklin, and Jefferson?—to make his appeal in behalf of bleeding humanity to a people whose every battle-field in the first and second war of independence is red with the blood of foreigners—to a country that in the hour of peril received the aid of a Lafayette; De Kalb, and Kosciuszko, and whose soil still holds the ashes of Pulaski and Steuben?

Mr. McMULLIN, (interrupting.) His impudence is in attempting to destroy the teachings of Washington.

Mr. GROW. Devoutly as we turn to the teachings of that greatest of mortals—and Heaven grant the day may never come when it shall be otherwise with the American—still the institutions, opinions, and men, both living and dead, of this country, as of all others, are here proper and open subjects of manly discussion. Freedom of opinion and expression on any and all subjects, is the right of a freeman under a free Government. The only sure reliance in every case is on the virtue, intelligence, and integrity of the people to correct all errors. It becomes not the American to bow with blind reverence to opinions or institutions because of their grey age. For while knowledge is growing more comprehensive, man's relations becoming better known, he who would cling blindly to all the notions of other times, acts a suicidal part to the best interests of the present. While truth and society are progressive, he who would seek the one with an honest heart and fearless mind, and act with a generous soul for the best interest of the other, cannot entertain all the notions of his predecessors.

If the doctrine of non-intervention was proper for our country in the days of Washington, and even though bequeathed to us as his dying legacy, has not the time come, or will it never arrive, for this Republic to decide whether in its foreign relations it is an inveterate rule never in any case to be departed from; that we must stand with folded arms and closed lips and see a brave people, goaded by the wrongs of centuries and battling for liberty and the rights which God and nature has given them, and even when they have driven the invader from their soil, struck down by the hireling myrmidons of united despots, and their country drenched with the blood of the noble and the brave, blotted from the map of nations? Is it the legacy of wisdom and humanity bequeathed by Washington and his copatriots, that American freemen must forever, in silence, be pierced with the "shrieks of liberty" as her votaries fall?

Whatever may be the policy or decision of our Government in reference to armed intervention, as the generous spirit sits not at the social board with the robber and the assassin, let it, at least, in its intercourse with other nations, be as circumspect in its company as the private citizen. To that nation which tramples on the laws of nations and the common rights of humanity, let it not extend the hand of fellowship. Let us welcome to our shores, and to the hearts of our countrymen, the exile driven by oppression and wrong from the fireside of his fathers.

Mr. GORMAN. As the gentleman's time is not yet out, I desire to make a statement to the friends of this resolution. I desire to say to them, that if they expect to arrive at a vote upon the resolution to-night, they must not discuss it themselves. If gentlemen will recollect, during the last Congress the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union were kept from a vote for sixty days precisely in this way. For one, I intend to sit here till midnight rather than not to dispose of this resolution.

The question was then taken on the amendment of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. APPLETON,] and it was not agreed to.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. I have an amendment which I propose to offer, after which I intend to ask the Clerk to read an extract from a speech of Kossuth's. I move to strike out all after the word "provided," and insert the following:

First, That, feeling interested in the maintenance of the laws of nations, acknowledging the sovereign right of every people to dispose of its own domestic concerns to be one of these laws, and the interference with this sovereign right to be a violation of these laws of nations, the people of the United States—resolved to respect and to make respected these public laws—declare the Russian past intervention in Hungary to be a violation of these laws, which, if reiterated, would be a new violation, and would not be regarded indifferently by the people of the United States.

Second, That the people of the United States are resolved to maintain its right of commercial intercourse with the nations of Europe, whether they be in a state of revolution against their government or not; and that, with a view of approaching scenes on the continent of Europe, the Government should take appropriate measures for the protection of the trade of our people in the Mediterranean; and,

Third, That the Government of the United States should declare its opinion in respect to the question of the independence of Hungary, and act accordingly.

Mr. S. said: The amendment is simply the platform of Kossuth himself, as presented to the American people, and seems either to have been misunderstood, or forgotten, by those who have undertaken to announce his purposes in the debate which has taken place on this resolution. Kossuth himself can better explain what he means by these propositions, than any one else, and as he has had no chance of speaking to-day for himself, I propose to afford him an opportunity. When Kossuth shall have spoken, it will be a fit time to close this debate; and I trust that the little speech which I send to the Clerk to read, from the great Hungarian himself, explanatory of his platform, will be the last made upon the subject.

The following extract from Kossuth's address to the Jackson Democratic Association, was then read:

"My nation believes that the United States, presenting themselves before the world in that imposing attitude, will restrain tyrants without any war. Let me say, that I came not to try to engage your arms and the blood of your hearts, to fight our battles. We will fight our battles ourselves. [Applause.] I came not to entangle you in a war. We can fight our own battles. We are a nation capable of achieving our own freedom if we have fair play. If a nation like Hungary, with fifteen millions of inhabitants, is not able to fight its own battles, by its own force, against its own enemy—if it is not strong enough to settle its own domestic matters, by its own strength, it deserves not, it merits not, to be free. All we want is fair play. [Applause.] We do not wish to fight against the whole world. The only thing which we desire is fair play."

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. I will remark that the extract which has just been read, does not contain all that Kossuth has said on this point. [Prolonged laughter.] I hope that laugh will not be taken out of my time. [Renewed laughter.] He has told us, with that candor which has characterized him since he came amongst us, that when he asks us to declare against intervention, if that declaration of ours was disregarded upon the part of Russia, that he expected us to go to war to sustain it. That is what he said, and it cannot be disputed on the floor; and an attempt ought not to be made to disguise it. Now, I want to put to the American Congress one or two simple inquiries in respect to this doctrine in favor of non-intervention. I ask what department can commit us to it in a form to be authoritative and respected? Suppose the Executive should declare it, does not every one know that, coming from that Department alone, it would be brutum fulmen? Suppose it should not be respected, as it most probably would not be, what could the President do? He could not back it with the Army and Navy of the United States. The war-power resides in Congress; and no appropriation to that use can be made for a longer period than two years. All he could do would be to convene Congress, and recommend to it to declare war to make good his declaration. Congress is, as we all know, a fluctuating body; an opposition Congress is not always disposed to carry out Executive recommendations, and it cannot be relied upon with certainty that all future Congresses would go to war to sustain such a declaration, even if made by a President to whom it was friendly. It certainly would not do it in a case which did not strongly enlist its sympathy. Yet to cause the principle to be respected in any case, it would be necessary to vindicate it in all. I repeat, what Kossuth himself admits in effect, that, unless it is known by other nations that we would vindicate our declaration by war if it was not respected, that it would be mere brutum fulmen.

Suppose the declaration made by the Executive and by Congress also. It could only bind the Congress that would make it.

Kossuth's doctrines are impracticable under our form of government. Let me illustrate. Suppose this Government was to commit itself in all of its branches to them; suppose about August, Hungary should again strike for her independence; suppose Russia should interfere—as interfere she would, for the right to do so, as she esteems, is the vital principle of her system, and she would risk a war with us, or anybody else, sooner than surrender it—all the President could do would be to convene Congress. This would take sixty days. We would debate at least six weeks, more likely six months, before a declaration of war would be made. Then we would have to take time to raise and discipline an army, unless we do what I think is an indispensable adjunct to this policy—keep on hand a large standing army. Then they are to be transported to Hungary, and in the mean time she is again prostrate; and we, I suppose, would either return with our fingers in our mouths, or wage a war to resuscitate her. In other words, we would wage a war to bring into existence a republic rather than to succor one. If we desire to engage in this policy, I think France presents a fair theatre. That is the view I hinted at yesterday; but I did not wish to elaborate it then, and, of course, I do not mean to attempt it now, in the five minutes that are allotted me. I shall do it hereafter. But I undertake to say that this doctrine of intervention is utterly inconsistent with the whole structure of our Government. Under a monarchy it is different. When the King of England or any other of the potentates of Europe make a declaration against intervention, they have all the war power in their own hands, and they can back their declaration without consulting anybody. I undertake to say, with some little knowledge of history upon this subject, that there has been no case where any nation of Europe has taken the decisive stand which we are called upon to take, that did not at least commence making preparation for war coexistent with its declaration. In most cases the preparation has preceded the declaration; and to cause it to be respected this must be done. If we are to adopt this European policy, we must adopt all essential parts of it.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The question was then taken upon Mr. STANTON's amendment to the amendment of Mr. CHURCHWELL, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. CHURCHWELL.] I offer the following:

Resolved, That the Speaker be requested to appoint a committee who shall report to this House whether, in their opinion, the resolution of the last Congress, inviting Father Mathew to a seat in this Hall, committed members of Congress and the Government of the United States to the cause of temperance.

[Great laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is not in order.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. What is the pending amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. CHURCHWELL.]

Mr. STEPHENS. What has become of the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not in order.

Mr. YATES. I offer the following amendment to the amendment:

"And that said committee be instructed to inform Louis Kossuth that the Government of the United States will not look with indifference on the intervention of Russia, or any other foreign Power, against Hungary, in any struggle for liberty she may hereafter have against the despotic power of Austria."

Mr. YATES said: I have introduced this amendment only for the purpose of saying that I am in favor of the original resolution. I am astonished that gentlemen will not permit the House to come to a fair vote upon that resolution. The resolution does not commit the House to the principle of intervention. No, sir; not even by implication or construction. There is nothing in it which, according to a fair and honest interpretation, can be construed a commitment to that principle. The only question is, whether we will extend a cordial welcome to this illustrious champion of human rights. It contains a simple direction to the committee to wait upon Louis Kossuth, and to introduce him to this House. When gentlemen array the objection of intervention against this resolution, they travel out of the record. There is no such averment in the declaration. It is a simple act of courtesy, and no more. I would not, sir, heedlessly involve this nation in the affairs of foreign nations. I see no reason yet to change the time-honored policy of the country—entangling alliances with none; and immediate intervention, by means and men, might prove most disastrous to the best interests of our country, and might even endanger its existence, to say nothing of the blood to be shed and the immense amount of treasure to be expended in such a fanciful crusade for liberty.

But, sir, I would be willing to go further even than this resolution, and to express, in unequivocal terms, our sympathy for every nation struggling against power and despotism for true and genuine liberty.

Who is Louis Kossuth? He stands forth prominently before the civilized world as the distinguished representative of the democratic principle in Europe; as one who, in the council chamber of his native land—in the Hungarian Diet—contended for the abolition of feudal prerogatives, for the principle of popular representation, and for unrestricted equality without regard to rank or birth—and who is now the great missionary of freedom, and is setting on fire the whole civilized world by the splendor and power and brilliancy of his eloquence in the sacred cause of oppressed humanity. He comes here an exile. Overcome by his enemies, defeated by the treachery of his friends, incarcerated in Austrian dungeons, banished from his native country, from the home of his childhood, yet his lofty spirit, still unbroken, towers with the great idea of redemption to Hungary, and his great heart still beats with the unfaltering purpose to strike for freedom and the rights of man. This, sir, is the man whom we propose to welcome.

Sir, if it be intervention, which I deny, to shake by the hand this republican, then I am for intervention. If it be intervention to proclaim our sympathy for any people struggling for disenthralment from tyranny, for the great principles of democratic liberty, then I am for it. [Several voices: "That's right."] If it be intervention for this Congress to express its indignant condemnation of the tyranny of Austria and the double tyranny of Russia, in the progress of this Hungarian war, then I am for it. [Voices: "That's right."] Sir, the inglorious sentiment that we, the freest nation in the world, enjoying all the blessings of republican government, can be indifferent to the struggles of the oppressed for the same liberty we possess, is a sentiment unworthy of the spirit of the age in which we live, and should find no lodgment in the American heart. It has been the policy of this Government to express its sympathy in such cases, and I hope it will continue to be. We must do right, sir, let the consequences be what they may. If Russia and Austria take offence and bring on war, it will be their war and not ours. We shall fight in the defence; and in a righteous war upon our own soil, we could bid defiance to the despotisms of the world. Bright glories have covered our arms in three wars already; but in this last and final struggle between freedom and despotism, our good old flag would be borne aloft in triumph, the glorious ensign of liberty to the world.

Mr. Chairman, we are told that there is no precedent for this welcome. I am willing to admit that precedent is worth something; and could show that we had precedents in a good measure similar to the case now before us, in the reception of Lafayette and Father Mathew; but what is it for which gentlemen ask a precedent? Why, sir, it is this: we must not take a good republican by the hand, because we have no precedent for it. This, sir, with due deference to gentlemen, I must say is simply ridiculous. No precedent, sir! I will inquire if all advance in legislation, all progress in civil or political reform, and even the friendly exchange of the common courtesies of life, are to be disregarded, because there is no precedent for them? Sir, it is in politics as it is in the physical sciences, in improvements in agriculture, or the mechanic arts; it is an age of progress in which in some things we are leaving the old landmarks behind and striking out a new path. Less than half a century ago, and there was no precedent for steamboats, or railroads, or telegraphs. Now, sir, we have precedents in the palaces that float upon the bosoms of our rivers and plough the ocean; in the iron horse that thunders along our mountains and valleys; and in the long wires which bear our thoughts and messages faster than eagles fly. Sir, if there is no precedent in the annals of Congress for tendering the hospitalities of this nation to so distinguished a champion of human rights as Louis Kossuth, then the sooner we have such a precedent the better. The more is the honor to us, if we shall be the first Congress to set such a glorious precedent.

But Kossuth is a foreigner. This, sir, is no objection with me. It is justly our boast, that ours is an asylum for the oppressed of every clime; and long, long I hope it will continue to be. When the lone exile of oppression shall find no other refuge, here, sir, in all time to come, may he find a foothold. A considerable portion of the population of the district I have the honor to represent, consists of Germans, and, sir, they are distinguished for their intelligence, enterprise, and public spirit; but more than this, they are distinguished for their ardent devotion to our Government. They readily learn our language, take an interest in our schools and public works, and I believe, sir, are as sober, industrious, moral, and patriotic as our native American citizens. Upon the great subject of liberty I humbly trust that this House cannot hesitate because Kossuth is a foreigner. The true friends of freedom are united in the bonds of brotherhood throughout the world, and no natural barriers, no differences of locality, of clime, or country, no ocean running between, should divide them.

Mr. Chairman, this is a noble opportunity for the representatives of this great nation to testify to the world their sympathy for a nation struggling to be free. It should not pass. We should give to Kossuth such a welcome as is worthy of his exalted worth—of his privations in the cause of freedom—of his illustrious services, and of him as one of the greatest living orators of the age—and such a welcome as is worthy of this great nation. Ours is the greatest and freest nation on the earth. We have attained to a fuller and more perfect development of the democratic principle than any other people. Then, sir, let us welcome Kossuth in a manner worthy of this our great land of free States and spreading millions of free people. Let no idle and inglorious fears of offending the despots of Europe deter us from the plain dictates of patriotic duty. Let Kossuth feel that the simple, unostentatious welcome of this House is a full reward for all his services in behalf of oppressed humanity; and that this land, with institutions based emphatically upon the power of the people, is indeed an asylum for the oppressed. Let him feel that if he does not get men and money and armed intervention from our Government, he gets what is not less potent for his cause—the moral power of this nation.

Mr. Chairman, let not the representatives of the people be behind the people themselves. I rejoice, sir, that standing in this the Capitol of my country for the first time, it is my prerogative to speak for this resolution. Let us hail Kossuth, not for himself only, but for his cause, as the elder Adams said of the Fourth of July, "with gratulation and joy, with bonfires and illuminations." Welcome should be inscribed upon the doors of the Capitol, upon the flag that floats above us—

Mr. GREY said, that this debate had taken a range and latitude, which to him seemed strange and inappropriate. The simple question presented by the resolution of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. CARTER,] was as to the appointment of a committee to introduce Mr. Kossuth to the House of Representatives. Yet a person entering the Hall and ignorant of the true question before the House, would suppose that the proposition under discussion was war with Russia and direct intervention in the contest between Hungary and Austria. The resolution presents no such issue. The question is simply whether we shall now repudiate, or carry out the invitation heretofore tendered to Kossuth; whether we shall extend to him the courtesies to which we stand committed by the action of the Executive and by past legislation. In February last, the Secretary of State, the officer charged with the management of our foreign relations, had taken the initiative, and instructed our Minister in Turkey to open negotiations with the Turkish Government for the liberation of Kossuth. This proceeding of the national Executive had been subsequently indorsed and approved by Congress, by the resolution of March last, instructing the President to send a national vessel to bring Kossuth to this country.

The President in his message informed Congress that he had complied with their instructions, and that Kossuth was soon expected to arrive, and he referred to their consideration the question of the manner of the reception and treatment of this distinguished man, thus brought to this country by the order of Congress. Kossuth arrived, and the President of the United States, as Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy, had received him at New York as the nation's guest with a national salute. Congress then adopted the following Joint Resolution:

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled, That the Congress of the United States, in the name and behalf of the people of the United States, give to Louis Kossuth a cordial welcome to the capital and to the country; and that a copy of this resolution be transmitted to him by the President of the United States."

Where did this demonstration in favor of Kossuth originate? It was not a Democratic measure, nor a Whig measure; but a measure of the National Executive—of the Secretary of State, who controls the foreign affairs of the country, and who first suggested that we should pass a joint resolution welcoming Louis Kossuth to the capital and the country.

In compliance with the invitation tendered him by Congress in this joint resolution, Kossuth presents himself in this capital. Now, the plain question is, Will you recall, or will you fulfill the invitation you have given him? Are you now doubtful of his worth and merits? And had you not the same data, by which to judge of his worth and merits, before you gave him this invitation, as now? My colleague on my right [Mr. EWING] fears that this tends to intervention in the affairs of Europe, and asks where are we to stop? I answer, that the question of intervention or non-intervention is not before us. It will be time enough to decide that question when it arises. The question now presented, and the only question, is, shall we fulfill the reasonable expectations created by our own previous action? Having invited Kossuth to come to the capital, shall we receive him and treat him with courtesy, now that he has accepted our invitation? And shall we, by so doing, express our sympathy for the progress of liberal institutions and republicanism in Europe, of which he is the representative? I do not intend to contribute in any way to involve my country in a war, for the propagation of the doctrines advocated by Kossuth. Yet I see no reason why we should not give him and his cause the moral influence of our countenance and sympathy, by receiving him with the civility and politeness due to our own self-respect. The law of nations does not forbid the exercise of such hospitality, nor the expression of our sympathies for this distinguished man and the cause he represents. The despotic powers of the world combine to maintain and uphold their doctrines, and why should we hesitate to give the moral influence of our sympathy to the cause of liberal and republican institutions, or to extend to their representative the civilities to which we are committed? To my colleagues, who differ from me on this question, I say that the people of Kentucky would not hesitate to do so, fully, frankly, heartily, and gracefully, as the occasion demands.

Sir, Louis Kossuth, as the great apostle of liberty, as the representative of those who advocate liberal principles in Europe, as a martyr to those principles, and an exile from his own dear Hungary, would be greeted nowhere with a more cordial and whole-souled welcome, than in Kentucky. To my colleagues who oppose this resolution (Messrs. MARSHALL and EWING) I will suppose this case: They unite in an invitation to a distinguished but unfortunate individual, a citizen of another State of this Union, or, if they please, of a foreign government, to come and make his home in Kentucky. They send their "coach and four" to bring him to the State. He arrives. They again unite in a joint note, bidding him welcome to the State, and to their houses. He so conducts himself that he is received in every town and city with the greatest enthusiasm, with every token of the highest appreciation, and he is escorted by committees from town to town, till he reaches the doors of my two colleagues. Would they then say to their families and friends, "Sit still, be quiet, don't move; I won't invite this man in, nor introduce him to my household, for fear he may next ask for a loan of money, or some new favor; or lest he may not behave like a gentleman, and act in all respects with propriety?" Is this Kentucky hospitality? No, sir; no. After such invitations and antecedents, a Kentuckian would meet the stranger at the door; would do it handsomely; would take him cordially by the hand, and exclaim, "Welcome, sir, thrice welcome to these halls. Allow me the pleasure of introducing you to my family and friends." This much is due from this House to the distinguished patriot and exile, who now stands at our door—our own invited guest. The resolution of the gentleman from Ohio does this, and commits us to nothing more; and I will vote for it with all my heart.

But it is said that if you receive him, as this resolution proposes, he will next ask your aid and intervention in the affairs of Hungary. Be it so. Will it be a crime in Kossuth to ask our aid? I think not. He has a right to ask, as we have a right to grant, or to withhold, as we may judge fitting and proper, when the demand or request is presented. And I ask how we will be in any worse condition to refuse his request, after we have received him with that hospitality and those civilities, which seem called for by the invitation which has brought him here. If you invite a man to your house, you receive him when he comes, with cordial courtesy; and if he afterwards presents an unreasonable request, or one which you do not think proper to concede, you may then with better grace decline.

It has been imputed, as an offence, to Kossuth, that he has appealed from the Government to the people. I do not so understand him. In contrasting the Governments of Europe with that of the United States—a contrast drawn from him by the excitement of the warm reception with which his landing in America was greeted by the people—he has said that here the people are sovereign, as they should be, and as he wishes to see them in his own country. In declaring that the people are the true sovereigns, I understand him as declaring his assent to that principle of our Government, which he wishes to see introduced into his own country. Has not every member of this House, in his canvassing, used the same language, and in the same spirit, when addressing the people? If so, did they mean any offence to the people or to the Government? If not, why take exception to the same language when spoken by Kossuth? For my part, being well convinced that he intended no offence, I will not captiously take offence. It is also urged that we offered him an asylum; that we invited him to become a resident amongst us; and that we ought not to receive him because he comes, not to reside, but as a transient visitor. But if you invite a person to take up his abode with you, and he comes to thank you, will you turn your back upon him, because he respectfully makes known that his circumstances prevent his accepting your kind offer? We do not do so in Kentucky. No, sir. Congress invited Kossuth to come to America. On his arrival, the President received him as the nation's guest, with a national salute. Congress has since invited him to the capital; and since he has come on that invitation, I, for my part, will receive him in the manner which I think our previous action requires—with the cordial sympathy due to his cause, with the honors due to him as its representative, and with the polite courtesy and generous hospitality for which the American people are distinguished, and none more than the people of the State which I have the honor in part to represent.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, demanded tellers on Mr. YATES's amendment; which were ordered; and Messrs. AVERETT and FOWLER appointed.

The question was then taken, and the tellers reported—ayes 6, noes 90. No quorum voting.

[Loud cries of "Call the roll!"

Mr. HARRIS, of Alabama, inquired if a motion that the committee do now rise was in order. The CHAIRMAN replied that the motion would not be in order, as the rule required that when the committee found itself without a quorum the roll should be called.

The roll was then called, and the committee rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the chairman of the committee reported the facts to the House, with the names of the absentees.

A quorum being now present, the committee resumed its session.

Mr. HARRIS, of Alabama, moved that the committee rise.

Mr. CARTTER demanded tellers; which were ordered, and Messrs. ORR and FOWLER were appointed.

The question was then taken, and decided in the negative—ayes 50, noes 74.

So the committee refused to rise.

The question was next again taken on Mr. YATES's amendment; and the tellers reported—ayes 2, noes 77. No quorum voting.

So the roll was again called.

The committee rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the chairman of the committee reported the facts, and the names of the absentees to the House.

A quorum being present, the committee resumed its session.

Mr. CABELL, of Florida, moved that the committee rise.

Mr. WALSH moved to amend the motion by adding, "with instructions to report the resolution to the House."

The CHAIRMAN ruled the amendment out of order.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, demanded tellers on the motion that the committee rise.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. SNOW, and JOHNSON of Tennessee, appointed.

The question being then taken, tellers reported—ayes 15, noes 74; no quorum voting.

The roll was called.

The committee rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the chairman of the committee reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, having caused the roll to be called, had found itself without a quorum.

Mr. ASHE moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee, inquired if a motion for a call of the House would not take precedence of the motion to adjourn?

The SPEAKER ruled that it would not.

Mr. TOWNSHEND called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

The question being then taken, it was decided in the negative—yeas 54, nays 88; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Aiken, Ashe, Averett, Thos. H. Bayly, Barrere, Rocco, Bowie, Brooks, Albert G. Brown, E. C. Cabell, Caldwell, Lewis D. Campbell, Churchwell, Cobb, Cullton, Dockery, Edmundson, Ewing, Fitch, Goodenow, Hall, Hammond, Harper, Isham G. Harris, Haven, Hendricks, Hillyer, Jackson, Andrew Johnson, James Johnson, George W. Jones, Kuhns, Landry, Lockhart, Humphrey Marshall, Martin, McMullin, Meacham, Miller, John Moore, Morehead, Murphy, Porter, Powell, Savage, Schermerhorn, Scurry, Smith, Stanly, Alexander H. Stephens, Taylor, Venable, Watkins, and Williams—54.

NAYS—Messrs. Willis Allen, Allison, Babcock, Bartlett, Bell, Bissell, John H. Boyd, Breckenridge, Brenton, Briggs, Buell, Busby, Joseph Cable, Carter, Chapman, Chastain, Cleveland, Clingman, Conger, George T. Davis, John G. Davis, Dean, Doty, Durkee, Eastman, Edgerton, Ficklin, Florence, Floyd, Fowler, Henry M. Fuller, Thos. J. D. Fuller, Gaylord, Gentry, Giddings, Gilmore, Gorman, Green, Grow, Henn, Horsford, John W. Howe, Thomas M. Howe, Ingersoll, Ives, John Johnson, Robert W. Johnson, Daniel T. Jones, Preston King, Letcher, Mace, Mann, Millson, Molony, Nabers, Newton, Peaslee, Penniman, Perkins, Rantoul, Robie, Robinson, Sackett, Scudder, David L. Seymour, Origen S. Seymour, Skelton, Smart, Snow, Benjamin Stanton, Frederick P. Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Stratton, Stuart, Sutherland, Sweetser, George W. Thompson, Thurston, Townshend, Tuck, Walbridge, Walsh, Ward, Washburn, Welch, Addison White, Wildrick, and Yates—88.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Before the above result was announced—

Mr. GENTRY asked the unanimous consent of the House to propound a question to the Chair. I simply wish to know whether it will be in order for me to move, provided the House does not adjourn, that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of the resolution, and instructed to report that resolution forthwith to the House without amendment?

The SPEAKER. It can be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. VENABLE. I object.

[Cries of "Go on!" "Go on!"]

Mr. GENTRY. I do not claim the right of debate, but only ask the permission of the House—

[Cries of "Order!" "Order!" "Go on!" "Go on!" from numerous members.]

Mr. GENTRY. I was about to remark—

[Cries of "Order!" "Order!"]

The SPEAKER. Objection being made, the gentleman cannot proceed.

The SPEAKER. There being a quorum present, the chairman of the committee [Mr. JONES, of Tennessee] will resume the chair. That is the order of business under the rules.

The CHAIRMAN resumed the chair, and announced that the question before the committee was the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. YATES] to the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. CHURCHWELL.]

Mr. CABELL, of Florida. The question before the committee was on the motion to rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida is correct. Upon this question tellers had been ordered, and when they had reported, it was ascertained that no quorum was present. The tellers will resume their places.

Mr. GORMAN. I beg to remark that I believe the question before the committee was upon the motion that the committee rise, and that the inflexibility of the opposition is such that every one must perceive, if they are determined to hold out, it is out of the question to pass this resolution to-night. Gentlemen will remember a similar scene upon the California question during the last Congress, and the amount of time consumed in five minute speeches. And in this case, unless gentlemen want to make five minute speeches, I insist that the committee do rise.

The tellers, Messrs. BROWN of Mississippi, and CHAPMAN, having resumed their places, the question was taken on the motion that the committee rise, and the tellers reported—ayes 62, noes 74.

So the committee refused to rise.

The question recurring upon the amendment to the amendment,

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, demanded tellers; which were ordered, and Messrs. GILMORE and CABELL were appointed.

The question was then taken, and the tellers reported—aye 1, noes 75; no quorum voting.

[Cries, "Call the roll!" "Call the roll!"]

The roll was then called, and the committee rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the chairman of the committee reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union having found itself without a quorum, caused the roll to be called, and instructed him to report the facts to the House with the names of the absentees.

There being no quorum present,

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, moved a call of the House; which motion was agreed to.

Mr. STANLY. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. WILDRICK called for the yeas and nays on that motion; which were ordered.

The question was then taken, and the House refused to adjourn—yeas 61, nays 77; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abercrombie, Aiken, William Appleton, Ashe, Averett, Thomas H. Bayly, Barrere, Boccock, Bowie, Brenton, Albert G. Brown, Burrows, E. Carrington Cabell, Caldwell, Lewis D. Campbell, Churchwell, Cobb, Cullem, Dockery, Edmundson, Ewing, Fitch, Freeman, Gentry, Goodenow, Gorman, Grey, Hall, Hammond, Harper, Isham G. Harris, Haven, Hendricks, Billyer, Andrew Johnson, James Johnson, Robert W. Johnson, George W. Jones, Kuhns, Landry, Lockhart, Humphrey Marshall, Martin, McMullen, Miller, Milson, John Moore, Morehead, Murphy, Powell, Riddle, Savage, Schermerhorn, Seccury, Smith, Stanley, Alexander H. Stephens, Taylor, Venable, Watkins, and Williams—61.

NAYS—Messrs. Willis Allen, Allison, Babcock, Bartlett, Bissell, Bowne, Briggs, Buell, Joseph Cable, Carter, Chapman, Chastain, Cleveland, Clingman, Conger, John G. Davis, Dean, Doty, Durkee, Eastman, Edgerton, Ficklin, Florence, Floyd, Fowler, Henry M. Fuller, Gaylord, Giddings, Gilmore, Green, Grow, Hascall, Henn, Horsford, John W. Howe, Thomas M. Howe, Ingersoll, Ives, John Johnson, Daniel T. Jones, Preston King, Leitcher, Mace, Mann, Meacham, Molony, Newton, Peaslee, Penniman, Perkins, Porter, Rantoul, Robie, Sackett, Scudder, David L. Seymour, Skelton, Smart, Snow, Benjamin Stanton, Frederick P. Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Stratton, Stuart, Sweetser, George W. Thompson, Thurston, Townsend, Tuck, Walbridge, Walsh, Ward, Washburn, Welch, Addison White, Wildrick, and Yates—77.

Mr. FOWLER. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, for the purpose of taking up the subject under consideration at its last sitting.

The SPEAKER. The House has already ordered that there shall be a call of the House, and it is the duty of the Chair to direct the roll to be called.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. The yeas and nays were called upon that question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not so understand it.

Mr. STEPHENS. I had just risen, when the motion was made to adjourn, to call for the yeas and nays, when the gentleman upon my right [Mr. CLINGMAN] called for them. The Chair said it was too late. I raise this point of order. It is never too late to call for the yeas and nays, because it is a constitutional right.

The SPEAKER. There is no doubt that it is a constitutional right, but it is too late to call the yeas and nays upon a question that has passed.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. Is the call still in force?

The SPEAKER. We are under an order of the House for a call of this House.

Mr. JOHNSON. I move that all further proceeding upon the call of the House be suspended.

Mr. STEPHENS. I demand the yeas and nays upon that motion.

Mr. ORR. I rise to a question of order. It is, that no proceedings have been had since the call of the House, and it is not in order to make such a motion now.

The SPEAKER. It is competent for the House at any time to rescind its order.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON. I withdraw my motion.

Mr. CARTTER. Is it in order to make a motion to adjourn?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. SWEETSER. I rise to a question of order.

Mr. CARTTER. I have the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CARTTER] has the floor.

Mr. CARTTER. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

So the House, at ten p. m., adjourned to Friday.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. M. BUTLER.

To the Senate of the United States:

MILLARD FILLMORE.

The message was read, and it was Ordered, That it be referred to the Committee on Finance.

PETITIONS.

Mr. DOWNS presented the petition of Richard King, praying to be allowed to enter certain land within the "Maison Rouge Grant," upon the terms allowed by the act of the last session of Congress for the relief of purchasers of land within that grant; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. SHIELDS presented the petition of Samuel Noah, praying compensation for services during the last war with Great Britain; which was referred to the Committee of Claims.

Also, the petition of officers of the Army stationed at Fort Laramie, praying an increase of compensation; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, the petition of Maria Davis, praying a pension and bounty land in consideration of the services of her son, Thomas Davis, in the late war with Mexico; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. GWIN presented two petitions of citizens of San Francisco, California, praying the establishment of a branch of the Mint of the United States at that place; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. DAVIS presented the petition of William Blodgett, a revolutionary pensioner, praying an increase of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BORLAND presented the petition of the late and present land officers at Washington, Arkansas, praying compensation for services in making entries of land under bounty land warrants; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. FELCH presented the petition of Elvira F. Smith, widow of an Army officer, praying a continuance of her pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, the petition of James Edi, praying the establishment of an Agricultural Bureau; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. WALKER presented a petition of citizens of Wisconsin, praying a grant of public land to that State, to aid in the construction of a railroad from Milwaukee to the Mississippi river; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. SEBASTIAN presented the petition of Edward Holt, praying permission to enter a quarter section of land, lying in a military reservation, on which he has made improvements; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have received a petition from William T. Finch, of St. Louis, which is of a rather extraordinary character. He represents that he feels that he is destined, in the providence of God, to fulfill a destiny. He says that he has been engaged during the whole course of his life in the cause of human progress and advancement. He says that, unfortunately, he has not met with that success in his efforts which his cause deserves. In this petition he evidently takes the side of "intervention" as his doctrine, and would go so far as to extend it throughout the world. He prays that Congress would take his memorial into their consideration, and that they would put him upon the same footing as other foreign refugees are placed who come into the United States; that they would give him a tract of land, and make a special provision to that effect, in the bill which he understands is now before Congress for granting lands to foreign refugees. He further states, that if this cannot be done without prejudice to the presidential election of 1852, he prays that he may at least have the warmest sympathies of this body. I move that this memorial be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The memorial was so referred.

MEXICAN CLAIMS.

Mr. DOWNS. Mr. President, I have in my hand one of several memorials of persons claiming indemnities for losses sustained in Mexico. They represent that their claims were presented to a former, as well as to the late Board of Mexican Claims; and some of them allege that their claims were entirely rejected by the late Board, although they had been approved by the previous Board. Others, again, state that their claims have been greatly reduced, and set forth that, in consequence of this reduction, injustice has been done to them by the Board of Commissioners; that, by the course which the Government of the United States has taken with Mexico, in relieving that country from all of these claims, it has become bound to do them justice, and they ask that another Board may be organized, or some other mode adopted, by which the justice of these claims may be ascertained, and payment of them made, if they are found to be just. I feel a good deal at a loss to know what ought to be done in cases of this kind. I understand that there are a great many of them besides those that have been intrusted to my care. They ask for an investigation of the matter by the Senate. They desire the appointment of a committee, with power to send for persons and papers. I entertained some doubt whether this was a proper subject for the investigation of this body; but I became convinced that there was propriety in it, since the object of the memorialists is not to make any criminal charge against the Commissioners, but simply to have a reinvestigation of their claims, in order that the facts may be ascertained, and the question be presented and decided, whether the Government of the United States will feel itself bound to pay these claims beyond the amount of indemnity stipulated in the late treaty with Mexico. It is suggested by some of the memorialists, that the three millions stipulated for the payment of these indemnities has not yet been exhausted, so that there is yet a fund remaining, out of which some of these claims at least can be paid; and thus there is a question presented to us which we must meet at some time or another, whether the Government will go beyond the awards of the late Commission.

I understand that there is a number of other memorials in the hands of Senators, of a similar character; and as they, like myself, feel some doubt as to what disposition should be made of them, I will merely present these memorials now, and move that they be laid upon the table.

The following memorials were accordingly presented, and laid upon the table:

The memorial of James W. Zacharie, assignee of Asmus C. Breedall, praying the establishment of a tribunal for reviewing the decisions of the late Board of Commissioners for investigating claims against Mexico.

The memorial of Edmund J. Forstall, and the memorial of Nathan C. Folger, assignee of Chas. Guenet, representing that there is a variance between the awards made on their claims by the Board of Commissioners for the settlement of claims of American citizens against Mexico, and praying the payment of that portion of their claims disallowed by the said Board.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion by Mr. HAMLIN, it was Ordered, That the petition of Charles Cooper & Co., on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee of Claims.

On motion by Mr. SHIELDS, it was Ordered, That the memorial of the clerks in the Adjutant General's Office, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

RECESS.

On motion, it was Ordered, That when the Senate adjourns, it be to Monday next.

NOTICES OF BILLS.

Mr. FELCH gave notice that he should ask leave to introduce a bill granting to the State of Michigan the right of way and a donation of public land, for the purpose of constructing a canal or railroad across the Peninsula of Michigan; and A bill to establish an additional land office in Michigan.

Mr. CLARKE gave notice that he should ask leave to introduce a joint resolution declaratory of the principles of the United States Government upon the doctrine of intervention with the internal relations of other States, and reaffirming the known settled policy of our country.

Mr. CLEMENS gave notice that he should ask leave to introduce a bill, to be entitled "An act to provide for the appointment of a United States district attorney for the northern district of Alabama."

RECALL OF OUR MINISTER TO FRANCE.

Mr. WALKER. A memorial has been sent to me, from an association known and styled as the "Industrial Congress of the city of New York," with a request that I would present it to the Senate. This memorial asks for the recall of the United States Minister from France, and the suspension of all diplomatic intercourse with the Government of that country. I present this memorial as I would present any other which might be transmitted to me with a request that I would present it. I will ask that it may be read. I do not know whether in consequence of its being read, it will go into the public journals of the day or not, but it is desired by the memorialists, in a letter accompanying the memorial, that it should do so.

The memorial was then read, as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

The Industrial Congress of the city of New York, in view of the late tyrannical and unpardonable conduct of Louis Napoleon Bonaparte, President of the French Republic, respectfully pray your honorable bodies immediately to recall Hon. William C. Rives, your Minister to France, and the suspension, on the part of our Government, of all diplomatic and commercial relations with that Power. The Industrial Congress is not insensible of the importance and responsibility that would naturally attach to the assuming of the position herein recommended. It well knows the fact, however, that the United States Government was the first to acknowledge the Republic of France. This recognition was manifested on the ground that the people of that unfortunate nation had become wearied of the form of government under which they so long had lived, and had risen in their majesty, and established a Democratic government.

Louis Napoleon Bonaparte, he whom the French people had honored with their confidence, and elevated to the Presidency of the Republic, has proved treacherous to the trust reposed in him; he has violated and trampled under foot the constitution he had solemnly sworn to support, and has in various ways proved recreant to his duty, and thrice recreant to humanity.

Under these circumstances, the Industrial Congress esteems it not only proper, but necessary and right, that our Government should enter its sternest protest against the flagitious tyranny of the usurper Napoleon.

In behalf of the Industrial Congress,

H. A. GUILD, Secretary.

Mr. W. I move that this memorial be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. MANGUM. If the motion which I am about to offer will take precedence of the motion which has just been made by the Senator from Wisconsin, I will move that that memorial be laid upon the table. It proposes to reverse the entire policy of the Government.

The PRESIDENT. The motion of the Senator from North Carolina has precedence.

Mr. MASON. Will the Senator from North Carolina withdraw his motion for a few moments? I will renew the motion, if the Senator desires it.

Mr. MANGUM. Certainly. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. MASON. I understood this to be a memorial to the Senate, but I did not distinctly hear what was its purport.

The PRESIDENT. It is a memorial from the Industrial Society of the city of New York.

Mr. MASON. From a society called the "Industrial Congress of the city of New York"—the memorial of a society of which we know nothing except through newspaper reports, asking this Government, because of an alleged change in the form of the French Government, to recall its Minister, under circumstances of discourtesy, without regard to the consequences which would certainly ensue on the adoption of such a measure.

Mr. President, this is from the same type of which we have recently had many impressions from the same quarter of the Confederacy. I had intended, when I first heard this memorial mentioned, to oppose any reference. I did not know what reference the honorable Senator who presented this memorial might ask for it, but I had intended, without wishing to treat that paper with any disrespect—and I do not wish to treat any paper with disrespect that may be presented here—to oppose its reference to the Committee on Foreign Relations, chiefly with the view of showing that the Senate are not disposed to entertain a proposition of that kind. I now renew the motion made by the gentleman from North Carolina, that the memorial be laid upon the table.

Mr. DAWSON. Will the Senator from Virginia withdraw that motion for a few moments?

Mr. MASON. I withdraw it if the Senator from Georgia wishes it.

Mr. DAWSON. This question is now fairly presented to the Senate; and if it be desirable on the part of any member in this body to make this issue before the American people, no time can be better than the present. If we are to change the foreign policy of this country at this time, let us do it now; but, on the other hand, if we are determined not to do so, let us announce it at once. What committee, then, can more appropriately make a report upon this subject than the Committee on Foreign Relations? Now I am desirous that this should be done. If it is desired that this question should be discussed, let it go before the American people, and let it be thus determined whether we shall take part in the strife and wars of other countries, or abide by the course which, in this respect, we have pursued since the first foundation of the Government. I trust that this reference may be made, and that that committee will report upon the subject. I hope the Senate will not lay the memorial upon the table.

Mr. WALKER. I should regret exceedingly if the introduction of this memorial should at this time give rise to any discussion. I certainly introduced it with no such expectation, no such desire, no such design. I perhaps know more of the association whence this memorial comes than most of the Senators who have spoken in reference to it. I believe it is constituted of a class of men to whom respect should be shown—that is, if respect is to be shown in the Republic of the United States to what constitutes the laboring and mechanical portion of the country. This association, termed the "Industrial Congress of New York," is chiefly composed of that class of men—not all of whom it is true—who are under the necessity of laboring for a livelihood. Some of them, I am aware, by their labors, have acquired a fortune. I believe them to be as good republicans as any who stand on this floor, and I should regret exceedingly that any disrespect should be shown to their memorial. I have moved its reference to the Committee on Foreign Relations; and I have done so with somewhat of the motive which has been expressed by the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. DAWSON.] The subject of our conduct towards certain foreign governments is one which is now agitating the country to a considerable extent. We shall undoubtedly have this subject fully before Congress. We cannot keep it out. It is one of those matters that will come before us, and it is now a mere question of time as to when we shall meet it. I think, as the Senator from Georgia has expressed himself, that the present is just as good a time to meet it as we shall ever see; and what committee is better qualified to report and throw light upon the subject than the Committee on Foreign Relations? I am grateful to that Senator for his concurrence in my motion to refer this matter to that committee. I hope it will go there, and that we may have a report which the country will study with that interest which such a report would be entitled to receive. This, I think, is the better way to treat this matter, and not as the Senator from Virginia would treat it, by rising immediately on the bare mention of the subject in the Senate with apparent indignation, both in his voice and manner, and moving to lay it upon the table. This is not the way to receive it. I said that I introduced this memorial because I had been especially requested to do so. That was my only motive, with the further motive of giving the memorial the reference I proposed, and that that committee to which this memorial and papers of a kindred character may be referred, may give us a report which may go before the country for its consideration.

Mr. MANGUM. It was certainly, sir, with no purpose of treating these memorialists with disrespect that I made the motion to lay the memorial on the table. But it asks us to act contrary to the whole spirit of the Constitution and our organization. The interposition of the voice of the Senate in matters of this sort would be a violation of the policy of this Government, which has existed from the earliest day until the present time. Sir, we shall meet these questions; we shall have them to meet. I, in my humble capacity, am willing to take the responsibility of meeting them at any moment. A joint resolution, of which notice has this morning been given by the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. CLARKE,] will bring up this question distinctly; and we shall see, upon the vote, who are willing to stand by the ancient usages and principles of the Government, and who, on the other hand, are willing to go for foreign intervention with the view of propagating liberty throughout the world. And here, sir, I can only hope that our policy may not be changed. I therefore again move, with no feeling of disrespect to the memorialists, that the memorial be laid upon the table. Should any gentleman, however, desire to speak upon the subject, I will withdraw the motion.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I desire to make a very few remarks.

Mr. BUTLER. I desire to say a very few words. I agree with very much of what my friend from North Carolina has intimated. If we are to change the whole mode of treating our foreign relations; if, instead of having a communication of this kind come through the Executive organ to the Senate, it is to be introduced by any public body—an irresponsible one, so far as it is known to the Constitution—I do not say irresponsible so far as regards their relations as citizens—if, I say, such communications are to be introduced into the Senate for the purpose of dictating to the Executive, who should take the initiative in all matters of foreign relations, it will, in my opinion, change the whole spirit of the Constitution.

I think the more promptly we meet the subject the better. What is this? A memorial from a numerous, intelligent, and I suppose a very influential body in New York, praying that we should take a step which does not lie within our province. In New York I have no doubt the politicians, who are so much wiser than the Constitution, or at least the usages of the Government under the Constitution, are willing to have subjects of this kind agitated to favor their wild doctrines, for wild I must call them—fourierism, socialism, &c.—which tend to pull everything down to a level with what they may conceive to be right. I do not say that this is not an accurate standard, but it is a standard to which I do not choose to conform. I regard this Union as a Confederacy of organized Republics, and I believe that our conduct in reference to it should be regulated by the Constitution. When we violate or disregard precedent on this subject, we are prepared for a revolution ourselves; and while looking out for the interests of others abroad, I think we had better take care of ourselves at home.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I concur very much in the views of the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. MANGUM,] and of the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. BUTLER.] But we shall have to meet all these new questions, which are forcing themselves before us, in some way or other, sooner or later. I think that the sooner you meet them, the better it will be for the country. The longer you postpone the combating of error, the greater root error takes; and through delay the most dangerous evils are more likely to spring up and overshadow the country. The question here is, What course ought we to take upon the present occasion? If these memorialists want Congress to interfere with the Executive department of the Government, would it not be proper to give them an answer through the committee, that that ought not to be done, that the Constitution does not tolerate it, and thus bring their attention to the very objections which are made on the different sides of this Chamber? As the memorialists are indorsed as respectable by the Senator who has presented the memorial, it does seem to me that the most satisfactory answer to them—if you can reason with them at all, if they are not enthusiasts, with whom you cannot reason—would be to say, you are interfering, and requesting Congress to interfere, with matters which pertain exclusively to the Executive department.

Mr. President, there is a temper pervading the country at this time which, in my judgment, is lamentable to the greatest degree. I feel called upon—and it is a thing which I very seldom do—to make a personal explanation, growing out of a speech made in the other branch of this body, embodying what seems to have been published in one of the New York papers. It is not my habit to apply epithets upon any occasion to any body or any set of men. Epithets do no good. If you were to take all the caustic words in all the languages, living and dead, and form them into a cataplasm and apply it to the gangrene souls of some men, you could not excite a redeeming blister. It is useless to apply epithets to any one. The matter to which I want to call the attention of the public—and I do it because it has found its way into a very able speech of Mr. SMITH, of Alabama, which has been printed for circulation—is the following:

"The scene on Wednesday last in the United States Senate, during the debate on the Kossuth resolution, was one of peculiar interest. The Russian Minister was the distinguishing feature of the occasion. He was observed to pay the deepest interest to the discussion. When Foote spoke, he looked on with that expression of contempt and disgust with which one of our codfish aristocracy would regard a Democratic harangue from Mike Walsh. When General Cass spoke, however, the countenance of M. Bodisco assumed a melancholy expression, as if touched with a presentiment of the power of the untimely Democracy of this country in shaping out the action of our Government. But there were two sides to the question; and when General Dawson, of Georgia, took the Russian side, the Siberian coldness of the distinguished envoy was thawed into a genial smile of approbation. The speech of Mr. Underwood, however, told with the happiest effect. Several times he lifted his hat, as if about proposing three cheers for Underwood, but desisted, most likely, out of respect to the Senate.

"The fact is, the Russian Ambassador had achieved a great victory. He had heard Kossuth and his cause denounced in the American Senate, and he had occasion to plume himself upon the result. Why? Because, as we are apprised, he had been seen in close and suspicious confab with Messrs. Dawson and Underwood on the floor of the Senate the day before."

There is not one word of truth in it, so far as I am concerned. No such confabulation ever took place—no such interview ever occurred on the floor of the Senate, or elsewhere. It is lamentable that letter-writers and others will flood the journals of the country with falsehoods derogatory to the character of Senators, and the character of this body. These things go abroad. But for the effect this might have of being published in the other branch of the Legislature, I would not have noticed it here, because it is useless to enter into a war with an editor, who has an arsenal of missives of that sort when you have none.

Mr. DAWSON. I would not have referred to this subject had not my friend from Kentucky alluded to it. I would now merely say that the statement made is not true. M. Bodisco may have been here, and I may have been in conversation with him, but not upon that subject; and as for the three being engaged in conversation together, I have no recollection of it. I have no recollection of having seen M. Bodisco here the day alluded to. As the Senator from Kentucky says, it is certainly a misrepresentation, or the writer may have been mistaken.

Mr. DAVIS. I do not think it a matter of great importance as to what disposition is made of this petition; but I agree with the remarks which have been thrown out by some gentlemen, that the time has arrived when it is, perhaps, expedient that there should be some discussion upon this subject, and perhaps action by the Senate upon it. And I hope when it does come up it will be deliberate in its character. I hope so, sir, because I think there is some misapprehension as to duties which we owe to ourselves and to other Governments. There is, I apprehend, an idea prevalent to some extent—I hope not largely so—that free institutions, republican Governments, and public liberty, may be created and sustained, and Governments of that character built up and supported by the bayonet. I hold this view of the subject to be utterly delusive and false. I hold that all the experience of the world is at war with that idea, and that it is quite impossible by force and violence to cherish and build up these principles of free government which are the result of peaceful inquiry and an enlightened public intelligence. The public mind must be imbued with a just conception of what political liberty is, and of the means by which it is to be enjoyed and maintained before it can be successfully established among a people. Premature efforts have and will be unavailing—war may overwhelm arbitrary power—an outbreak of indignation under oppression may break down the power of the oppressor. This is neither difficult nor uncommon, but how unfrequently such a state of things has proved a harbinger to public liberty!

We saw the revolutions in Europe in 1848. We saw the thrones of those ancient monarchies fall to the ground under the public breath. Almost no force, no violence, no arms were necessary to accomplish so great and so extraordinary an event in human progress. But what do we see now? Why, if there had been in Europe the requisite wisdom—that just view of the subject which I hope and have every reason to believe prevails throughout our own land, then was the time, then was the opportunity which every lover of liberty might have embraced to work out the great change in political condition so much desired. Then they might have built up free institutions, and established them permanently. But, I regret to say, they failed, signally failed; and is it not to be ascribed to a deficiency of those moral elements which are indispensable to the maintenance of public liberty? There was an absence of that intellectual discipline which prepares the public mind to act with harmony in the attainment of great objects, nor did the people seem to be able to take that comprehensive view of this subject which is indispensable to build up and sustain free government in the place of the absolutisms which they had prostrated. It is lamentable that it is so. No one can deplore it more than I do.

But may we not learn a lesson from facts of this sort which may be of some importance to us? Suppose that instead of these thrones crumbling to the earth in the manner they did, they had been prostrated by war, overtured by the intervention of the sword and bayonet; would the people, then, have been any better prepared to build up and sustain free institutions? No, sir, Public liberty ripens like the fruit upon the tree, and it is in vain to attempt to hasten it except by moral and pacific means. And give me leave to say, that whenever force and violence interfere with a view to hasten a people into the enjoyment of liberty which is not fitted for it, however patriotic the feeling may be, and however strong the desire for the enjoyment of public liberty, it ordinarily ends in swinging from one form of absolutism into another, and thus removing the day of deliverance further away. Do we not see this in France now? How long is it since the constitution, which was deliberately adopted, was overthrown and prostrated in the dust in a single night? It is only a few days since we received the intelligence that that constitution is in the dust, the Executive Department of the Government having abolished the Legislature and returned to the imperial model. All I wish to say at this time is, that when we are treating of this subject, do not let us delude ourselves with the idea, that force and violence can, unaided by fitting moral and mental preparation, propagate free institutions. There must be a preparation in the public mind for such an event. The public must have the requisite intelligence—it must embrace and understand the subject itself, in order to enable it to execute a purpose of this sort. If they have not this comprehension, all measures of force are not only wasted, subverting no efficient purpose, but are positively injurious. I hope this subject will be discussed and examined with calm consideration, and that in the end the policy of the Government which has hitherto sustained us may be vindicated.

I do not stand here to say that no case can arise in which intervention may not be appropriate. I can understand that a case may arise when it may become a proper, if not the only remedy. I can imagine that combinations may exist to suppress free government—combinations to overwhelm us in detail; but I see at this time no distinct evidence of such a purpose. When that day comes, and come it may—when that great issue is made, which is so much talked of, between absolute and free governments, we know where we shall be. We understand what part we shall espouse. But that day will come fast enough of itself, without our undertaking to hasten it. There will be nothing gained by undertaking to hasten it by wars and violence. On the contrary, much mischief may be accomplished in that way, by arousing the very spirit we deprecate. I do not wish to go into any discussion now; but I thought this was the appropriate time to throw out the views which I have suggested. I am indifferent as to what disposition is made of this memorial.

Mr. MASON. I will detain the Senate but a few moments. I entertain the impression which I expressed when this proposition was first sprung upon the Senate, that this memorial ought not to have a reference. And the first and insuperable objection is, that it asks the Senate to do what it is not competent for it to do—it asks the Senate to recall a minister. I have read the petition, and it is coram non judice. If it should be referred, the committee could do no more than to say that it was not within their jurisdiction. But I have another and still stronger objection, if a stronger one could be made to its reference. Sir, the communication that takes place between nations through their respective representatives is one of national courtesy alone. The President of the United States is the organ, and the only organ, of this Confederation in that respect. When he thinks it advisable or proper, in the discharge of his trust, to recommend that we should have a minister in one of the nations abroad, he does so upon his own responsibility as President; if Congress agree with him, they make an appropriation to maintain that minister. If it be important—and I need not say to the Senate that it is of the highest importance—that the departments of this Government should proceed harmoniously, and not interfere with, much less encroach upon the rights of the others, it is most important that it should be so between the President and the Senate. If this Industrial Congress, or any other body of men, think a minister should be recalled, let them address the President. But if we give their memorial a reference, it will be to that extent, at least, (considering that we have entertained the proposition made,) to give consideration to that which, in my judgment, the Senate ought not to entertain, because it does not come within their proper sphere. I will not go into the matter discussed by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAVIS,] as to the character of the present French Government, or what it may or may not become this Government to do. If I should say anything, I should say that the experience of the world will show, for the last half century, that the French people at present are incapable of self-government. Ever since the present century began we have had that demonstrated to us; but as to that, I have now nothing to say. I am against intervention in every form, whether intervention to prevent intervention, or intervention direct. This is intervention in a modified form. But, for the reasons which I have presented, with great deference, to the Senate, I think the committee, if this memorial were referred, could make but one report—that is, that the subject is not a proper one to come before this body. When the time comes—and we are aware that a resolution has been submitted by the Senator who introduced that memorial—for the subject to go to that committee, they will, I have no doubt, avail themselves of the opportunity to make known their views upon the whole subject. I renew the motion to lay the memorial upon the table.

Mr. WALKER called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 21, nays 14; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Atchison, Bell, Berrien, Butler, Clarke, Clemens, Cooper, Dawson, Downs, Geyer, Gwin, Jones of Tennessee, King, Mallory, Mangum, Mason, Morton, Rusk, Sebastian, Smith, and Underwood—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Burdett, Bradbury, Dodge of Wisconsin, Dodge of Iowa, Douglas, Felch, Hamlin, Jones of Iowa, Norris, Shields, Sumner, Wade, Walker, and Whitcomb—14.

So the memorial was laid on the table.

Mr. DAWSON, when called upon to vote, said: As this seems to be a test question, in order that my views may be understood I must vote to lay the memorial on the table.

REPORTS FROM STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. BUTLER, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill to change the times for holding the district courts of the United States in the western district of Virginia, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill to authorize notaries public to take oaths, affirmations, and acknowledgments, in certain cases, reported it without amendment.

Mr. BRADBURY, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill giving further remedies to patentees, reported it without amendment.

Mr. SHIELDS, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred a bill to create a Board of Commissioners for the examination and payment of claims against the United States growing out of the conquest of California, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill for the relief of Richard Charey and others, reported it without amendment.

Mr. RUSK, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to whom was referred the memorial of Rufus Dwinel, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for his relief.

The bill was read, and passed to the second reading, and the report ordered to be printed.

Mr. UNDERWOOD, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill to provide for the unpaid claims of the officers and soldiers of the Virginia State and Continental lines of the revolutionary army, reported it without amendment.

He also submitted a report on the subject; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. JONES, of Iowa, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill for the relief of the widow of Major A. M. Dade, reported it back without amendment.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. DAWSON asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill to provide for payment to the State of Georgia for moneys expended by the State for horses and equipments lost by volunteers and militia whilst engaged in the suppression of the hostilities of the Creek, Seminole, and Cherokee Indians, in the years 1836, 1837, and 1838; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. DOWNS asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill to grant the right of preemption to settlers on the public land known as the "Maison Rouge Grant;" which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

JUDICIAL SYSTEM IN NEW MEXICO.

Mr. DAWSON asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill to amend the act entitled "An act proposing to the State of Texas the establishment of her northern and western boundaries, the relinquishment by said State of all territory claimed by her exterior to said boundaries, and of all her claims upon the United States, and to establish a territorial government for New Mexico," approved September 9th, 1850; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BUTLER subsequently rose and said: A bill was referred a moment ago to the Judiciary Committee which ought to have been referred to the Committee on Territories. That committee has heretofore had cognizance of all territorial business. I do not wish to take work off other people's hands. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill introduced by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. DAWSON] was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. DAWSON. It is to amend the judicial system in the Territory of New Mexico.

Mr. BUTLER. I recollect that when this subject was up before, some gentlemen said it was a judicial question; but it was taken from the Judiciary Committee by a vote of the Senate. All the bills in reference to California and the Territories at the last Congress were taken from the Judiciary Committee and referred to the Committee on Territories. As the Territorial Committee has had the whole subject under consideration, and as the Senate took the subject from the Judiciary Committee, I do not wish it to be referred to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. DAWSON. The Judiciary Committee is the proper committee to which should be referred all matters relating to the judicial system of the country.

Mr. BUTLER. I trust that my friend from Georgia will acquiesce in my motion, and let the subject be referred to the Committee on Territories. If he knew as much of the history of the matter as I do, he would not resist my motion. If this subject had not before been taken from the Judiciary Committee, I should not now object to its reference to that committee.

The question being taken on the motion to reconsider, it was found there was no quorum present.

After waiting a short time without obtaining a quorum,

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, January 2, 1852.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m.

The Journal of Wednesday was read and approved.

REGENTS OF SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION.

The SPEAKER. In pursuance of the act of Congress, I beg leave to announce the names of the following gentlemen as the Regents of the "Smithsonian Institution:" Messrs. COLCOCK, of South Carolina, FITCH, of Indiana, and MEACHAM, of Vermont.

CORRECTION OF THE JOURNAL.

Mr. BRENTON. I rise to a privileged question. I wish simply to have the Journal corrected in two particulars. I find that I am recorded on the Journal as having voted in the negative on Wednesday last on the motion to lay on the table the appeal of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES,] whereas my vote should have been in the affirmative. I find myself again reported as having voted in the negative on the passage of the resolution stopping debate, when it should have been in the affirmative.

There being no objection, the corrections were ordered to be made in the Journal.

MR. PARKER, OF INDIANA.

Mr. STANTON, of Ohio, stated to the House that Mr. PARKER, of Indiana, was confined to his bed with sickness on Tuesday and Wednesday last, which would account for his absence from the House.

The SPEAKER stated that the first business in order was the call of committees for reports.

Mr. CARTTER. I would inquire whether it is in order during the morning hour to move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER. It is in order.

LOUIS KOSSUTH.

Mr. CARTTER. Then I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. Let us go into committee upon private bills.

The question was then taken upon the motion of Mr. CARTTER, and it was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended, and the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, in the chair.)

The CHAIRMAN. Under the decision of the committee at its last sitting, overruling the decision of the Chair, and declaring that the resolution introduced by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CARTTER] was the unfinished business at the preceding sitting of the committee, the Chair will so consider it on the present occasion.

Mr. CARTTER. Is it necessary to make a motion to take it up, or proceed as of course?

The CHAIRMAN stated the question as follows: The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CARTTER] had offered the following resolution, viz:

Resolved, That a committee of five be appointed by the Speaker to wait upon Louis Kossuth and introduce him to the House of Representatives.

Mr. VENABLE had moved the following, as a substitute therefor, viz:

That the Speaker be authorized to invite Louis Kossuth to a privileged seat within the House.

The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. CHURCHWELL] had moved to amend the original resolution by adding thereto the following, viz:

Provided, That by the adoption of the above resolution a compliment is only intended to the distinguished Hungarian.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. YATES] had moved to amend the amendment by adding thereto the following:

And that said committee be instructed to inform Louis Kossuth that the Government of the United States will not look with indifference on the intervention of Russia, or any other foreign Power, against Hungary, in any struggle for liberty she may hereafter have against the despotic power of Austria.

And the pending question is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. YATES] to the amendment.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Upon that I ask for tellers.

Mr. YATES. With the consent of the committee, I wish to withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. It cannot be done without unanimous consent.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I object, because I want to know how many will vote for it.

Tellers were then ordered; and Messrs. DAVIS, of Indiana, and BRIGGS were appointed.

The question was then taken, and the tellers reported—ayes 7; noes 111.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. STANLY. I wish to submit the following amendment to the amendment, viz:

Resolved, That in adopting this resolution this House does not believe that Louis Kossuth, nobly struggling in behalf of his oppressed country, has given his approbation to, or has any sympathy with the Abolitionists, who, in a convention recently held in Pennsylvania, at which an address was delivered by one of the members of this House, with a wicked disregard of the obligations of the Constitution and laws of the land, proclaimed that they sympathized with Kossuth in his heroic devotion to the cause of human freedom, "and expressed the hope that his herculean labors in this behalf would conduce to the overthrow of oppression not in Hungary alone, but in the United States and throughout the world."

Mr. S. said: I am glad to see that some gentlemen in this part of the House are satisfied with that resolution, and I hope they will vote for it.

I shall not vote for the resolution of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. CARTER], as it now stands. I wish to do all that courtesy requires. But in the first place, we have not had an opportunity of presenting our views upon this question of national intervention, and then again because a demand has been made in a solemn form, to give to Louis Kossuth the aid and influence of the Abolition society. I have regarded his movements with a great deal of interest since his arrival in this country, and had I been here when the resolution of welcome from the Senate was passed, I might have voted for it. Since then I have had my eyes opened, and I think it is time for every gentleman here, especially from the Southern country, to pause and see what they are about. Now look at the state of things on this floor! Who are the most strenuous and foremost in advocating this resolution? Who most ardent in violating all rule, and then sanctimoniously talking of good behavior? Is there an Abolitionist here, who is not urgent in demanding that Louis Kossuth shall be privileged to admission in this House? The honorable member from Ohio, [Mr. GIDDINGS], and from Massachusetts, [Messrs. MANN and RANTOUL], and others, are most earnest in aiding to stifle debate, and welcome Kossuth. One of the gentlemen from Massachusetts, who sits near the door, [Mr. RANTOUL], has said that Kossuth was a "State-rights man." A new idea of State rights! That gentleman attained his present position by his opposition to the fugitive law, which he denounced as violating "State rights." Louis Kossuth is proclaiming in his speeches, that he is a "State-rights" man. What is the meaning of this new doctrine? Do the gentlemen from Ohio and Massachusetts, [Messrs. GIDDINGS and RANTOUL] think the late Abolition convention in Pennsylvania were advocating State rights in adopting the resolutions I hold in my hand, and will insert in my remarks? I wish I had time to read them.

[From the National Intelligencer of Dec. 23d, 1851.]

At a Convention of "the members and friends of the Pennsylvania Anti-Slavery Society," held at Philadelphia last week, and said to have been "largely attended," and at which addresses were delivered by Hon. J. R. Giddings and the Rev. Wm. H. Furness, the following resolutions were passed, which appear to us to be too significant to be withheld from our readers:

Resolved, That we heartily congratulate one another, and the friends of liberty throughout the land, upon the auspicious result of the recent trial of Castner Hanaway; and that the efforts to revive in this country the obsolete and infamous doctrine of constructive treason, and to paralyze, by the terrors of the dungeon and the scaffold, not merely the fugitive's cherished hope of maintaining his freedom, but even the liberty of the press and the freedom of speech on the subject of slavery, have so signally failed; and that, in the final rejoicing of the people, in view of this result, we see an evidence of the progress of our cause, and a sign of its future triumph.

Resolved, That the Convention recommend to the Executive Committee of the Pennsylvania Anti-Slavery Society to prepare an address, for presentation to Louis Kossuth, expressive of sympathy with him in his heroic devotion to the cause of human freedom, and of earnest hope that his Herculean labors in this behalf will conduce to the overthrow of oppression, not in Hungary alone, but in the United States, and throughout the world.

A member of this House [Mr. GIDDINGS] was present at the meeting where they passed resolutions congratulating the country upon the acquittal of Castner Hanaway—one concerned in the Christiana murder—as being a sign of their success, and indicating a repeal of the fugitive law. They also passed a resolution, in which they expressed the hope that the efforts of Kossuth "would conduce to the overthrow of despotism in the United States." Now, sir, what does this mean? How are his efforts to aid the abolition of slavery in the United States? Sir, I cannot go in such company in honoring Kossuth: I fear I should reluctantly consent to go to Heaven in such company. [Laughter.] But I need have no apprehension of that kind, for these State-rights men, in the channel-house Abolition party, are not bound in that direction. I could not follow them, no matter how sacred the flag they pretended to raise. I should first desire to examine the foot of the standard-bearer, to see if it was not cloven. I could not believe such men were in the right path, unless one rose from the dead, to assure me, when I saw among their leaders, the members from Massachusetts and Ohio, [Messrs. MANN, RANTOUL, and GIDDINGS.]

Mr. Chairman, I have heard it said that Austria, Russia, and Haynau, had friends and advocates in this House. I might, with propriety, refer this unworthy remark to the gentlemen on the other side. The author of it will find among his political friends men of patriotism equal to his, whose deportment he had better imitate, who are as firm in their opposition to this resolution as any on this side of the House. Gentlemen of both parties are opposing it. Whigs and Democrats, actuated by principle, firm, true, and unflinching men, unite in opposing it. Sir, if I were to say of any one here, he spoke like one who had been intimate with discussions at the Five Points in New York, and there learnt his courtesy, I should not be more unjust than he was, who charged those who opposed this resolution as being friends of Haynau.

This matter demands careful consideration when we see the course adopted by the Abolitionists. When we see the proceedings of the Abolition Convention, when we look to the Senate, and there find Seward and Sumner taking the lead in this matter, I pause to know what it means. It is true that General Cass is with them, but Governor Seward will beat him at that game out of sight.

Not only in Pennsylvania, but Ohio, a man, bearing the name of Kinkle, is collecting money, and avowing he intends to aid in abolishing slavery. I have seen several of the Ohio papers publishing the proceedings of meetings in which the Pennsylvania Convention finds aiders and abettors.

I have only time to add, Mr. Chairman, that I am willing to do all that courtesy requires towards Kossuth: but it is due to him that his name be not allowed to appear as sanctioning the wishes of those who so unworthily are willing to injure him, to give themselves some poor advantage. We are by no means, sir, free from danger. Attempts have been made within a year to invade the Island of a power with whom we are at peace—our whole country has been agitated by the malignant efforts of fanatics North and South—Canada is not always quiet, the world is seeming to be unsettled, and a war is still proclaimed against the South by the enemies of the country. Is this a time for us to commit ourselves to Kossuth's doctrines? I think not. And my duty compels me to vote against this resolution as it now stands.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I have long known the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. STANLY], who has just taken his seat. I know his sentiments, and the feelings of his heart. I have long served with the gentleman here, and I receive all that he has said in perfect kindness. I will say to him at the commencement, very frankly, that he need feel no trouble about going to Heaven in company with those referred to, or alone. Indeed, I fear he will never find the path there. [Laughter.] The gentleman has not discussed any matter which is before the House, but he has thought proper to travel to Philadelphia and pick up some newspaper article there to discuss in this Hall, instead of the resolution which is under consideration. He appealed to me, as if he felt confident that he could so far draw me from my propriety as to enter into a discussion of that kind. In this he certainly paid no compliment to my judgment. If he had known me as well as I think he should have known me, he certainly would not have flattered himself that he could induce me to participate in such a discussion on such an occasion as the present. I thank him not for the left-handed compliment thus paid to my judgment. He should have known that no slaveholder or overseer could drive me by the crack of his lash into such an impropriety. To the sentiments which I have at any time expressed here or elsewhere, the gentleman well knows I am ready on all proper occasions to respond and vindicate. The gentleman will bear testimony to the promptitude with which I have ever been ready to take up and answer any attacks upon my opinions on every fitting opportunity. The gentleman shakes his head. I ask the gentleman to point to a single instance in which I have ever failed to meet any gentleman who has assailed my opinions in this Hall when propriety would admit.

Mr. STANLY. You have now.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I will do that on a proper occasion, but not upon this resolution, and under the five minutes rule. The gentleman knows that the opinions which I entertain could not be explained, enforced, and advocated in a five minutes speech. He is attempting to draw me into the vortex of interminable debate, but I am not to be caught in that way. He may, perhaps, catch some younger opponent and drag him into this improper discussion, but he might have known that I was not to be thus caught. I repeat for the fortieth time, that I will not discuss matters which have no relation to the pending resolution. Sir, have we not trifled with this subject long enough? We have injured our reputation in the eyes of the American people by the revolutionary and disorganizing proceedings which were witnessed at our last session. And for what? To prevent the passage of a simple resolution in honor of Louis Kossuth. A minority of this House, in which I regretted to see my friend from North Carolina—for I did not expect to find him in such company—have resorted to revolutionary and disorganizing measures for the purpose of defeating the will of the majority. The country will mark it as an era in the history of American legislation.

In conclusion, I will say to the gentleman from North Carolina that here or elsewhere my opinions are the same, and I shall be prepared to vindicate them as soon as we enter upon the discussion of the President's message. I shall then be most happy to cross swords with the gentleman if it be his pleasure.

Mr. STANLY. Just as I expected. He backs out.

Mr. STEPHENS demanded tellers, on the amendment to the amendment.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. INGERSOLL and BRIGGS were appointed.

The question was then taken, and decided in the negative—ayes 27, noes 92.

So the amendment to the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN moved to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee, by adding thereto the following:

Provided, That nothing in this resolution shall be construed as impairing the effect, or questioning the policy of the measures passed by the last Congress, known as the compromise measures.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. I raise the question of order, that this amendment is not at all pertinent to the subject-matter before the committee. It relates to the compromise measures of the last Congress.

The CHAIR ruled the amendment out of order.

Mr. WASHBURN. I move, then, to amend the amendment, by striking out the word "only." The resolution of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CARTER] is but a compliment, and it seems to me that it is a natural and appropriate sequence of the joint resolution, which passed a few days ago by the nearly unanimous voice of both Houses of Congress. The opposition which this resolution meets with seems to me a very strange thing. What does this resolution imply? What is it? It implies just what it expresses—nothing more and nothing less. It says that inasmuch as this distinguished stranger has been invited to the capital, and is now at our gates, it is proper and fitting for us to provide for his introduction and reception here, in a manner worthy of ourselves and worthy of him. It cautiously and studiously ignores the question of intervention or non-intervention, and all other questions. And if it is strange that such a resolution should meet with opposition, it is still stranger to me that it should meet with the kind of opposition which it has encountered here. Gentlemen are not only unwilling to pass the resolution, but it seems as if they felt themselves under An obligation to insult the distinguished stranger, and wound the cause that they profess to have at heart. Not content with opposing the resolution in a fair, legitimate, and straightforward way, they have resorted to every species of obstruction and strategy to prevent us from coming to a vote on the resolution. And for what? Simply to stifle the expression of the feeling of the people of this country in favor of Kossuth and his cause. It would have been infinitely better that no resolution had been introduced here, than that we should have made such a record as will be made—a record that will stand as long as this Government shall last—a record that cannot be blotted out or burnt out.

Gentlemen have endeavored to alter this resolution. They have stood here and chaffered and bartered as to the amount of courtesy that is to be shown to this distinguished republican. They have tried how small a modicum of courtesy they could get extended to him. Allusion has been made to other distinguished individuals who have been invited into this hall. But there has been no case at all parallel to this. Kossuth is here by invitation of Congress. He was brought here, as the President informs us, under the authority of Congress. In an Executive communication, the President recommends that we shall consider the manner in which this man, brought in by our own authority, shall be received and treated. Besides all this, we ourselves, by a nearly unanimous vote, have invited him to come here. He has responded to that invitation, and is now here. I say, then, that we can pass no less resolution than this. This is not like the cases of Father Mathew, Ujhazi, and others. No other individual has been brought to our shores under the authority of Congress, been made the subject of an Executive communication to Congress, or been invited here by joint resolution of both Houses. The circumstances of the case are different, and therefore our action should be different also. I submit further, that it is better to let the naked question go to the country than to qualify it. I have voted against all amendments and qualifications, because I will not have an issue raised before the country independent of the question of courtesy. If we adopt any qualification, we raise an issue; on that issue we shall have to go to the country, and it will be said by the people and the press throughout the land that the House of Representatives has as good as said, that should there be another contest between Austria and Hungary, Russia may interfere as much as she likes, with our consent. The adoption of a qualification of any kind means something. You cannot add anything that is unnecessary and out of place without meaning something, and that is the translation that the country will give to it. Now, I say that it is not wise for us to make such an issue. It is better for the peace, quiet, and harmony of the whole country that we should pass a simple resolution.

Mr. BARRERE. Coming as I do from a State which is said to be favorable to this resolution, and intending to vote against it, it is right and proper that I should give some of the reasons why I take that course. It is but proper that the friends of the resolution should give us the reasons why it should be passed, and I have had some anxiety to ascertain why it should be passed. One gentleman tells us that it is a mere matter of courtesy; another, that it is a tribute to the great principles of republicanism and national independence; a third, that it is to indorse Kossuth's views of intervention; and a fourth tells us that it is because the executive officers of this Government have not acted towards M. Kossuth with becoming deference. As to the matter of courtesy, if any blame attaches to the manner of his reception in Washington, it attaches to the Senate's committee, who received him; and not to the executive officers of the Government, or the minority in this House. The President of the United States and the heads of several executive departments, have received and treated him with marked attention and respect. I do not think that this proceeding can be properly looked on in that light. Gentlemen may get up here as much as they like, and say that they do not mean this or that; but the construction that the country, our people at home, and the world, would put upon this resolution will be that we indorse this man's doctrines.

Now, what principle does he represent? If he represents in these United States any principle at all, it is the principle of intervention for the sake of non-intervention, and further, one which has not been remarked upon in this House, but which I think more objectionable than any other, and that is, that we shall acknowledge the independence of Hungary—a nation that is not now in existence; and also, that we shall acknowledge him as Governor of Hungary, when he voluntarily resigned his office to a man whom his friends and admirers in this House charge with being a traitor to Hungary. If this man comes here as the representative of any great principle at all, it is of that. Are we to suppose that he preaches one set of doctrines, when he intends to represent another? Look at his speeches; if they contain the views and doctrines which he intends our people to understand he came here to represent, then he is the representative of the doctrine of intervention for the sake of non-intervention. I do not blame Kossuth. I undertake to say that I feel as much sympathy for him, and admiration for his talents, for his genius, and for the efforts he made in behalf of his oppressed country, as any man in this House. I undertake to say, that no man here feels more for downtrodden humanity, wherever found, than I do. The gentlemen who represent the opponents of this resolution as the apologists of Haynau, or any other tyrant, show little understanding of the intelligence of the American people. I am not to be swerved from my course, because the great cities are in favor of this man's doctrine; for I take upon myself to say, that the people of the great cities are not so sound upon the political questions of the day, as are the yeomanry of the country. We are asked whether we are afraid that Kossuth wants to lead the American people away from Washington, and the policy of Washington. For one, I am not afraid. I do not fear that the American people would be led away from the sacred policy of the country, even though the American Congress should prove recreant to its duty, and vote for all of Kossuth's propositions; for I have no fears that any foreigner, however distinguished, whether a whiskered Pandour, or a fierce Hussar, or any other character, can lead the popular mind of this great country away from its allegiance to its long cherished and settled policy. The hearts of the American people are still fixed with pride and exultation upon Washington and his policy.

Whilst, therefore, I am willing to extend to Kossuth the hand of friendship; whilst I am willing to do all in my power for downtrodden humanity, I am not willing that the American Congress shall commit itself to the approbation of a set of doctrines which in my opinion are destructive of the maxims, views, and principles laid down by the great founders of our Republic.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The question was then taken on Mr. WASHBURN'S amendment to the amendment, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. STANTON, of Ohio. I offer the following as an amendment to the original resolution:

And that the Government and people of the United States sympathize with the people of Hungary in their struggle for liberty.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is not strictly in order. The original resolution has no reference to Hungary, but to Louis Kossuth.

Mr. FICKLIN called for the reading of the resolution.

The resolution was read.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. STANTON] is in order as an amendment to the substitute of the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. VENABLE.]

Mr. STANTON, of Ohio. Being a friend to the original resolution, I had not intended to occupy the time of the committee in discussing it, and I should not have done so had I not differed from my colleague, [Mr. BARRERE,] for whom I entertain a very high regard. It is the first time I have ever heard it gravely argued that a simple act of civility—an exercise of the common hospitalities of life, committed a man to the sentiments of his guest. This resolution contemplates a simple act of hospitality. Nay, it is not even that. The two Houses of Congress have cordially welcomed Louis Kossuth to the capital and the country. He is now the nation's invited guest. He stands before it in that position, and it cannot be escaped. This resolution—copied from one passed by the Senate almost without opposition—merely contemplates the formal mode of receiving and entertaining him. It is as though you said, when he reaches your door, "Walk in, and take a seat." That is the whole effect of the resolution.

But it is argued that the adoption of this resolution would commit this Congress and the nation to the sentiments of their guest. Sir, I take it to be no such thing. I will not clog this resolution with anything that is inconsistent with it—with anything that is equivalent to saying that we perform this act of civility reluctantly, grudgingly, and hesitatingly, because that is the same as saying that Kossuth is an unwelcome guest.

Some other things that have taken place in this discussion are rather extraordinary, to my mind. Even though gentlemen are not disposed to intervene in favor of Hungary or any other country, I cannot see the necessity of avowing it before the time arrives. The only effect of it can be to say to the despots of Russia and Austria, "So far as we are concerned, you have our approbation, indorsement, and permission to go on and trample under foot the nations of the European continent." For one, I will hold out no inducements or encouragement to the despots of Europe to trample down the people there.

But I will do this: I am prepared to express the sympathy of the Government and people of this country in the European struggles for liberty. I am prepared to interfere with every species of intervention short of armed intervention; and whether I will resort to armed intervention or not, I will decide when the question shall properly arise. I will say, however, that I can hardly imagine any contingency in which I would vote for a national war, for I am opposed to wars of all descriptions; but I am certainly opposed to declaring in advance and before the occasion calls for it, that we will under no circumstances intervene.

But, sir, as I have already said, that question is not now before us. The question before us is simply one as to the formality in receiving one who is already the nation's guest. I shall vote for this resolution because it is a simple form that has been adopted by the other branch of the Government, and I shall vote for it, too, as an additional indication of the sympathy which we feel for the downtrodden classes of Europe. Sir, I confess I have been much surprised that upon a question of this sort, involving no constitutional or political principle, and which commits the House and the nation to no practical action that affects the welfare of the country, revolutionary struggles should have been resorted to, and that a minority should have placed itself in the attitude of a factious endeavor to defeat the passage of the resolution. Now, if such a course is to be pursued upon a question of this sort—if a minority is to rule this body upon an unimportant question, may we not expect the same power to be exercised on every occasion; and is not the right of the majority to govern in this House effectually stricken down?

Mr. MILLSON. I confess, Mr. Chairman, that I am somewhat impatient of this protracted discussion, and I should be entirely satisfied if the committee would come at once to a vote upon the propositions pending before it. I, for one, have not engaged in any scheme, as gentlemen call it, to defeat the final action of the committee upon the resolution of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. CARTER.] I have voted upon every division, and therefore the censures, of which gentlemen have been so lavish, are not applicable to me. The committee seem determined to adopt some one of the complimentary resolutions under consideration, and I see no good that can result from mere delay; not that I am at all in favor of the resolution of the gentleman from Ohio. On the contrary, I am warmly and decidedly opposed to it, though not altogether for the reasons that have been urged by those who have preceded me in the debate. The adoption of this resolution will not necessarily commit us to intervention in the affairs of Hungary, though there is a significance in the declarations of Kossuth, and in the remarks of several gentlemen upon this floor, which makes it dangerous to overlook this objection entirely. Nor do I see, as the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. STANTON] seems to suppose, that there is any necessary connection between the question of slavery and a public reception of Kossuth. And I am sure, I need not say that my objection to the resolution proceeds in no degree from an unwillingness to bestow upon the distinguished Hungarian any civilities which it might become us to offer. I oppose it as a mere matter of good taste. I do not think it becomes an American Congress to bestow these honors upon any man. I supposed, when Kossuth arrived upon our shores, that he would receive those civilities—even those exaggerated honors which our people are sometimes so ready to offer. To all this there could be no serious objection. He and they, in their character of private citizens, stand upon a footing of equality. But, sir, the people of the United States, in their public, corporate, sovereign capacities, ought not to bow down before any created intelligence. I am unwilling that the Representatives of thirty-one sovereignties should dance attendance upon any mortal now living. I object, then, to this resolution. I object to it in substance and in phraseology. I will not consent that a committee of five gentlemen of this House, representing as it does the sovereignty of thirty-one States, should wait upon—yes, that is the phrase—should “wait upon Louis Kossuth.” It implies subserviency. It seems to exact the customary service rendered by an inferior to his superior. It is true, that in the view in which I am presenting this subject, it is a mere question of dignity; but in national affairs, questions of dignity are matters of importance. Junius has well said, “the feather that adorns the royal bird, supports his flight.”

But, sir, is it one of the functions of an American Congress to bestow honors upon men; and is it altogether consistent with the genius of a republican government to do so? It seems to me, sir, to be eminently anti-republican. These things belong to monarchies, but they are out of place here. The President Montesquieu understood this principle very well when he said that honor was the chief spring of monarchical governments. The framers of our Constitution understood it very well, when they denied to Congress the power to grant titles of nobility. But you seek to confer honors—mere honors—when, as it seems to me, the very spirit of our institutions forbids it. But some gentlemen have said that these honors are offered to Kossuth as the representative of a great principle. Sir, what man can claim to be the representative of a great principle? Political equality is of the very essence of our institutions; and no man, whatever may be his advantages of fortune, station, or intellect, can claim to be the representative of a principle, which belongs to the whole community. But, sir, are honors ever bestowed for other reasons than those now urged by the friends of this resolution? It is always to the representative of some principle, so to speak, that they are offered, when they are conferred at all. They are not given to mere flesh and blood, but to rank, and wit, and piety, and to literary merit, or military genius. These are some of the principles represented by those upon whom the favor of the monarch may be lavished. But it is not so with us. Our republican theory is, that the agents of the people are their servants. Office is not designed to confer personal distinction, but to furnish occasion for rendering public service. The only orders they receive, are those they are required to obey.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The question was then taken, and the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CLARK. I desire to inquire of the Chair what is the precise state of the question?

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment pending is that of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. CHURCHWELL] to the original resolution.

Mr. CLARK. I suppose it will be in order for me to offer an amendment to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. It will be in order.

Mr. CLARK. On examining the pending amendment I find that my amendment will not be in order as an amendment to the amendment. I suppose, however, it will be in order to offer it as an amendment to the original resolution.

The CHAIRMAN. It will not be in order. One amendment is already pending, and no amendment is in order except as an amendment to that amendment.

Mr. CLARK. Then I desire to give notice that I will offer an amendment to the resolution as soon as I shall have an opportunity.

Mr. STUART. I move to amend the amendment by inserting the word “high” in the amendment immediately before the word “compliment.”

Mr. S. said: As my amendment indicates, I do not rise for the purpose of discussing the resolution nor the many subjects, extraneous as I think, which have been brought in and discussed during the many hours which this committee have been in session, but I rise simply for the purpose of saying, with many gentlemen who have spoken here, that I think it is due to ourselves that we should come to some definite action upon this subject. There is much which I should like to say, both in the way of argument and in reply to the many propositions which have been submitted as amendments to this resolution, and also in reply to many arguments which have been advanced, but I repeat that it is not my purpose to do so. I rise merely for the purpose of saying to those who favor the adoption of the resolution, and those who oppose it, Let us, as becomes the representatives of thirty-one American States, proceed to definitive action upon this subject, and proceed at once. I hold myself ready to vote for any form of words that suits any gentleman or any number of gentlemen upon this floor, provided those words are respectful in their character, and do not carry with them, either expressly or impliedly, a commentary upon the course of Kossuth since he arrived upon our shores. I offer these words for the purpose of pacification. Let us meet upon some common ground, that is objectionable to none of us—with which we can all comply—and let us adopt it. But do not—I ask it of the friends of the resolution—insist so strenuously upon any particular form of words as to render our course obnoxious in the opinion of our opponents. And I ask of our opponents, that they will not show themselves so punctilious as to insist upon incorporating into this resolution—a mere matter of hospitality—anything which is offensive. Do not say to this distinguished man what you would dislike yourselves to say to any man who was approaching your domicile—“I am happy to meet you and welcome you to my home, but I despise your politics, I condemn your religion, and I have but a very slight opinion of your morality”—for, sir, Louis Kossuth might well say, From all such compliments as this “good Lord deliver us.” Now, I say—and it is all I rose to say—I beseech gentlemen upon both sides of the House to stop this debate; let us agree upon some form of words—something that is acceptable to all, and let us adopt it, and put ourselves right before the country and before the civilized world.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Compliments! the gentleman says. If we do not pass this resolution, unaccompanied with any proviso, Mr. Kossuth may say: “Good Lord deliver me from such compliments.” Now, sir, I understand that this gentleman, Mr. Kossuth, says that he does not want your compliments. He has not come here to receive compliments. His mission is of quite a different character. He has distinctly made it known. He wants you to change the policy of your Government. This is the issue he made in New York. The same he presented again in Philadelphia; and still again repeated in Baltimore. And why should we pay a compliment to any man, who says in advance that he will not thank you for it—that he is for higher and more substantial things than empty, unmeaning ceremonies? Do we, or shall we, maintain our own self-respect, in tendering compliments under such circumstances? Gentlemen may look upon it as they please, but I cannot, for myself, consider the passage of the resolution in any other light than an indorsement, to some extent, of the principle which he advocates. Any unusual mark of esteem to any man engaged in any great work or enterprise, it seems to me, cannot be looked upon but as expressing, in some degree, an approbation of the cause advocated by the recipient of such distinguished tokens of respect.

But this, sir, goes to the merits of the resolution and the propriety of its passage. I did not rise to discuss that now. My object is to repel the charge that the minority in their action against the majority in this matter are pursuing a factious course. I belong to that minority; and I am prepared to defend their course against any such charge either in this Hall or out of it. We stand upon the right. And in this position I intend, as one of them, to stand in perfect defiance of both in-door and out-door clamor. If there be a faction here, it is the majority; who are endeavoring to carry their views in open violation of the rules of this House. I stand by these rules; and if standing by them, I stand by law and order. Who is it that is disorganizing this body? How was this resolution brought in here, and how is it attempted to be passed through? Stand up, gentlemen, and defend yourselves if you can. If not, cease to talk about faction. How did this resolution get here? Last Monday a week, when it was perfectly in order, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CARTER] moved to suspend the rules, that he might be enabled to offer it. It required two thirds of the House to suspend the rules. There were less than two thirds who voted for his motion. That method failing, he came into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union and offered it here, contrary to all usage, precedent, and parliamentary law, as well as in direct violation of two express rules of this House. Never before was it proposed, in any parliamentary body that I ever heard of, that the Committee of the Whole, who are only empowered to act upon such matters as are referred to them by the House, could originate and bring forth matter that had not been so referred. Yet the gentleman did this, and the majority sustained him in it by simple numerical force in overruling the decision of the Chair. But this is not all, sir. The 17th rule of this House, which I hold in my hand, expressly declares that “No person, except members of the Senate, their Secretary, Heads of Departments,” &c., &c., “shall be admitted into the Hall of the House of Representatives.”

This is one of the standing rules of this House; and the 136th rule also declares, that “no standing rule of, or order of the House, shall be rescinded or changed without one day’s notice thereof.” No such notice was given or pretended to be given, and yet the efforts of the majority are to carry this measure by trampling these rules under their feet. They attempted to carry their object by overriding the rules of their organization. Who then are the disorganizers? They desire to have a committee appointed to introduce into this Hall Louis Kossuth, and this cannot be done but by “rescinding,” or “changing,” or violating the 136th rule. Their object is to violate that rule, and to do this by numerical strength and the clamor of faction, which clamor is usually resorted to by those who are claiming the exercise of illegal and unjust powers.

Now, sir, I say that these rules, made and adopted in pursuance of the Constitution, for the government of the proceedings of the House, are the law of the House. And who are greater disorganizers than those who strike at the very foundation of their own organization? The gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. MILLSON], to whose speech I listened in the main with a good deal of pleasure, dropt one word, or uttered one sentiment that I cannot let pass; and which I regretted to hear him express. He said while he was opposed to the passage of the resolution, yet finding that it was the manifest wish of the majority that it should pass, that he felt inclined to acquiesce. Now, sir, I will at all times defer to the will of the majority, when legally and constitutionally expressed, but never will I yield to the dictation of a majority, who attempt to force upon me any measure in violation of law. Some gentlemen talk as if a majority had the right to have their way upon all questions, and that it was a duty to yield to the known will of the majority. Sir, I deny the doctrine to lo cælo, and I will oppose the will of a majority on this floor, and everywhere, when that will does not conform to law, as unyieldingly as I would oppose any other outrage upon my rights.

Sir, I war against usurpation, let it be begun by many or few, by a majority of this House, or by one man. What is usurpation, Mr. Chairman? It is the exercise of powers that do not belong to those who claim the right to enforce them, whether it be by many or a few—whether it be by a majority of this House or one man—there is no difference. And I shall war against the attempted usurpation of the majority here this day, with the same spirit that I would war against the usurpation of Louis Napoleon, if I were in France; and the craven heart that would basely yield to your illegal declaration, barely because you are in the majority, would be a fit subject to bow his neck to his imperial edicts! And I will resist you as quick as I would him. I would as soon have one master as many. I tell gentlemen, then, plainly, that they may cry factious opposition as loud and as long as they please. For one, I intend to stand by the rights of the minority in this House under the rules. I should feel that I was an unfit representative of the rights of a free people, if I should on this occasion prove recreant in the defence of my own. This is the position I occupy, and I shall hold it, and maintain it, if I can get a little band to stand by me, much longer than Louis Kossuth ever defended the liberties "of his fatherland." You shall never pass this resolution in this way, if I can prevent it.

When this resolution was first brought forward on Monday week last, I gave a silent vote in my seat against the suspension of the rules to allow its introduction. If two thirds had voted for it I should simply have recorded my vote against it. I should not have attempted to thwart the will of the majority properly and legally expressed. But I shall not be run over in this way, nor will I sit by and see the rules thus trampled upon for any purpose. If gentlemen wish to carry this resolution, which they say there are two to one for, let them cease their present efforts to force the House in this irregular way. Let them bring forward their motion next Monday to suspend the rules, to allow it to be properly considered. If they have two to one they can easily pass it. I shall offer no further obstacle than my vote and my reasons, and if there are not two thirds for it they will have to do as all others do who fail to succeed in their wishes in bringing forward measures here: they will have to submit to the will of the House when properly and fairly expressed under the rules. If they attempt again to force the measure by numbers alone, or by physical indecorum, they will then see the same unyielding defence of the rights of the minority on this floor. I feel that I and the minority hold the right in this issue. No one on this floor can or has pretended to answer the argument; and holding this position, I shall continue to hold it and maintain it; I shall never surrender it. Upon that you may depend.

The question was taken on the amendment to the amendment, and it was lost.

Mr. WALSH moved the following amendment to the amendment:

And that the Speaker, in the name of the members of this House, then assure him of their deep gratitude for his signal services in the cause of freedom, and their high respect for his exalted character and genius.

Mr. W. said: I have but very few words to say in support of this amendment. The gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] said that this House was putting a mark upon this age. It is, and I am afraid it is going to be a bad mark; I am afraid it is going to be one in reference to which we can utter the ejaculation of "God save the mark!" I therefore want to relieve myself from all connection with it. Sir, we have fallen upon strange things and strange times. But a short period has elapsed since this distinguished leader, with his associates, were driven from their country, and sought refuge within the limits of Turkey. Christendom then turned her back upon her own champion. The Crescent seemed for a time to assume the energies of nature, and to borrow its light from the Sun of Righteousness. You transferred these people then to your own country, and they were received upon your shores with a shout of welcome such as is not often heard within the limits of the Republic, prone as that heart is to generous impulses. Maid and matron joined the holy cause; and ministering angels, around your domestic altars, left the scenes of their devoted life, and came forth to bless and hallow the festival of freedom. The sons of toil, with the sweat of their brow turned into gold, came with their offering to his cause. Men, who are accustomed to instruct the wise and hold together the masses, stood confounded by his wisdom, and fascinated by the necromancy of his voice. And where is this distinguished individual to receive, for the first time, the cold shoulder? It is in the councils of the American nation! not in the aristocratic Senate—so called—but from the offspring of the masses, so that your future history will read, that of all the people of this great nation, none refused to give him hospitality except those who asked him to come and get it.

I have but little more to say upon this subject, but I ask gentlemen what translation we can give of our votes upon this subject; what translation do we give to the President of France? Gentlemen will recollect that the President of France opposed his coming into that country, and we follow in his footsteps and say that he shall not come into the Capitol. When the record of this proceeding gets to Europe, what will the friends of liberty think of it? I have not time to look into the matter now, or to express my views in connection with it; but let us look at the effect upon our people. When the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Bayly] said the other day that there were not twenty men in this House who were in favor of intervention, the words were scarcely out of his mouth when the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. DISNEY], almost the head of his party—a man who was a prominent candidate for the Speakership in the Democratic caucus, and standing in the position he does, whose words are almost the organ of the Democratic party, what does he tell you? He says, never trifle with the people. This man is at your door, and if you do not receive him, if you turn him away from your door, recollect the people will take the matter into their own hands.*

Mr. NEWTON. I do not rise for the purpose of explaining or translating the votes I have been giving, and expect to give, upon the resolution. They need no explanation, no translation. My object is to offer some considerations to the committee in favor of the passage of the resolution. The resolution is a simple proposition to introduce Louis Kossuth, the representative of a nation whose elevation we devoutly wished, and in whose depression we sincerely sympathize, to the Hall of the House of Representatives of the American nation—the most free, liberal, enlightened and powerful nation on earth; one whose free institutions and laws are the wonder and admiration of the whole civilized world; for whose model the masses of all enlightened nations strive. There is no long trail of committals, either express or implied. It is a sentiment of itself, and for itself—a sentiment we inspired, kindled, and kept alive, and permitted to spread over the land, until it would be suicidal to our honor to repel and reject it. Is this resolution and its effects a mere offer to see the naked walls of your Capitol, and view coldly and ceremoniously the nation in its Representatives, there congregated? No, no! verily, no! It is an introduction to the nation, in all her honor, her glory, and her pride. It is an introduction of the Hungarian nation to the American nation in her full majesty and strength. It is a free-will offering of the American nation in her prosperity, to the Hungarian nation in her adversity. It is a compliment rarely bestowed, but never more richly deserved. It is a relation we sought, and cannot, in honor, coldly repel and cast off. How should it be bestowed? Not grudgingly and provisionally; not with exclusions of conclusions; not timidly and fearfully; not in a controversial spirit, grumbling and murmuring; but as freemen, proud and able to bestow upon one proud and deserving to receive. Does he come uninvited and unsought, seeking an introduction, or interfering

*BALTIMORE, January 3, 1852.

DEAR SIR: There are some errors in the report of my remarks, in your paper of this date, which I ask the favor of you to correct by the publication of this note.

I referred to the services done by the Government of Turkey to Kossuth and his associates, and in that connection said: "That in this matter the Crescent appeared to adapt itself to the analogies of nature, and to receive its light from the blessed Sun of Righteousness." This language, I admit, is imperfect; but it conveys the meaning. The terms used by your excellent Reporter, "The energies of nature," do not bring about that result. I should have said, that in this matter the Crescent appeared to be governed by a rule analogous to that prevailing in the natural world, and to derive its light, &c.

I said that Mr. DISNEY himself (not his words) might be considered, looking to his relations to the Democratic party, as in some measure an organ of its views.

I did not say that this gentleman told the House not to trifle with the people. I referred to his avowal, of concurrence in the views of Kossuth, and relied upon it as an additional reason why the House should do justice to that exalted person. That if it did not, there were thousands of citizens whose sympathies would carry them to the path laid out by the eloquent gentleman from Ohio. I was in this course of remark when the rule stopped me.

Yours, very respectfully,

T. YATES WALSH.

JOHN C. RIVES, Esq.

with your relations, or disturbing our repose? No; his skill and bravery in contending with a more powerful foe, and still more powerful intruder, for the elevation of his country, attracted the eye and ear of this nation, and his bleeding country guided the nation's ship, with the nation's resolve, across the ocean, to his incarceration, humility, and degradation, and found him shut up and shut out from the world, because kings and kingdoms feared him. And what did you do with him? To use his own eloquent sentiment, you raised him from the dead, and warmed him into life, and permitted him to breathe the free air, inhale free principles, express free sentiments, and tread the free earth.

You have done more: you have invited him into your palace; and, when he knocks at your door, will you refuse him, vilify him, slander him, and shut the door against him? Who asks anew to let him in? At least two thirds of the nation. And yet you repel their earnest wish and desire, and turn them off with scorn and contempt. I ask you to pause and obey the expressed will and desire of the nation, that reached him in his solitude and safety, and the reiterated voice of the country, and not crucify him afresh, in the house of his friends. Has he feelings? If so, respect them. Has the nation feeling? If so, respect that. But be careful how you repel this warm, this generous, and eloquent heart, that swells with the love of liberty and patriotism, and let loose the ultimate and crowning wish of his humble prayer rampant over the country. The importance of its passage is vastly increased by its introduction and discussion. Here we are, a house arrayed against itself. To one room he is invited and welcomed, and from the other he is shut out and refused an entrance, and by it is degraded in his own estimation, and that of his country and the world. What! have you brought him here, and held him up to the gaze of the world to humble and degrade him anew? If you refuse him this common civility and turn him from this Hall, and not permit him to see the promised land, you turn him over to the common arbiter of all from principles—the People. And they will ride with him upon the wings of the wind, and spread his prayer to the four corners of the earth. Do you not loose the reins every hour you withhold your assent, and give impetus to the car? Soon you cannot chain, nor guide it. Retract—yield to the voice of the nation, once and again expressed. Yield to the voice of your honor knocking at your door. My friend from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] seems to stand upon technicalities, with great tenacity. But does not that gentleman know that the interpretation of these rules is a matter which the House must determine for itself?

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Will the gentleman allow me for a moment? When the rules of the House have been adopted, they are the law of the House, and can only be altered or changed through the regular mode.

Mr. NEWTON. So I understand.

Mr. STEPHENS. Very well; that cannot be done without giving one day's notice.

Mr. NEWTON. True. But the application of this rule to the subject under consideration, is a matter of opinion for the House to determine. [Here the hammer fell.]

The question was taken, and the amendment to the amendment was negatived.

Mr. CLARK. I move to amend the amendment by adding the following, viz:

In the same manner as General Lafayette was introduced to the House of Representatives.

Mr. C. Mr. Chairman, I have kept my seat here for two days in silence, while this interesting topic has been under discussion. I have been moved with no ambition to break that silence; but, sir, the door has been open wide, and every gentleman who chose to express his sentiments upon this subject has had an opportunity. I take this occasion to say, that a large portion of the people whom I have the honor to represent here, have, within a few years, emerged from the same condition of depression and wretchedness which attends the people of Hungary, who are now the focus of all the world; and that condition draws upon them not only the observation, but the solicitude and sympathy of the world. But, sir, were I to keep utter silence, those whom I represent, at least that portion of my constituents to whom I have alluded, might think I was recreant to the cause which they hold dear. They might suppose I did not treat their sentiments and feelings with proper respect. I am moved, therefore, to utter a few sentiments upon this resolution, and I regret to see that the question has taken somewhat of a geographical character. Now, sir, I think this condition of things is to be deprecated. I come from the latitude of 42° 30', and had I sufficient standing and influence here to make myself a peace-maker, I should hope that the little I may have to say would not be without influence, and that the humble sentiments I express would not fall to the ground without any effect whatever.

I can say to my brethren from the South, that they need have no fear of me. There are circles at home, limited, it is true, in which I am regarded as sufficiently a Southern man; and if this be sufficient to regard me a constitutional man, I glory in the estimate put upon me where I live. But, Mr. Chairman, to return to the resolution itself: it seems to me that those gentlemen who have opposed this resolution have opposed it without cause. I speak with great respect of those who have opposed the resolution. I refer to the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS,] from Kentucky, [Mr. MARSHALL,] and the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. STANLY;] and I can say most heartily that anything that should fall from the lips of those gentlemen would be entitled to great consideration from me. But, Mr. Chairman, are not their conclusions badly drawn from the proposition? They seem to suppose that if this proposition passes it is an indorsement of the doctrines which have been so zealously and pointedly set forth by the distinguished Hungarian.

Mr. Chairman, I think these conclusions are unwarranted. It has often been said that the only purpose of this resolution is a mere compliment to the distinguished hero of Hungary.

Mr. CLARK. I must say I am taken by surprise.

Mr. BELL. I had no desire to take up the time of the committee by remarks upon this subject; but as it has become fashionable for every member to either offer or oppose some amendment, for the purpose of submitting his views upon the matter at issue, I rise to protest, to some extent, against what I understood to be given as the opinion and feelings of the free and independent citizens of Ohio, by one of my colleagues. I refer, Mr. Chairman, to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. DISNEY,] who spoke on a former day, under the half hour rule. When he was inquired of to know how far we may go with propriety, as a nation, upon the subject of intervention, he was not, if I understood him, free to say that he was in favor of the policy which we have recognized since our national existence—that policy of non-intervention, recommended to us by the Father of our country, and practised by all the Presidents of this Republic, from that day to this.

The correctness of the policy of non-intervention with the governments of Europe, is imbedded deep in the hearts and affections of the people of Ohio. I undertake, Mr. Chairman, as one of the representatives from that State to say, that the people of Ohio have no desire to change that policy. But, while I am free to declare their true adherence to the former and present wise policy of our Government, on the subject of foreign intervention, I do not believe that the people of Ohio, or of any considerable proportion of our common country, wish by the action of this House, to proclaim to all nations of the world, that they may exercise the iron rule of tyranny against those who are struggling to be free as we are, and there shall be no arm to interfere or succor the oppressed. I had prepared, and would have offered, had it been in order under this proposition, an amendment to the original resolution, providing that nothing in the aforesaid resolution should be considered as committing this Government in favor of, or against foreign intervention. That is the ground upon which we should stand.

I heard my friend from North Carolina, [Mr. STANLY,] in his ingenious manner, refer to other subjects, which I hope will not be connected with this resolution or debate. Does he suppose his friends from the South can be driven from their support of this measure by such a course? I ask the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. STANLY] if he expects to drive these men from the support of this resolution by the shallow pretext of its receiving support from some of the Abolitionists? If he does I think he is mistaken.

The compromise measures of last session have also been referred to. Sir, I do not desire to disturb those measures, now that they have been adopted; not because I approve of all the principles embraced in those measures—for some I do not approve—but because they were passed and adopted as a compromise; and I assure my friend from North Carolina [Mr. STANLY] I intend for one to live up to the spirit of those measures; but at the same time I pledge him and his associates further, being one of the representatives of a free State with a free constitution, that I will not permit the enemies of the abolition cause, here or elsewhere, (because the name may be obnoxious to some,) to connect that with this matter, to interfere with or prevent my expression of sympathy for the oppressed and the great principles of human freedom, of which Louis Kossuth in the Old World has been the exponent, and the man whom we have welcomed to the people of the nation, and assented to by their approbation of the sentiments contained in the President's message. The voice of this nation has spoken. You have invited Kossuth to your doors. Will you invite a guest to your table, and not set him a chair? Is that the courtesy we are to extend to him? I hope not.

The question was then taken on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. CLARK] to the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee, and it was rejected.

Mr. FULLER, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman I offer the following amendment to the amendment, viz:

That in the opinion of this House the armed intervention of one Power in the affairs of another, is a violation of the public law of the world, and a war upon the rights of nations.

Mr. F. Mr. Chairman, I have forborne heretofore from taking any part in this discussion, with the hope that the majority of this House would succeed in securing that final action upon the original proposition of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. CARTER,] which appeared to meet with the wishes and approbation of a majority of this body; but, sir, as that seems to be impossible, and as the opportunity is now afforded for all to express their opinions and views upon this question, I avail myself of it.

I was surprised that there should be any difference of opinion with regard to the propriety of that resolution. It seemed to me, that it should have met at once the unanimous approbation of every member of this House; that it was but the natural consequence of what we had already done; that it was simply, as has already been stated, an act of courtesy, merely decent behavior, upon our part, in consideration of what had previously been done. Why, sir, who intervened to prevent the surrender of this illustrious stranger to the power of Austria? Who intervened to secure his liberation? Who brought him here? Upon whose invitation is he here? And now that he is knocking at our doors, shall we throw them open, or close them in his face? It is, to be sure, sir, an expression of opinion in favor of the Hungarian revolution. I regard it as such.

It has been well said, by one of the most gifted orators of this country, "that, although the whirlwind has its power, and the lightning its power, and the earthquake its power, yet public opinion is stronger and mightier than them all." And it is to a very great extent the public opinion of this country in behalf of free institutions and popular rights, which is now operating, and shaping, and moulding public opinion abroad. That the uprising will come which is now predicted, I verily believe; and that Italy and Germany, Poland and Hungary, and even Ireland, will yet successfully maintain their independence, I fervently hope—for, although the head of Emmet has rolled from the block; although O'Brien, and Mitchell, and O'Meagher, have been doomed to transportation, yet the spirit of liberty is still there, and as long as there remains a heart to throb, or a hand to strike, there is hope for their deliverance.

The spirit of liberty has been well compared to volcanic fires, which cannot be quenched, and which, though mountains may press it down, and oceans overwhelm it, will sooner or later burst forth and flame up to heaven. I trust the time will come quickly when all these oppressed nations may successfully wage war upon their oppressors, and when the chains which have been forged for them will be burst asunder, and break the heads of their oppressors—when men will be free to act as God has made them free to think. I believe that time is coming; but whether it be the policy for this country now, forcibly to interfere, is a very grave proposition, and one which I very much question.

At home, on our own soil, in our own defence, we can resist the world. The experiment of a foreign war, on a foreign soil, requires sober consideration. Our mission is one of peace—our settled policy has been "friendly relations with all, entangling alliances with none." It is true, we live in an extraordinary age. Ancient usages and established policy are yielding to the force of new opinions. Our position, too, is marked and peculiar. We are the free State among the nations. Our history, mixed population, and commercial relations make us interested observers of what is transpiring in Europe; and while we are watching the effect of our opinions and our example upon the continental Powers, is it not proper for us to declare ourselves in favor of popular rights and constitutional liberty? It becomes us as a nation to assert that we are in favor of our own institutions, and that we recognize the right of every people to frame and adopt their own form of government, and that we regard any foreign interference as an infraction of the law of nations, and at war with the rights of humanity.

Mr. MANN. I do not rise, Mr. Chairman, to utter any warm or passionate words. I wish only to bring the committee to a calm consideration of the circumstances in which we have placed ourselves. The relation in which we stand to Governor Kossuth, was not sought by himself but by us. This Government took the initiative. The Secretary of State, by command of the President, first addressed a communication to our Minister at Constantinople, in behalf of this fugitive from Austrian oppression. This step was followed by the action of the Government, tendering the services of a national vessel to bring him to our shores. He accepted the offer, placed himself under the protection of the American flag, and from that time was the nation's guest. The President, in his last annual message, referred to the subject anew, spoke complacently of what had been done, and commended the subject of further demonstrations in behalf of this victim flying from oppression, to the consideration of Congress. In both Houses, Congress acted promptly upon the subject. A joint resolution was passed, extending to him a "welcome,"—a sincere one, as was believed,—and this resolution was signed by the President, and officially communicated to Governor Kossuth. He accepted our salutation, and, as in duty bound, has come here to make fitting acknowledgments. And here we all know he is. He waits only to have the etiquette of his introduction arranged. The President has received him. The Senate has fixed upon the day for a formal reception. But the House demurs. While he stands at our door, we compel him to overhear a wrangle within the House, whether he shall be received in pursuance of the invitation given, or driven rudely away.

And why this revocation of our "welcome," and this breach of decorum? So far as I have heard, for no reason except that he is understood to entertain some notions in regard to a breach of the "law of nature and of nature's God"—respecting the intervention of one nation in the affairs of another to put down its liberties. He says that when a people has broken loose from the oppressor, a third party ought not to come in and bind the chains anew. But in the first place, is this sentiment so flagitious that we cannot bear to hear it? and, in the second place, where has it been uttered? He has advanced it only in circles of his friends where he has been invited to speak. He has, as yet, made no request of the Government of the United States to act upon this principle. When he makes such a request of us, it will be time enough to refuse him. Nay, I go further, and say, if we fear that he will make such a request of the responsible head of this Government, and we are unwilling to trust that head to answer it, let us instruct the Committee on Foreign Relations to bring in a resolution defining or denying the duty of this Government to interpose against the tyrant and in behalf of the tyrannized. That is the only legitimate method of treating the case. All else seems premature, irrelevant and insulting. Nothing can be more grateful to his enemies and the enemies of liberty in Europe, than to see him rebuffed by the American House of Representatives. After having first invited this distinguished exile to come to us from abroad, and then welcomed him when he landed upon our shores, I hold that it would be disreputable to ourselves, and wounding to the spirit of freedom everywhere, now to refuse to take him by the hand and give him free access to our House. I trust the country will analyze the votes, and place the responsibility of the opposition where it belongs.

The question was then taken upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FULLER] to the amendment; and it was rejected.

Mr. TAYLOR offered the following amendment to the amendment:

No change is contemplated in our uniform course of policy, in conducting our foreign relations.

Mr. POLK. I rise to a question of order. I wish to know, having no special knowledge of the operation of the rules of this House, whether a principle can be ingrafted upon a simple resolution of courtesy? The resolution of the gentleman from Ohio, if I understand it, was to appoint a committee to wait upon Louis Kossuth, and invite him upon this floor. Can gentlemen offer amendments involving the great principle of intervention or non-intervention, upon the part of this Republic? I want to know the legitimacy of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee cannot argue the point.

Mr. POLK. I will not argue it; I merely suggest a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. POLK] makes a point of order upon the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TAYLOR] to the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. CHURCHWELL.] The original resolution offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CARTER] is one proposing to appoint a committee to introduce Louis Kossuth into the House of Representatives. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TAYLOR] proposes to declare what we intend by that invitation. It is considered by the Chair, that the amendment is in order, as it is a further declaration or explanation of what the House intends to do or not to do, and the Chair believes it to be pertinent, and therefore in order.

Mr. POLK. I wished to submit my case, so that I might make an appeal.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman appeal from the decision of the Chair?

Mr. POLK. I do appeal.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I desire to ask a single question—if after you send a matter to a committee, the only way in which you can attach anything to it is not by instructions to that committee?

Mr. POLK. Is the appeal debatable?

The CHAIRMAN. The appeal is debatable within the five-minute rule.

Mr. POLK. I do not desire to occupy five minutes; but wish to call the attention of the House to this question: If members are permitted upon this floor to offer amendments and discuss them for five minutes, when are we to terminate? It will be interminable. Then, sir, if the decision of the Chair is sustained, I can offer an amendment to make temperance—as my friend from Illinois, [Mr. RICHARDSON,] a few days ago, did—to make temperance the ruling order and control of this House. [Laughter.] I can go further: I can introduce an amendment declaring that this Government will not longer entertain diplomatic intercourse with the Emperor of Austria. I can go further: I can declare upon an amendment to this resolution, that we will cease diplomatic intercourse with every Government upon the continent of Europe. Is that legitimate? Sir, can I go to that extent? Can I declare upon this resolution that we will maintain relations of friendship and amity and of commercial intercourse with Great Britain? No, sir; you will say. But if I cannot do so, can you decide that the declaration of intervention in the affairs of Europe can be considered here under the head of a proposition merely inviting a distinguished foreigner to take a position upon this floor. Why, sir, if you give me such a liberty, if you give me such a privilege, I can bring to your attention the question of the Prometheus, the Thrasher case, and introduce upon this platform the case of the poor Cuban invaders. Where is it to stop? Whenever the chairman of this committee will mark out the boundary, and fix a place to stop, I am willing to obey his mandates. But when he confines himself to this case, and admits propositions directly reflecting upon our foreign intercourse, I must claim the privilege of throwing myself upon the House to be sustained.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair must state that, upon reflection and examination of the rules, the decision of the Chair that the appeal is debatable, was not correct.

Mr. POLK. I take back my five minutes, then. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN read the 136th rule in support of his decision. The Chair decides that the pending amendment is in order, and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. POLK] appeals from that decision. The question now is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?

Tellers were demanded upon the question and ordered, and Messrs. Brown, of Mississippi, and Hunter were appointed.

The question was then taken, and the tellers reported—yeas 88, noes 35.

So the decision of the Chair was sustained.

Mr. TAYLOR. I would not consume the time of the committee even for five minutes, if it were not that I hear it constantly asserted upon this floor that the illustrious Hungarian exile, now within the city of Washington, is "the guest of the nation." He has been received formally by the President of the United States, courteously, hospitably, frankly, and in a manner becoming this great nation and the Chief Magistrate of our country. He is still remaining with us, receiving the attentions and polite hospitalities of the people of this city, and of many of our most distinguished citizens. But, sir, I dissent from some gentlemen upon this floor, who insist that Louis Kossuth is "the guest of our nation." How is he the guest of the nation? What steps have we taken to bring him to this country, and how does he come here? Are all who emigrate to our country the guests of the nation? The messages of the President of the United States made to Congress at the present session, which I have before me, present a list of papers embracing a correspondence between the Secretary of State of the United States and our Foreign Minister at Constantinople, a letter from Kossuth himself, and one from Mr. Brown, our dragoman at Constantinople, the whole tenor of which goes to show that these Hungarians desired to emigrate to the United States. That after the Sublime Porte received four thousand Hungarian exiles in his Empire, and defied the power of Russia and Austria to take them out of it by force, that he saved their lives by his power, and maintained them by his hospitality and liberality. The people of the United States had their feelings of sympathy aroused in their behalf. And the correspondence between the Government of the United States, our Minister at Constantinople, and the Turkish authorities, shows, that while the Sultan of the Ottoman Empire was willing to pay their expenses to get them out of his country, and send them, or some of the chief personages amongst them, to England, they had not the means wherewith to come to the United States of America, as they desired to come. What did we do, sir, under this state of things, having had their wishes officially announced to us? The Congress of the United States, on the 3d of March, 1851, passed a joint resolution, which I have before me, and which, it appears, gentlemen of this House forget or greatly misunderstand. In order that the country may understand it, and that I may stand justified before my constituency, I will read the resolution:

"Whereas the people of the United States sincerely sympathize with the Hungarian exiles, Kossuth and his associates, and fully appreciate the magnanimous conduct of the Turkish Government in receiving and treating these noble exiles with kindness and hospitality; and whereas it is the wish of these exiles to emigrate to the United States, and the will of the Sultan to permit them to leave his dominions: Therefore,

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be, and hereby is, requested to authorize the employment of some one of the public vessels, which may be now cruising in the Mediterranean to receive and convey to the United States the said Louis Kossuth and his associates in captivity."

We gave them a passage in one of our foreign vessels as exiles—as men desiring to emigrate to this country for a secure asylum and a home. And that secure asylum and protection they would receive; the whole power of the Government against the nations of the Old World would be exerted to secure it to them, now that they are amongst us, if they choose to remain with us and become adopted citizens of this country. Now, I say we have not made Louis Kossuth, by this proceeding, "the guest of the nation." We have welcomed him and his associates. We have welcomed him, formally, to the capital and to the country. I ask, does that imply that we should go further, and place him upon the footing of Lafayette?—the immortal Lafayette, who struggled and fought for us during our seven years' revolution, and aided us by his fortune, the risk of his life and sacred honor, to secure our own independence? I say that he cannot be placed upon the same footing, and does not deserve to be received in the same way. Yet I would extend to him every sympathy and kindness suitable to his late eminent position in Hungary and his present situation, and do all that is becoming in me to do towards him and his associates, as a citizen of the United States of America.

I now wish to allude one moment to the course of my colleague from the Ashutubula district, [Mr. GIDDINGS,] who, during the debate in the last session of the committee, read at the Clerk's table certain resolutions which he alleged had been voted for by myself.

In the debate on Wednesday last, my colleague, [Mr. GIDDINGS,] to show what he considered my inconsistency, charged me with voting for a certain resolution of a direct character, interfering and proclaiming our sympathies with a foreign and European nation in the cause of freedom; and caused certain resolutions of Mr. Cummins, offered in this House on the 22d March, 1848, relating to the state of affairs then existing in France and Italy, to be read by the Clerk. They were read as follows:

"Resolved, That it becomes the people of the United States to rejoice that the sentiment of self-government is commending itself to the favorable consideration and adoption of the intelligent and thinking men of all intelligent nations.

"Resolved, That the only legitimate source of political power is the will of the people, and the only rightful end of its exercise, their good.

"Resolved, That we sincerely hope that downtrodden humanity may succeed in breaking down all forms of tyranny and oppression, and in the establishment of free and national governments for the good of the governed, and not for the aggrandizement of those who govern.

"Resolved, That we tender our warmest sympathies to the people of France and Italy in their present struggle for reform, and sincerely hope they may succeed in establishing free and constitutional governments, emanating from and based upon the will of the governed, suited to their wants and condition, and such as will secure to them liberty and safety.

"Resolved, That we tender our sympathy and hopes of success to every people who are seeking to establish for themselves free and national governments, and that whatever of blood and treasure may be shed or spent in a struggle of the oppressed against the oppressor, is to be charged to the unjust resistance of the oppressor, who strives to hold and exercise the rights of the people, usurped against their will, and exercised for the benefit of the few and the oppression of the many, and not to the people, who seek only to regain and exercise their natural rights in such manner as will best secure and promote their own happiness and safety."

I was charged with voting for them, and with inconsistency; and the gentleman refused to say who offered the resolutions, or give me any information about them. He did not even say who offered them. But how does it appear by the record? See the Congressional Globe, page 521, vol. 18. These resolutions were objected to, at the time they were offered, and they were not received. No direct vote was afterwards taken upon them. Nor did I vote for them. The Congressional Globe was before the gentleman, and he saw and well knew that I had not voted for or against those resolutions, because no vote was taken upon them, except to suspend the rules to introduce them. I therefore must believe that it was the design of the gentleman to misrepresent me—knowingly, willfully, and maliciously—by a false allegation.

[Here the hammer fell, the five minutes having expired.]

Mr. TAYLOR intended to continue his remarks, by observing:

To show this, it is only necessary to look at the report of the proceedings of Wednesday last, in the Globe of this morning. The gentleman is there represented as having read by the Clerk the following resolutions: (See Congressional Globe of 1847-8, vol. 18, page 592:—)

32D CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 7, 1852.

NEW SERIES....No. 13.

"Resolved, That in the name and behalf of the American people, the congratulations of Congress are hereby tendered to the people of France, upon the success of their recent efforts to consolidate the principles of liberty in a republican form of government.

"And be it further resolved, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested to transmit this resolution to the American Minister at Paris, with instructions to present it to the French Government."

Now, sir, my colleague [Mr. GIDDINGS] did not cause these last resolutions to be read at all. But to show what he called my inconsistency, he had the resolutions of Mr. Cummins read, and not those adopted by the Senate, and sent us for concurrence, in relation to the then recently-established Republic of France.

Those resolutions of the Senate passed this body on the 10th of April, 1848, by a vote of 174 yeas to 2 nays. I voted in the affirmative for the Senate's resolutions. Nor do I act inconsistently, by opposing the resolution offered by my colleague, [Mr. CARTER.] I regret that my colleague [Mr. GIDDINGS] should find it necessary to say, in reference to myself—

"Has my colleague forgotten? Sir, it becomes politicians to have memories. If for nothing else, they should know what to do."

Sir, I would say to him, that it is equally necessary for politicians to have honesty, and to speak the truth. And now, Mr. Chairman, let me ask you, and honorable gentlemen on this floor, with what grace or propriety he dares thus indirectly to censure me, by charging me, in this House, with voting for resolutions when I did not vote for them, and holding me up to the House and to the country as acting inconsistently.]

Mr. BOWNE. Mr. Chairman, I rise here, sir, as a friend of Kossuth and of Hungary, and as one who has voted with the majority throughout this contest, to ask of that majority a simple act of justice. We find that the minority in this House will not rest satisfied with the resolution now under consideration as it now stands, inasmuch as it seems to them to contain something under the rose. Sir, it has been said that any appendix to this resolution would seem to imply a discourtesy to Louis Kossuth. Permit me to suggest that we have high authority for differing from this proposition. We find that the President of the United States, in the very act of welcoming Louis Kossuth in person to these shores, took occasion to say clearly and distinctly, and withal most courteously and properly, that this Government could not indorse the doctrines of its distinguished guest, as regards the propriety of an intervention on our part between the Powers of Europe. Under such circumstances we find the minority here unwilling to vote for a resolution which seems to cover a cloven foot. Now, as a friend to this measure, I call upon the majority, and especially upon my friend from Ohio, [Mr. CARTER,] who offered this resolution, to come forward and explain to this committee whether or not there is anything behind the proposition now under consideration which does not appear upon its face. I consider that this is due to the minority, and that if the majority do not do it they are responsible for giving what is here been called an insult to Kossuth.

It has been said that by protracting this debate, we insult him. Who are responsible for this, I desire to know? a majority, a majority who can afford to be generous, for they represent a generous principle, or a minority struggling to avoid being misrepresented—a minority, permit me to add, in my belief, quite as honestly devoted to Kossuth and his cause as the majority here present? And now, sir, I ask again, if the gentlemen with whom I have been voting here do not desire to do wrong—if they do not wish to involve Louis Kossuth in difficulty with the people of this country, how can they object to coming out and satisfying the minority on this head? I admire the man Kossuth and his cause; and I am willing to congratulate him and to ask him here, where he may learn and know what are true republican views. And therefore I trust that this captious argument may be no longer continued—that it may come to an end—and that the majority, with whom I am identified, will show a disposition to abandon their captiousness, and show that, in their desire to compliment the living inbodiment of a just principle, they have no selfishness, but are willing to throw open their doors to all who may wish to join them. And, sir, furthermore, I will say that unless this majority will consent to this measure which I now propose, I, for one, distrusting their ungenerousness, will be constrained to refuse again to accord to them my humble vote. And, in doing this, I trust and believe that my motives, as a true friend of Hungary, of Kossuth, and of liberty the world over, will be fully appreciated here, as I know they will be by those whom I represent here, whose undying devotion to the cause of human freedom is above fear and above reproach.

The question being taken upon the amendment of Mr. TAYLOR to the amendment of Mr. CHURCHWELL, it was rejected.

Mr. MOLONY offered an amendment to the amendment, which was read by the Clerk, as follows:

Resolved, That the passage of the original resolution shall be understood as expressive of the indignation of this House in behalf of the American people at the despotic intervention of the Czar of Russia, and crushing by his armed legions the republican and triumphant spirit of Hungary.

Mr. MOLONY said: Mr. Chairman, I owe an apology to the friends of Kossuth upon this floor for offering this amendment at this time. I should not have done it, was I retaining a particle of that strong assurance which, at the commencement of this debate, I entertained, viz: that a proper regard for the dignity of this body, for the proprieties of courtesy due to our illustrious guest, for the manifest will of the American people, which it is our sole province to reflect in our action upon this resolution, and at all times, would insure a favorable and harmonious action upon it. I repeat, I had hoped that these considerations, each and all of them, would secure for this original resolution an emphatic, cordial, and universal adoption. But, sir, that hope has died within me. I perceive, sir, that a factious minority, and in numbers almost contemptible, has for the last three days and part of one night, held, in Committee of the Whole, at bay, by parliamentary tactics, an overwhelming majority of this body—gagged them, sir, and through us gagged the sentiments of the American people in regard to our illustrious stranger—an act alike disgraceful to this body as it is insulting to the nation and its honored guest. I repeat it, sir, that this House, by its unwarrantable, factious opposition to the passage of the original resolution, has disgraced itself in the eyes of the civilized world. Governor Kossuth, sir, is here the guest of the nation; such he is by an invitation extended to him by the proper national authorities, while an exile and a guest of the Sultan of Turkey; such he is by the orders given by the Executive of the nation, that a national salute should announce his arrival in New York; such he is by an invitation of the President and Congress, since his arrival on our shores, to visit the nation's capital; and yet, sir, after all this, the unfortunate yet glorious exile no sooner arrives here than this House is seen perpetrating an act, in them most ungraceful, and insulting to the feelings of their guest, in debating for three days and a part of one night a simple resolution for introducing him to the floor of this House. I have, sir, no responsibility in this matter; I mean to have none. And, sir, for the purpose of putting myself right upon the original resolution before the House, my constituency, and country, I rise, and to throw it upon those who must answer for it to themselves, and should to their constituency and the country. For the original resolution I go hand, head, and heart; and in saying this, I say not that I speak for myself alone, as has been repeatedly announced on the other side of the House, but I speak it as the representative of a constituency of two hundred thousand. Yes, sir; and I would have it understood by the despots of Europe and their sympathizers in America, that my constituency feel strongly the sentiments embodied in my amendment, and when the proper time and occasion shall arrive, I, as their representative, am prepared to declare by vote that the armed intervention of despotic Russia, in the domestic concerns of Hungary, crushing by its armed legions the republican and triumphant forces of that people, was an outrage upon the sympathies of the Christian world, and alike a violation of international and divine law.

Mr. Chairman, I have accomplished my object in offering my amendment—that was, an opportunity to put myself right upon the original resolution; and, as I have always voted not to embarrass the original simple question with any amendments, I shall defer my approbation of my own amendment for a more fitting time and occasion, and accordingly now vote against its adoption.

Mr. CULLOM. I had not intended, Mr. Chairman, to have participated in this discussion. It was my purpose to vote silently, as I have done from the origin of this question; but since gentlemen arrogate to themselves the prerogative upon this floor of denouncing me and those with whom I act upon these questions as factionists, I have the right as an American citizen—the double right, as a member upon this floor, of acting upon these questions, as upon all others, under all the obligations and sanctions which this high trust imposes. I would be false to myself and unloyal to my constituency, if I did not, as I here do, hurl it back upon its authors as a falsehood. [Applause, and cries of "Good!" "Good!" and "That's right!"] What have I done as a Representative here for which I am to be thus censured? Have I not demeaned myself in every phase this question has assumed in strict conformity with the rules prescribed by this body for its government? Might I not with far greater propriety charge that the dominant majority upon this question have madly overridden the stubborn rules of the House in order to precipitate this question? and in their holy zeal to do honor to Mr. Kossuth, would crush and thus denounce those whom they choose to call factionists, but who, I assert, are the real American law-and-order party of this House. [Great applause. "Order!" "Order!"] While I am disposed to treat members with all the courtesy due their station as representatives of American freemen, I am here to exact that same observance; and whilst gentlemen are talking for Buncombe and the mobs at the Five Points, they must learn that these indignities are highly unbecoming. Mr. Chairman, I have fully, in my opinion, discharged the obligations of courtesy in relation to the distinguished individual who is the subject-matter of this discussion. Our Government had invited him to our free country as a refugee from European oppression, and in that same spirit I voted the invitation to visit the capital of this mighty nation. There I choose to stop and hand the distinguished gentleman over to the hospitality of the American people generally, and to the people of Washington in particular; feeling that my legislative functions have ceased; but every amendment limiting our action to mere courtesy (and nothing more, we are assured, is intended) has been voted down, and a new and dangerous doctrine has been shadowed forth through the speeches of gentlemen, from which, as an American, I shrink. My American pride has forced me to take my stand, and it shall be my last intrenchment, by my own country and her time-honored usages. Mr. Chairman, ours is justly called a model republican Government, whilst its enemies tauntingly point to it as a mere experiment; and so it will prove, if your quacks are permitted to practice their experiments upon it. Yes, sir, gentlemen eloquently point to it as a beacon light to which the world have turned their eyes in their struggles against the despotisms of the Old World. How important that this great light should be always steady and stable; but in the hands of the progressive gentlemen, it would be a mere jack o'lantern, leading the nations of the earth to quagmires and marshes. I am not prepared to commit this country, by my vote, to the new-made and dangerous policy of espousing the quarrels and wars of other and foreign Governments. I am for maintaining our own national honor and rights, at any and all times, let the consequences be what they may. But I adhere to the sacred saying, which has with us become an axiom, "Friendship with all, but entangling alliances with none." I am here, sir, to do homage to no man living. I am no man-worshipper. If I were, the patriots of my own country are entitled to my first adoration. But, in the language of one, upon a very solemn occasion, "I bow the knee to no power, save God Almighty." I lick the dust from no man's feet, I care not what the trappings of royalty or circumstance may be. I am an American. I am a Tennessean. And those honorable gentlemen who have been so excessive in their eulogies of the great Magyar—and great I admit him to be—will have the same regrets, I fear, that the same people did, who were foremost in their adulations of Mr. Dickens. Yes, Mr. Chairman, he will write a book, and, I fear, these eulogistic gentlemen will occupy the same page that Dickens's admirers did in his book. But for the conservative position which we, who are denounced madly as factionists, occupy, our nation would be precipitated from its ancient moorings.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The question was then taken on Mr. MOLONY'S amendment, and it was rejected.

Mr. MEADE offered an amendment to the amendment, (a copy of which was not obtained.)

Mr. M. I am one of those who draw a distinction, and a very material distinction, between the honor it is proposed to do Louis Kossuth by the original resolution, and the ultimate design of some, if there be any such in this House, to involve this country in difficulties with European Powers. I am opposed to the latter, and in favor of the former. I believe the questions to be entirely distinct. Permit me, Mr. Chairman, to say to my brethren of the South, that it seems to me they have manifested upon this occasion an undue sensitiveness in reference to this proposition. Do they intend to imply by opposition to this resolution, that the march of free principles in Europe is a march upon the South? If they do, I must beg leave to part from them. I stand here amongst the foremost, whenever republican liberty is the question, to give my aid in every legitimate form for its progress. I do not believe the establishment of freedom anywhere can operate to the prejudice of the South or Southern institutions, and any undue sensitiveness upon that subject is calculated to do us injury—serious injury with the lovers of freedom throughout the world, because we teach them by that means to draw a distinction between the republicanism of the South and republicanism elsewhere. I admit no such thing. I assert that the triumph of democratic constitutional liberty does not, and cannot interfere with the Southern institutions. I will not admit there is a paradox presented by our institutions and the constitutional liberty we enjoy. They are altogether compatible, and I shall always be found among the foremost in advocating whatever may legitimately tend to the establishment of freedom in other parts of the world, but not to the extent of involving my country in intervention with European politics. I am opposed to a policy of that sort; but when the simple question is, Shall we do such honor to the representative of free principles in Europe as will give aid and comfort to those noble hearts who are now beating high with aspirations for freedom, shall I withhold it? No, sir; I will not withhold it through the vain fear that it may recoil upon our institutions. Our institutions are based upon a firmer principle—a firmer foundation; and the march of liberty elsewhere is not in conflict with our interests. We, at the South, know there would be as much wisdom in a man emancipating his infant children before they have arrived at the years of discretion, as there would be in emancipating the black race. The difference between the two is, that the children of the white man will arrive to a period when they become freemen, and can provide for themselves; the negro never can. A distinction drawn by the hand of the Almighty between the black and the white race, has placed the negro in his present position, and there he must remain, receiving protection from the white man, and rendering him service for it. The white man must be served by them as the little boy of ten years must serve his father, who protects him. A negro is always a child. Unless we can stand upon a principle which is immutable in relation to our institutions, and also compatible with the great truths of republican government, we shall be condemned; and we are pronouncing our own condemnation if we refuse our sympathies to the oppressed of other countries. Let us avoid, sir, even the appearance of it.

Mr. BOCK. This debate has been long protracted, and I have not made an attempt before this in the last two days, to participate in it. Nor should I have done so now, but for the fact that the speech which has been just made by my colleague [Mr. MEADE] places me, and those who have acted with me, in a false position before this House, the country, and our constituents. He has assumed in the remarks which he has just made, that we have been guided solely by a sensitiveness upon the subject of slavery in our course here.

Mr. MEADE. If in the hurry of my remarks I made any such statement, I did not intend it. I only inferred the thing from the resolution offered by the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. STANLY], and from the fact that the vote here had partaken in a measure of a sectional character.

Mr. BOCK. If the gentleman has not intended it, I take this occasion to say for myself to this House, and this country, that it is not the consideration which has chiefly operated upon me, or any of us on this side, so far as I know.

Mr. MEADE. I am glad to hear it.

Mr. BOCK. The vote has in fact been very far from a sectional one. Gentlemen from Indiana, Ohio, and New York have been prominent on our side.

I ask upon what principle is it expected that this resolution is to be adopted? Is it as a personal compliment to Louis Kossuth? Nobody claims that. Is it because he is the representative of a great principle, that we are to honor him in this House? Now, I ask of what principle is he the representative? He comes to declare before this country what principle he represents; and he is the organ of his own opinions, sentiments, and wishes. He has proclaimed trumpet-tongued, "I do not ask your empty compliments; I do not ask your empty sympathy." He says the sympathy he wants is operative sympathy. He wishes us to take European affairs under our management, and if necessary to fight for Hungary. When a resolution like this was sent him from the other end of the Capitol, what did he say? He was told it was a compliment. He said no; I know better than you do. There is a meaning, a political meaning in it. He was deceived. Well, it is not Louis Kossuth that we are only deceiving. In deceiving him, are we not, as was said by my colleague, [Mr. BAYLY], deceiving his countrymen at home, and deluding the poor Hungarians? In aid of his sentiments, we see men in the northern States leaping forward as if in eager competition, to be the first to join in this current. When we see the thing taking through the country, and the public mind becoming inflamed, and when we see gentlemen upon this floor rising and uttering such sentiments as we have heard in this debate from several speakers, and when we see a majority here breaking down the rules to carry out their purpose in this respect,—I ask, is it not time for reflecting, serious, and sober-minded men to pause in their course, ere they upturn the long established policy of the country? We have told him that he was welcome to the capital of the country. We have rendered all that the country, all that magnanimity and liberality required. This I willingly consented to. No man feels more sympathy with the cause of freedom throughout the world, or with the men who dedicate themselves to it, than I do. But our first duty is to ourselves.

I am willing to pay compliments and extend courtesies to the worthy and deserving, if harmless. But when we see that serious consequences are likely to follow from our action, is it not time, I ask, to pause and reflect? And when gentlemen come here, and tell me that with the minority I have resorted to revolutionary measures, and to a factious course, I tell them that the charge they make against us applies to them. They have trampled on the rules; we have not. They have resorted to unusual and unprecedented modes of action; we have not. We have endeavored to deprive such efforts of a successful result, and thus to maintain the rules and protect our own rights. But for doing so, we are not to be misunderstood as having no sympathy with Kossuth and his cause, nor as improperly bringing the institution of slavery into the arena. We have not done anything to give good grounds for either charge.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I desire to know if it will be in order to move that the committee rise and report the resolution and amendments to the House, and to recommend their reference to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. The gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS,] the other day, carried to the House, from the committee, a bill similarly situated.

Mr. STEPHENS. With the permission of the gentleman, that would not be in order, as it would cut off debate on the amendments. Suppose the resolution should go to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, they have to report everything to the House. I make this suggestion to the gentleman: Let us adjourn over till Monday. It will be then in order to move to suspend the rules to introduce this resolution. If two thirds vote for it, our opposition ceases. If two thirds do not vote for it, is it right that less than two thirds of the House shall pay a compliment to any foreigner, in derogation of the rights of one third of our number? Now, if gentlemen do not want to be factious, give it a fair test; meet on Monday next, when it is in order to move a suspension of the rules, and if two thirds vote for it, let it be done.

Mr. RICHARDSON. This question of rules is a matter about which gentlemen upon this floor may well differ. I have my own opinions, and they are as firm and fixed as those of the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS,] I entertain them as the representative of the American people, and I abide by them as firmly as he does. We differ very often about them. I make the motion that the committee rise, report the resolution with the amendments to the House, with a recommendation that they be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. STANLY. I ask the Chair, if the committee rise and report this resolution and amendment to the House, and then the previous question be moved, and another gag is forced upon us, where we will be?

Mr. VENABLE. I understand that previous question.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I will ask the Chair, if we are not at liberty to have such a recommendation offered by gentlemen, if it is not in the shape of an amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is out of order.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. Is debate not in order?

The CHAIRMAN. All debate is terminated by the latter branch of the 136th rule. This rule provides, "that the House may, at any time, by a vote of a majority of the members present, suspend the rules and orders for the purpose of going into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union; and also for providing for the discharge of the Committee of the Whole House, and the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, from the further consideration of any bill referred to it, after acting without debate on all amendments pending, and that may be offered." This rule provides, that the House itself may discharge the Committee of the Whole upon the state of the Union from the consideration of any proposition committed to it without debate, after voting upon all amendments which have been offered or may be offered. The committee, by this vote and decision, have determined that the debate upon this resolution should terminate. Then, in the opinion of the Chair, it cannot be reported to the House until all the amendments pending, and which may be offered, shall be voted upon. The Chair overrules the motion of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. RICHARDSON.]

Mr. RICHARDSON. From that decision I appeal, and demand tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the House? Upon that question tellers are called for.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I desire to ask a single question of the Chair: If it is in his remembrance, that a measure was carried out in committee the other day upon the motion of the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS,] with precisely the same recommendation?

The CHAIRMAN. There were no amendments if my recollection serves me. The Chair has not a very distinct recollection of the circumstances attending that resolution, and would thank gentlemen to inform him, whether or not debate had been terminated.

Mr. DUNHAM. There was then no objection to such proceeding. It was by general consent.

Mr. STEPHENS. Debate had not yet terminated.

The CHAIRMAN. It is in the recollection of the Chair, that the debate had not been terminated. A motion was made that the committee rise and report the resolution, with a recommendation to the House to discharge the committee from its further consideration.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I think the Chair is mistaken.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the impression further, that the proposition that the committee rise was agreed to by unanimous consent.

Mr. RICHARDSON. So much the stronger for my position.

The CHAIRMAN. There was no objection to it. There was also a suspension of all rules, and this resolution could be introduced into the House in the same way by unanimous consent.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I beg to correct the Chair, and state the facts. I recollect them perfectly. My motion was first made, as a suggestion to the committee. No member persisted in taking a vote upon the pending amendment, and the committee permitted the question to be decided by tellers. It was carried by one vote, and you will see, by referring to the Globe, that no member made objection. If any objection had been made, I should have withdrawn my motion.

Mr. RICHARDSON. If there was no objection, it but makes the precedent the stronger. If passion leads to it—

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is not in order.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I want to correct the Chair as to one thing. There were amendments pending, and the question arose in the House, as to whether those amendments came with the original proposition or not. It was decided that nothing came with the original resolution. The whole question was presented; and concurred in unanimously by this House then, and ought to be now, I think.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RICHARDSON] appeals from the decision of the Chair, and upon that question tellers are demanded.

Tellers were ordered, and Messrs. CARTER and CABELL appointed; and the question being taken, the tellers reported—ayes 78, noes 44.

So the decision of the Chair was sustained.

The question recurring upon Mr. MEADE's amendment to the amendment, it was taken and decided in the negative.

So the amendment to the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. TUCK offered the following as an amendment to the amendment, to come in at the end thereof:

And it is hereby declared to be the judgment of this House, that the late intervention of Russia in the affairs of Hungary was a violation of the law of nations.

Mr. T. said: That amendment expresses my sentiments, and I am for speaking them out here, let who may take offence.

Mr. CARTER. I would inquire of the Chair, whether that amendment is in order?

The CHAIRMAN. In the opinion of the Chair, the amendment is not in order.

Mr. SAVAGE. I wish to offer an amendment.

Mr. TUCK. I have not yielded the floor yet.

The CHAIRMAN. Did the gentleman appeal from the decision of the Chair, declaring his amendment out of order?

Mr. TUCK. No, but I wanted to offer another amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's amendment was decided out of order.

Mr. TUCK. But I offered another.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman lost his right to the floor when the question, upon which he obtained it, was ruled out of order, and consequently passed from before the committee. The floor has been assigned to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. SAVAGE then offered the following amendment to the amendment:

Resolved, That Congress disapproves the political doctrines of Louis Kossuth, in relation to the foreign policy of the United States, and that it is contrary to the practice of this Government and the spirit of the Constitution to pay mere personal compliments to individuals.

Mr. SAVAGE said: Mr. Chairman, I had hoped to have passed through this unpleasant discussion without detaining the House by any remarks upon the subject. But I have felt it my duty to offer the amendment just read. It covers in brief the many reasons which have controlled my action relative to Kossuth.

Far be it from me to entertain sentiments of hostility to the so-called great Hungarian. I wish every man on earth peace, glory, success, and contentment; nor shall I ever travel out of my path to lessen the honor of any man, no matter how unmerited he may wear it. But when a question comes up in the line of my duty, no tempestuous enthusiasm, no considerations of safety to myself, shall drive or deter me from expressing my honest and deliberate convictions.

I cannot approve the political principles of the great Hungarian apostle, and there is nothing left for me to bow to. I have been taught to honor principles, not men; and especially will I fail to seek an occasion to pay an unusual compliment to a man advocating principles the practice of which will destroy the peace and glory of this proud Republic. I desire my acts and opinions to accord with each other.

"Whoever dares think one thing and another tell,
My soul detests him as the gates of hell."

It is right to deal honestly with Kossuth, and I confess I have not the ingenuity of paying a compliment to his person and a curse to his principles by the same act. Besides, I am not sent here for either purpose. I am the Representative of a portion of the people of Tennessee. I have been sworn to support the Constitution of the United States, and am willing to perish in a struggle for that purpose whenever an Almighty Providence shall so decree. I have not been sworn to support the Constitution of Hungary, or to go upon a crusade for the world's liberty; and I am unwilling to peril the interests I have sworn to guard by an interference with the affairs of the European States. I am an American, and want no new light to shine upon my pathway in politics. The star of Washington has lost to my vision none of its charms or brilliancy. It rose in glory with our Government, to shine eternal and unchanging upon our political horizon. My feet shall follow but one path, my eyes shall see but one light, although many others may glitter in the heavens.

We all know that all the light above us is not useful or substantial. Although many be the stars that have shone upon man's dark and dreary destiny, yet other lights have oftentimes come upon the heavens—not stars of eternity, or of the age or century, but airy, unsubstantial things—brilliant illusions, meteors of the moment, that have ascended in the dark—we know not when or how—whose only glory is displayed in their fall.

Sir, I am content with the history of my Government. It is a lesson of wisdom. I want no new apostle, new bible, or new faith. I would not alter a syllable of the past if I could. I only hope the future may be like it.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I presume it is a matter of very small consequence to the committee what my position is in regard to this matter, and I do not state it because of its consequence, but I ask that a little consideration may be given to the few words which I am about to utter.

I have desired, from the outset of this discussion, to take no part whatever in it, but so to regulate my course as to bring the committee to a direct vote upon this resolution—the importance of which has been so much magnified—in order that we might settle it one way or the other. We began this contest last Monday week, when the resolution was rejected, because it did not receive a two-thirds vote. The same was the case last Monday; and now we have been occupied with the subject all day Tuesday, all day Wednesday, and during the whole of yesterday.

If we are going to grant this privilege as an act of courtesy—and it is evident from the general expression of the House, that if granted at all, it will be as a courtesy and not as an indorsement—let us do it at once. My position in regard to this matter has certainly not been an extravagant one on either side. I have been voting all along so as to bring us to a direct vote on the original resolution; and whenever we reach that point I shall vote against the reception as proposed in that resolution. That is the position which I occupy. Now let us look at the position of the matter itself. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CARTER] has offered a resolution that Kossuth shall be received by a committee; but, as I understand it, no one knows what is to be done when he shall be so received; we do not know but that it might lead to his delivering an address in this body, and thus sanction the implication that he was received here for that purpose, and that we indorsed his sentiments on the subject of intervention. There are, therefore, sound and rational objections to that resolution, as I think, if such a possibility exist. On the other hand, the substitute offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. VENABLE] only proposes that Kossuth shall be admitted to a privileged seat on this floor, as Father Mathew and other distinguished foreigners, among them the compatriots of Kossuth, have been. To that, I believe, no rational man can object. But we cannot get to the vote on either of those propositions. Why? Because there are hundreds of amendments to the original resolution which must be perfected before the substitute can be voted on.

I hope, therefore, that after this long debate, we may be permitted to have a cessation of amendments to the original resolutions, and may come to the substitute itself, to which gentlemen can offer such amendments as they desire. But it seems to me, that it would be much wiser and more rational to have a vote upon the substitute at once. I candidly believe that it would be carried, for appreciating M. Kossuth, as we all do, I believe we should all be disposed to admit him to a privileged seat.

Gentlemen must bear in mind, that we have debated this question, not only before the American public, but before the whole world; every kind of extravagant consideration connected with the subject, has been brought in. I hope the Buncombe is now exhausted, and that after four days talking, we may be permitted to have a vote.

The question was then taken upon Mr. SAVAGE's amendment to the amendment, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. BRENTON offered the following amendment to the amendment, viz:

Provided, further, That nothing contained in this resolution, or any action which may be had thereon, shall be so construed as to identify any member of this House, against his own will, with any of the principles advocated by Louis Kossuth.

Mr. B. said: My object in offering this amendment is not to relieve myself but other gentlemen from the fears under which they labor, lest their votes should be wrongfully construed by the country. By the adoption of that amendment every gentleman will, at once, be placed in a position where he can exercise his own private judgment, either for or against the principles which have been advocated by Louis Kossuth.

It has fallen upon my ears most strangely when I have heard the arguments which have been advanced and the declarations which have characterized this House since the beginning of this debate, that an act of courtesy, extended to Louis Kossuth personally, involves necessarily the adoption or recognition of the principles which he advocates. If this position be correct, then whenever we condescend to extend the common civilities of life to those who may differ in opinion from us, we adopt the sentiments which those individuals may entertain upon any great question whatsoever. There is nothing more erroneous. We practice upon this principle every day in the ordinary business of life. Is it true, because I invite a neighbor to partake of the hospitalities of my house that I necessarily adopt all the abominable notions he may entertain upon any question whatever? Suppose, for instance, the honorable gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. STANLY] should, under the influence of his known hospitality, tender to his distinguished friend from Ohio [Mr. GRIMMINGS] the hospitalities of his house: would it be taken for granted that he had adopted the sentiments of that gentleman, and would the country become alarmed with the fear of his becoming a Free-Soiler? If so, they would come to that conclusion against every principle of common sense. The most that could be made out of it would be this: that the gentleman from North Carolina had, in the kindness of his heart, thrown open his doors, and, while detesting the sins of the party, he loved the sinner. Mr. Chairman, I have sufficient confidence in the intelligence of the people of this country, and especially in that of the people whom I have the honor to represent. I believe they will distinguish between the personal reception of this distinguished individual and the adoption of his principles. If Louis Kossuth had come to this country on his responsibility, by his own funds, as a private individual, I would be ready to do him honor, and the country would be ready to do him honor; for I know we are ready and willing to extend this honor to individuals of high rank from foreign countries, and we are especially willing to pay those honors to the poor and downtrodden who have fled from foreign despotism, when they shall land upon our shores; but we extend this honor to them without adopting their principles.

Mr. MOORE, of Louisiana. I desire to say a few words to set myself right upon this question. I was originally in favor of this resolution, and I am still in favor of it, because it is paying respect to a great principle of liberty which I recognize as republican. But although I am in favor of paying this tribute of respect, I have voted with the minority in this committee, and I cannot consider that a factious minority, as we are acting under the rules and orders of this House, and those rules and orders are the statutes of this country—as much so as any other statutes until they are repealed. As I have stated, I have voted with the minority upon several occasions, because this resolution was introduced here in violation of the rules of the House, and in violation of the decisions of the honorable chairman of this committee, and therefore I say that the minority were not acting factiously. They were acting under the rules and orders of this House, and they have the right so to act. Though I had intended to vote for the resolution, yet I have voted with the minority, because the rules of the House were violated by its introduction. With this explanation, I shall vote for the resolution, though I am opposed to intervention; and in voting for it I wish to be understood that I do not indorse the doctrines of Louis Kossuth. I shall support the same policy—the policy of Washington—in relation to intervention, which has always been supported by this Congress since the foundation of this Government. With this explanation I take my seat.

Mr. GORMAN. I understand that gentlemen are permitted to speak five minutes for and against an amendment, by a rule which was adopted during the last Congress. I ask the Chair if I am right?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. GORMAN. Then the rule provides that one gentleman may be permitted to speak five minutes in favor of the amendment, and another in opposition to it the same length of time. I rise to say, that I hope the Chairman will enforce this rule, and not allow two gentlemen to speak upon one side of the same amendment. I hope the friends of the resolution will not speak at all.

The question was then taken upon Mr. Brexton's amendment to the amendment, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. POLK offered the following amendment:

When the Committee on Foreign Affairs shall report, all who wish will have an opportunity to speak on the subject of intervention.

The CHAIRMAN. That amendment is not in order.

Mr. POLK. Upon what ground does the chairman rule my amendment out of order?

The CHAIRMAN. Upon the ground of irrelevancy.

Mr. POLK. Then I move to strike out in the amendment the word "distinguished;" not that I am not willing to award to Kossuth all the honor to which he is entitled, but I do it for the purpose of enabling me to express my views upon this question. If I understand it correctly, the President of the United States directed our diplomatic agent at Constantinople to invite Kossuth to this country. Three days after, if I understand the record, Congress passed a resolution inviting him here. Here is a double duty. The President first, and Congress afterwards sanctioning the Executive power. And not only that, but an American vessel is sent to bear him to our shores. He lands here and becomes the nation's guest. He comes to Washington; and what does Congress do? It says, "Mr. Kossuth, your sentiments are such that we cannot receive you in our delegated capacity." No. You pass a resolution three or four days after the beginning of the present Congress in which you invite him to the capital of the country. And now, how does the case stand? Kossuth is here by the invitation of this House, with but sixteen votes in the negative—for I remember the yeas and nays were called—but sixteen were found to vote against giving to the great Magyar a reception worthy of himself and the cause in which his country has fallen. By your own invitation he stands at your portals, and what are you doing? You are consulting whether you will receive him or not. You invite a guest, and then call a family circle to discuss the propriety of receiving him. Kossuth is in the city. He is under the very portals of your Capitol, and here we are debating the question as to whether we will receive him! Gentlemen upon the other side of the House have indulged in epithets, and have even used the word "falsehood" to the majority, because we dare to exercise our rights. Sir, we dare to proclaim them factionists, and we dare to stand by the consequences. We have done nothing to elicit this charge. I belong to that majority, and I will give my vote for any reception which I may deem proper and just; and that minority must understand that I will not share in any opprobrium or epithets of that character. When they fling stones of that kind they must take care that they do not—

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. Chairman, I hope that we shall soon come to a vote upon this question; and I know if I do not get the floor now, some one else will, to fill out the five minutes that would be appropriated in opposition to the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. Polk.] I do not know that my opinions are of any consequence here or elsewhere, upon this question. And I have no solicitude whatever, sir, as to what conclusion may be drawn from my vote, in favor of this resolution to receive Governor Kossuth—none whatever. I shall not travel out of my way for the purpose of making a declaration to Russia, if you interfere again in the affairs of Hungary there will be no danger from us. If there were no other reason in the world why I would refuse to make such a declaration, it would be that, and that alone, that while it would palsy the arms of patriots struggling for liberty, it would nerve the arm of the tyrant that is now stretched over them. Gentlemen say they are as much the friends of Kossuth and his cause as we are. I shall not question their motives; but let me ask them what the effect of their opposition is? Who are they who first upon this floor talked about incorporating a principle upon that simple resolution? Were they the friends of this resolution? No, sir; but the enemies of it, who, looking far into the future for something to embarrass us, must go out of their way to declare that they will or will not do thus and so. Sir, I had just as leave, and rather, that Russia should infer from our action here that we intended to interfere. I will not say what I would do, but it seems to me he is not a wise statesman who, without knowing anything about the extent of the danger that surrounds the future—who, without knowing anything about what governments we may get into difficulty with, or what embarrassments may result to our commercial relations, or what the extent of our interests involved, yet goes out of the way to try his hand upon a principle of that kind. Sir, I hope the friends of this resolution will cease offering amendments; for if we cease offering them, the five minute speeches will soon be ended. Let the enemies of the resolution talk alone and take the consequences. So far as I am concerned, I am not so much mystified as some others at the result. The country can know just as well, whether this resolution pass or not, who were and who were not in favor of it, and the motives by which they were governed. Governor Kossuth himself is too intelligent not to know, that though this resolution may not pass, that there are two to one in favor, and that it is by resort to parliamentary manœuvres that it is defeated.

A Voice. Two to one cannot suspend the rules.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, (interrupting.) If the gentleman will allow me—

Mr. ROBINSON. I cannot be interrupted in a five-minute speech. The gentleman has had two or three speeches. The gentleman from Georgia bases his opposition upon the rules, and that if we set them aside, we are in a revolution. Does not every gentleman know, who has been here a sufficient length of time, that nothing is more common than that when a majority desires, they override the rules?

[Here the Chairman's hammer fell.]

The question was then taken upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. Polk.] and it was rejected.

Mr. BROWN, of Mississippi; offered the following amendment:

And be it understood, that the House of Representatives declines at this time to express any opinion as to whether this Government will or will not interfere in the wars that may hereafter occur between other nations.

Mr. BROWN. I have offered this amendment in good faith.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that the amendment is not strictly in order. It does not connect itself with the resolution.

Mr. BROWN. I will change the resolution so that it will read in this manner:

Be it understood, that the House of Representatives declines at this time to express any opinion as to whether this Government will or will not be indifferent to the doctrines of Kossuth.

I offer this amendment in good faith. When, a little more than twelve months ago, I voted to send a national ship to bear this distinguished man to our shores, I did it, sir, that he might come here in the character of an emigrant. I never dreamed—as I am sure no member of the last Congress ever dreamed—that he was coming here as a propagandist of new doctrines. I appeal to every member of this Congress, who was a member of the last House of Representatives, if any member supposed he was coming here upon any such mission? The first we hear of his intentions was in one of his English speeches—I think in his Southampton speech—when for the first time he made it known that he was coming to procure the intervention of this Government in the struggles that were going on in the Old World. I do not desire that our action here, either in inviting this distinguished man to this country, or inviting him to come to take a seat within the bar of this House, shall be construed into any expression of opinion upon the subject of his doctrine of intervention. And why? I can very readily imagine that in the progress of human events a case may arise in which it may become important for this Government to interfere. No such case has, in my judgment, arisen yet. But I would not, by saying that we never would interfere, cut ourselves off from the possibility of doing so if a case should arise. So much has been said upon this subject, not only by that distinguished man himself, but by his friends in Congress and out of it, that the inference may be drawn that we either intend to indorse his doctrines upon the one side, or that we do not upon the other. That, in my judgment, it is imperative upon us to say whether, in our action here, we do intend to express a judgment pro or con. Surely this cannot wound the sentiment of the distinguished Governor of Hungary. But whether it does or does not, we are here the representatives of the American people, not responsible to Kossuth, but to the people of this country—responsible for the exercise of an important trust, and the manner in which we shall exercise it will have an important bearing upon the present and future peace and prosperity of the country. I have done nothing, and I shall do nothing capiously. I am willing to do all proper honors to this distinguished man, but I am not prepared to show him such honors as never have been shown to any living man. If it is the will of his friends to vote him an invitation within the bar of this House, when we have sufficiently discussed the question to show to the American people that we do not intend to indorse his doctrine, then I am willing to withdraw opposition and invite him in. But you cannot separate this distinguished man from the great principles he avows. What does he tell you every day? He says, I am not here to be complimented. I am here to procure the recognition of a great national principle. And this is the shield which he bears between himself and the American people, from day to day. No man, I undertake to say, can approach him except through this shield. You must indorse his doctrines, or he seeks no intercourse with you. I am for saying, in the language of that amendment, that we neither indorse nor refuse to enforce his doctrines at this time, reserving any such question until a proper case shall arise.

Mr. FOWLER. I do not rise even for the purpose of making a five minutes speech, but to ask the friends of the resolution to abstain from speaking. I am in favor of the resolution, but not any amendment. The gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. GORMAN,] who last spoke, requested the friends of the resolution not to offer amendments. I request them not to make speeches of five minutes in answer to amendments. That is all I have to say. Let us have the question.

Mr. SWEETSER demanded tellers upon the question; which were ordered; and Mr. VENABLE and Mr. FOWLER appointed.

The question being taken upon the amendment, there were in the affirmative 53, and in the negative 56—no quorum voting.

Mr. CLEVELAND asked to have a recount. The CHAIRMAN stated that by unanimous consent there might be a recount.

Mr. STEPHENS objected.
[Cries of "Call the roll!" "Call the roll!"]

The roll was then called, and the names of the absentees noted; the committee rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the chairman of the committee reported the facts to the House, with the names of the absentees.

A quorum being present, the committee resumed its session.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I move that the committee rise. Let us adjourn. I never saw a minority fail to beat in this House—we have tried it often. It is not worth while to keep up the struggle.

The question was then taken; and it was agreed to.

The committee rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the chairman of the committee reported that the Committee of the Whole had had the state of the Union generally under consideration, but came to no conclusion thereon.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I believe I will make a privileged motion, that when the House adjourns, it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

[Cries of "No!" "No!" "No!" "No!"]
Mr. CLEVELAND demanded the yeas and nays; but they were not ordered.

The question was then taken on the adoption of the resolution, and on division there were—ayes 91, noes 58.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. ORR moved that the House adjourn.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman withdraw that motion, to enable the Chair to dispose of some Executive documents?

Mr. ORR withdrew his motion.

CASE OF J. S. THRASHER.

To the House of Representatives:

As a further answer to the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 15th ultimo, calling for information respecting the imprisonment, trial, and sentence of John S. Thrasher in the Island of Cuba, I transmit another report from the Secretary of State.

WASHINGTON, January 2, 1852.

Mr. BAYLY moved that the communication and accompanying documents be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and printed.

Mr. FLOYD moved to amend the motion, by adding thereto these words:

And that the Committee on Foreign Affairs be instructed to wait upon Louis Kossuth, and introduce him to this House.

On that motion, he asked the previous question. The SPEAKER ruled the amendment out of order.

The question was then taken on Mr. BAYLY's motion, and it was agreed to.

So the communication was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

MEXICAN INDEMNITY.

To the House of Representatives:

I transmit, herewith, a copy of a letter of the 26th instant, addressed to the Secretary of State by the contractors for paying the next installment due to Mexico, pursuant to the treaty of Gaudalope Hidalgo, representing the necessity of an immediate appropriation by Congress of the money necessary for that purpose.

MILLARD FILLMORE.

WASHINGTON, December 29, 1851.

On motion of Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, the communication was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

CLAIM OF THE STATE OF MARYLAND.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Treasury Department, transmitting, in compliance with the resolution of the House of the 14th instant, a statement of the accounts between the United States and the State of Maryland for advances made by said State during the war; also, for advances made to aid in the erection of the Capitol.

Mr. WALSH. I introduced the resolution calling for that information, and I am instructed by the agent of the State of Maryland, Colonel Howard, to ask that the subject-matter of that communication be referred to a select committee. I move that it be so referred. The communication relates to a claim of one of the States of this Union, and I hope there will be no objection to the reference to a select committee.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, moved to refer the communication to the Committee of Ways and Means, and that it be printed.

The question being first taken upon Mr. JONES's motion, it was agreed to.

So the communication was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

DEFICIENCY ESTIMATES.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Navy Department, submitting estimates for the deficiencies in the appropriations under the control of that department, for the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1852, amounting to $219,888 94.

On motion by Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, the communication was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

RELATIVE RANK OF SURGEONS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Medical Institution of Charleston, relative to relative rank for the surgeons in the Army and Navy.

Mr. FITCH moved that the memorial be referred to a select committee.

Mr. BISSELL. It seems to me that that memorial might with propriety go either to the Committee on Military Affairs or to the Committee on Naval Affairs. I move its reference to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I would suggest to the gentleman that neither of those committees is composed of doctors, and this memorial should go to a committee of doctors.

Mr. FITCH. If gentlemen will examine that memorial they will see that there is no standing committee to which it can properly be referred; I hope, therefore, that it will go to a select committee.

Mr. BOCOCK. Does not that communication refer to the subject of rank in the Navy?

Mr. FITCH. In part, only.

Mr. BISSELL. It refers also to rank in the Army.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. I would suggest that so much of the communication as refers to relative rank in the Navy be referred to the Naval Committee; and that so much as relates to the same subject in the Army, be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BISSELL. I will modify my motion in that way.

The question was then taken on Mr. BISSELL's motion, and it was agreed to.

Mr. ORR. It has been suggested to me that there is a portion of that communication that has not been referred by the action just taken by the House, and therefore I think that the motion of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. FITCH,] to refer the communication to a select committee was the proper one.

The SPEAKER. After reading the paper, the Chair is of the opinion that the whole of it has been referred to the appropriate committees.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas, the House then adjourned.

PETITIONS, &c.

The following petitions, memorials, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. WASHBURN: The petition of Josiah Smith and 204 others, of Bangor, Maine, for land reform.

Also, the petition of Joseph Webb, for increase of pension.

By Mr. SCUDDER: The petition of Thomas Hilliard and others, citizens of Massachusetts, for the erection of a breakwater at Dennis, in Barnstable Bay.

By Mr. MANN: The memorial of the Religious Society of Friends of New England, praying for a repeal of the fugitive slave law.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, January 5, 1852.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. M. BUTLER.

Mr. MANGUM. At the request of divers persons, I desire the consideration of the Senate while I submit a motion which I hope will pass with unanimity. It is to suspend the rules of the Senate so far as to admit ladies behind the bar of the Senate Chamber.

Gentleman can at any time call and see the illustrious stranger whom we are to receive to-day; but if ladies are not now gratified, another occasion may not perhaps be presented to them. I hope there will be no objection to my motion.

The PRESIDENT. The motion cannot be received except by unanimous consent.

There being no objection the motion was received and agreed to.

A great number of ladies were then admitted, filling all the space without the bar. The circular gallery was occupied exclusively by ladies from an early hour; and the usual occupants of the Reporters' Gallery were placed in a dilemma between fluty and gallantry. Gallantry was triumphant; and any imperfections in the reports of the proceedings—any defects in the history of this day's transactions—will meet with charitable consideration wherever gallantry, their cause, has potency.

In the group of gentlemen present several foreign embassies had their representatives. Amongst them were three attaches of the British Legation. The Secretary of the Interior, the Hon. A. H. H. Stuart, the Attorney General, the Hon. John J. Crittenden, and probably other Cabinet officers, were in the crowd of ex-senators, members, and ex-members of the House of Representatives, and other distinguished gentlemen.

THE SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. FORNEY, their Clerk, was read as follows:

Mr. PRESIDENT: The House of Representatives, in compliance with the provisions of the act to establish the Smithsonian Institution for the increase and diffusion of knowledge among men, have appointed Mr. COCKROCK, Mr. FITCH, and Mr. MEACHAM, Regents on their part.

PETITIONS.

Mr. BRODHEAD presented a memorial of citizens of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, praying for an appropriation for the erection of piers and harbors of the Delaware river and bay; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, a petition of John H. Parker and sixty other citizens of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, praying the enactment of a law to prohibit the introduction into the ports of the United States of foreign convicts, felons, and paupers; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, three memorials of merchants of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, praying for an appropriation for the erection of piers and harbors in the Delaware river and bay; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. UNDERWOOD presented a memorial of citizens of the United States, praying that the office of Chaplain in the public service may be abolished; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. FELCH presented six petitions of citizens of Michigan, praying a grant of public land to the Zilwaukee Grand Traverse and Mackinaw Plank Road Company, to aid in the construction of their road; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Also, a memorial of the Board of Education of the State of Michigan, praying a grant of land to that State for the use of the State Normal School, equivalent in value to the land originally granted for that purpose, of which the State has been deprived; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. NORRIS presented the petition of John Clark, praying that a contract may be entered into with him for rebuilding the light-house on Minot's Ledge, near Boston harbor; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. DODGE, of Wisconsin, presented a petition of citizens of Middletown, Wisconsin, praying a change in the laws providing for the sale of the public lands; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. ATCHISON presented the petition of Johnson Lykins, praying compensation for services as physician for the Osage river band of Pottawatomie Indians; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. JONES, of Iowa, presented a memorial of the people of Iowa, assembled in convention at Iowa City, praying a grant of public land to aid in the construction of the Dubuque and Keokuck, and the Davenport and Council Bluffs railroads; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BUTLER presented a memorial of the Charleston Chamber of Commerce, praying that a light-boat and fog bell may be placed on the shoals east of Cape Roman, on the coast of South Carolina; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

On motion by Mr. BELL, it was Ordered, That the petition of Joseph Byrd, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

NOTICES OF BILLS.

Mr. WHITCOMB gave notice that he should ask leave to introduce a bill granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad, with right of way, from La Fayette, Indiana, by way of Peoria, Illinois, and Burlington, Iowa, to the Missouri river.

Mr. GWIN gave notice that he should ask leave to introduce a bill to suppress Indian hostilities in the State of California and Territory of Oregon, to establish an Assistant Commissioner of Indian Affairs for the Pacific coast, and for other purposes.

Mr. MORTON gave notice that he should ask leave to introduce a bill granting the right of way and a donation of land to aid in the construction of a plank road from the city of Pensacola, in Florida, to the town of Montgomery, in Alabama.

Mr. RUSK gave notice that he should ask leave to introduce a joint resolution authorizing the Postmaster General to contract for the placing of an ice-boat on the Potomac river.

Mr. MALLORY gave notice that he should ask leave to introduce a bill to be entitled "A bill for the relief of Kennedy and Darling."

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. FELCH, agreeably to previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill granting to the State of Michigan the right of way and a donation of public lands for the purpose of constructing a canal or railroad across the peninsula of Michigan; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill to establish an additional land office in Michigan; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. SEBASTIAN, agreeably to previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill for the redemption of certain Choctaw annuities; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill to grant to the city of Burlington, in Iowa, the land heretofore reserved between that city and the Mississippi river, reported back the same without amendment.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The Committee on Public Lands have, after considerable labor, prepared an amendment which they have instructed me to offer to the Senate bill, providing for the assignability of land warrants. I ask that it may be received informally, and ordered to be printed. It was received and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BRODHEAD, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the petition of A. S. Williamson, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Allen G. Johnson, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for his relief.

The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

PRIVATE BILLS.

The bill for the relief of Sidney A. Allcott, was read a second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole. The object of the bill is to allow him to enter land in Michigan, for which in 1836 he paid $200, but neglected to enter. The bill was reported to the Senate, and was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill for the relief of the heirs of Judith Worthen, deceased, was read a second time, and the Senate proceeded to consider it as in Committee of the Whole.

It provides that the Secretary of War be authorized and required to pay out of any money in the Treasury, not otherwise appropriated, to the heirs of Judith Worthen, deceased, widow of Isaac Worthen, late a revolutionary pensioner, such sum as she, if now living, would be entitled to receive under the act of July 7th, 1838.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would ask if there is any report on this bill?

The PRESIDENT. A report was made at a former session, but not at this session.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would like to hear it read.

The report of the Committee on Pensions was read.

Mr. BRADBURY. I trust that the objections in the mind of the Senator from Kentucky will be relieved by the reading of the report. It appears that the pensioner in this case was entitled to a five years' pension under the act of 1838; that the proofs were duly filed in the office of the Commissioner of Pensions; but owing to the press of business in that office there was some delay in the decision of the case. This delay cut off the claim. The pensioner was equitably entitled to a pension under the provisions of the act of 1838. I have had occasion to look into the case, and I think there is no valid objection to the bill. I hope the Senator from Kentucky will make no objection.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have made no objection.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

A bill authorizing Victor Morass to relinquish certain lands, and to enter the same quantity elsewhere, was read a second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole. No amendment being made thereto, it was reported to the Senate and ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

The Senate proceeded to consider as in Committee of the Whole the following bills:

A bill for the relief of Charles Melrose; and

A bill granting a pension to Sally F. Floyd, widow of George R. C. Floyd, late a Lieutenant Colonel in the Army of the United States; and no amendment being made thereto, they were reported to the Senate.

Ordered, That they be engrossed and read a third time.

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill to revive a portion of an act for the relief of the widows of deceased soldiers.

It had been reported back from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment.

Mr. DAWSON. I ask that it be passed over for the present. It requires some investigation.

Mr. BORLAND. I hope it will not be passed over. It has been before the Senate the last few sessions, and has not been passed because it has never been properly reached. It is a bill of great merit, and I hope the Senate will now consider and act upon it.

Mr. DAWSON. The bill will give rise to discussion. I move to lay it on the table.

Mr. BORLAND. I must ask the yeas and nays upon that motion.

Mr. DAWSON. My object is not to oppose the bill, but to have an opportunity to look into the facts.

Mr. BORLAND. If the Senator will withdraw the motion I will explain the merit of the bill.

Mr. DAWSON. I withdraw it.

Mr. BORLAND. It is a proposition to revive that portion of the act of 1816 which granted five years' half pay to the widows of soldiers who died in the service, or of wounds incurred in consequence of service, in the war of 1812. There are but few of those widows now remaining. There are no minor children entitled to benefit under the provisions of the act of 1816, and but very few widows. Those widows are old and many of them destitute. There now remain but a small remnant of the widows of those gallant men who fell in defence of their country in the war of 1812, or who died of disease contracted in that war.

This is a bill, which it appears to me, appeals not only to the sympathies but to the sense of justice of every one. It is impossible to ascertain the precise number of those widows now remaining, because when the five years expired—that is in 1821—all these persons passed off the pension roll. The attempt, therefore, to obtain information from the Pension Office, as to their number, fails. The Pension Office cannot give the information, but any one who will look into the matter will perceive that there can be but very few of those widows remaining. So far as my knowledge extends, most of them are very poor. Some of them are infirm. I know in my own State, some one or two only, and I learn from others that there are very few in any of the States. I hope, therefore, the Senator will not make a motion to lay the bill on the table, but will let it be passed.

Mr. DAWSON. I would ask whether the bill proposes that the pensions shall be from 1821 to the present time, or shall commence after the passage of this act?

Mr. BORLAND. If the Senator will let the bill be read, he will see what are its provisions.

The bill was read accordingly. It provides that so much of the act of April 16, 1816, entitled "An act making further provision for military services during the late war, and for other purposes," as applies to the widows of deceased soldiers, and which expired by limitation five years after the passage of that act, should be thereby revived and extended during the natural life of any widow therein described.

Mr. DAWSON. I perceive that that bill grants a thirty years' pension to all these widows that are living; and according to the practice which has prevailed, I suppose that the children of all who have died in the mean time will claim up to the time of the death of their parent.

Mr. BORLAND. I would say to the Senator that such is not my understanding of the provisions of the bill. I understand it to apply from the passage of the act. That is the view of the committee. It does not grant a thirty years' pension.

Mr. DAWSON. I think that the construction of the bill is contrary to that given by the Senator from Arkansas. I think it gives a pension for thirty years. I move to lay it upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

JUDICIAL SYSTEM IN NEW MEXICO.

The Senate proceeded to consider the motion submitted by Mr. BUTLER, on the 2d instant, to reconsider the vote referring to the Committee on the Judiciary the bill to amend the act entitled "An act proposing to the State of Texas the establishment of her northern and western boundaries, the relinquishment by said State of all territory claimed by her exterior to said boundaries, and of all her claims upon the United States, and to establish a territorial government for the territory of New Mexico," approved September 9, 1850; and the motion was agreed to.

Ordered, That the bill be referred to the Committee on Territories.

PRIVATE CLAIMS.

Mr. DOWNS. I move to postpone the prior special orders, in order to take up the bill for the relief of William Darby.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill as in Committee of the Whole.

It provides that there shall be paid to William Darby the sum of $1,500, in full compensation for labor and materials furnished in surveying and making a map of the Territory of Louisiana in the years 1812 and 1813.

Mr. DOWNS. I wish to state very briefly to the Senate the merits of this bill. It was introduced during the last Congress, and referred to a select committee, as it could not be referred to any of the standing committees with propriety. The present Secretary of the Treasury (Mr. Corwin) was chairman of that select committee. A favorable report was made, and the bill passed the Senate, but failed in the House of Representatives, as many private bills did. It proposes compensation for very important services rendered by this distinguished geographer, William Darby, at an early day in exploring what was then a new country, now Louisiana and Arkansas. For that service he contended, and the committee considered, that he was entitled to this very moderate and reasonable compensation. I hope, therefore, that there will be no objection to the bill.

A committee reported a much larger sum for services of less value formerly; and this bill was not seriously opposed before. It then passed the Senate, and I hope it will pass again without opposition. Mr. Darby is now a very old man, maintaining himself by his own labor in a subordinate office under the Government.

The PRESIDENT interposed, and the honorable Senator yielded the floor, it being understood that the distinguished guest of the Senate was about to enter.

On motion by Mr. DOWNS, the bill was laid on the table.

RECEPTION OF LOUIS KOSSUTH.

At one o'clock the doors of the Senate Chamber were thrown open, and Governor Kossuth, supported by the committee appointed by the Senate to introduce him, the Hon. JAMES SHIELDS, the Hon. WM. H. SEWARD, and the Hon. LEWIS CASS, entered and advanced within the bar, the Senate rising to receive them.

The suite of Governor Kossuth, in military uniforms, were grouped below the bar.

Mr. SHIELDS addressed the President, as follows:

"Mr. President, we have the honor to introduce Louis Kossuth to the Senate of the United States."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore then addressed him, as follows:

"Louis Kossuth, I welcome you to the Senate of the United States. The committee will conduct you to the seat which I have caused to be prepared for you."

He was then conducted to a chair in front of the President's desk, and seated with the Committee of the Senate.

Mr. MANGUM rose some time afterwards and said: Mr. President, with a view of affording Senators an opportunity of paying their respects to our illustrious guest, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT then descended to the floor of the Senate, and was introduced to Governor Kossuth by the committee. The other Senators were also severally introduced; after which gentlemen and ladies present in great numbers sought the same gratification. Amongst the incidents of the levee, it may be mentioned that when the martial figure of General Houston approached Kossuth, there appeared to be a special attraction in the person of the hero of San Jacinto. The introduction having been made, the following brief but expressive dialogue ensued:

Mr. HOUSTON. Sir, you are welcome to the Senate of the United States.

Mr. KOSSUTH. I can only wish I had been as successful as you, sir.

Mr. HOUSTON. God grant that you may yet be so.

Subsequently the distinguished stranger was conducted to the Vice President's room, to which the President pro tem. and Senators retired with him.

SENATE CHAMBER, January 2, 1852.

To the Editor of the Congressional Globe:

DEAR SIR: You will find me reported, in the proceedings of the Senate to-day, as voting against laying the memorial of "The Industrial Congress of the city of New York" upon the table. I write this by way of explanation, lest the mere vote, without remark, may be misunderstood. I voted against laying the memorial on the table, and would have voted for its reference to the Committee on Foreign Relations, not that I favor the views or wishes of the memorialists, but because I regard this movement of theirs as one of a series which is now in rapid progress of development, the effect of which, if favored by Congress, is to involve us in the political affairs of other countries, in a way and to an extent not intended or recognized by the Constitution, and which, in my opinion, can end only in changing the character of our Government, and bringing ruin upon our country. Such movements, threatening, as I believe, great evil to the country, should be met, and arrested (so far as Congress may be able to arrest them) at the threshold. To give them the go-by, by laying the proposition to consider them upon the table, is, in my opinion, but to cover the flame at a single point of its exhibition, with the certain effect of stimulating and encouraging the efforts of those whose vocation seems to be to pile fuel upon the fires of its source. I am for meeting the evil at once, by referring its consideration to an appropriate committee, and when their report should be brought in, by expressing the sense of the Senate, by an emphatic vote, upon the merits of the whole question.

I am one of those who believe that our Government was formed, and we, the representatives of those who formed it, were sent here for the sole and exclusive purpose of legislating for the promotion of American interests. I find no authority in the Constitution under which I hold my seat here, and which alone prescribes and limits my duties and powers, to do anything else; and in the teachings and admonitions of the "Father of his Country," and of those wise men who cooperated with him in framing and administering the Government, I find the highest and strongest considerations, if additional ones were needed, for keeping within these well-defined and sacred limits.

As individuals, we may rightfully sympathize with whom we please; and I would remove every legal barrier which now prevents the citizenry of our country, as individuals, from manifesting any sympathy they may feel for any man or any cause, by deeds as well as words. But as public functionaries, deriving all our duties and powers solely and exclusively from the Constitution, which we have sworn to support, I hold that American interests and American citizens alone can claim our official interference and protection. When we undertake to go beyond these limits, in my opinion we usurp powers which were never conferred upon us, and enter upon a career which can end only in ruin to those whose interests we were appointed to take care of.

I hope, and doubt not, an opportunity will soon occur when such action as I have indicated may be taken upon this general subject. Then I shall be prepared to vote, and to give at length my reasons for it. For the present I desire only that this brief expression of opinion may go to the public along with the vote it is intended to explain. Do me the favor, therefore, to let this appear in the same number of your paper with this day's proceedings of the Senate, and oblige yours,

Very respectfully and truly,

SOLON BORLAND, of Arkansas.

P. S. I am authorized to say that other Senators who voted as I did were influenced by similar considerations with those which governed my vote. S. B.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, January 5, 1852.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m.

The Journal was read and approved.

THE COMFORT OF THE MEMBERS.

The SPEAKER. Some days ago a resolution was adopted by the House of Representatives, "that the Speaker of the House be authorized to 'cause such arrangements to be made in the interior of the Hall as may be necessary for the general health of the members.' The Speaker has looked into the matter, and is at a loss to determine what can be done to increase the comfort of the members in that portion of the Hall. Upon consulting those members, however, there seems to be a general concurrence of opinion, that nothing could improve their condition so much as to have another assistant doorkeeper appointed to guard the door to the Gallery in that quarter. The Chair does not feel at liberty to authorize the appointment of that assistant doorkeeper or messenger, without the consent of the House. It will, therefore, be for the House to determine whether an additional messenger shall be appointed or not. The Chair is assured by gentlemen in that quarter of the Hall, that such an appointment would greatly improve their condition; and he asks to be instructed upon that point.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I presume there will be no objection.

There was no objection; and an assistant to the Doorkeeper will be appointed.

THE RECEPTION OF LOUIS KOSSUTH.

Mr. CARTTER. I move that the rules of the House be suspended, in order to enable me to offer the following resolution. I have simply to say, that if we seek to do respect to the distinguished man named in that resolution, we must do it between this and Friday, for upon that day he is to leave this city.

The resolution was then read, as follows:

"Resolved, That a committee of five be appointed by the Speaker to wait upon Louis Kossuth, and introduce him to the House of Representatives."

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, demanded the yeas and nays on the motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. STUART. For the purpose of obviating a difficulty, which suggests itself to the minds of some of the members, I propose to offer an amendment, which I desire to have read; and which I ask the mover of the resolution to accept.

The SPEAKER. It is not in order to discuss the resolution, until it is before the House. The amendment can only be offered by unanimous consent.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, objected.

Mr. HEBARD moved that the House proceed to the call of the States for resolutions.

The SPEAKER. That motion is in order.

But the motion offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CARTTER] to suspend the rules, is also in order, and takes precedence; and upon that motion there can be no debate.

The yeas and nays were then ordered.

Mr. STUART. I am sure no gentleman will object to the reading of the amendment which I propose to offer. I only desire to have it read for information.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I do object, and I would state the reasons for my objection if the Chair would give me leave.

Mr. STUART. Well, I have the right to propound the inquiry to the gentleman who offered the resolution, in order—

The SPEAKER. No discussion is in order. There is no motion before the House which can be acted upon, except the motion to suspend the rules; and not until the rules are suspended can the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. STUART] offer his amendment.

Mr. STUART called for the reading of the original resolution.

Mr. CARTTER. I hope the modification will also be read, so that gentlemen may understand what it is.

Cries of "Read it!" "Read it!"

Mr. STEPHENS. I will withdraw my objection, as gentlemen around me are desirous of hearing the resolution read.

The proposed amendment was then read, as follows:

And that the chairman of that committee introduce him in these words: "We introduce Louis Kossuth to the House of Representatives of the United States." Upon which the members are recommended to rise; and the Speaker will invite him to be seated."

The question was then taken, and resulted—yeas 117, nays 51; as follows:

Previous to the announcement of the above result,

Mr. THOMAS M. HOWE said: I have reached this Hall, after some three or four days of absence by reason of sickness. I am exceedingly anxious to record my vote upon this question in the affirmative, and I ask leave to do so.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made, and the gentleman cannot record his vote.

So the rules were suspended, and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CARTER] had leave to introduce his resolution, above referred to.

Mr. CARTER. Upon that resolution I move the previous question.

Cries of "Good!" "Good!"

The previous question then received a second, and the main question was ordered to be put.

Mr. ROBBINS demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Cries of "Read the resolution!" "Read the resolution!"

The resolution was accordingly read, as above reported.

The question was then taken, and there were—yeas 123, nays 54; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. So the resolution was adopted, and in pursuance thereof

The SPEAKER appointed Messrs. CARTER, CLINGMAN, GENTRY, STANTON of Kentucky, and PEASLEE, to constitute the committee.

Mr. CARTER rose to a privileged question, and moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was passed, and to lay the motion of reconsideration upon the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

THE DOCTRINE OF NON-INTERVENTION.

Mr. BROWN, of Mississippi, asked the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a resolution; which was read for information, as follows:

Resolved, That the House of Representatives declines at this time to express an opinion on the subject of the future intervention or non-intervention of the United States in the affairs of other nations, believing, as it now declares, that no case has yet arisen which requires such expression.

Mr. JOHN W. HOWE objected.

Mr. BROWN, of Mississippi, moved the suspension of the rules; and upon that motion called for the yeas and nays, which were not ordered.

Tellers were then demanded, but refused.

The question being taken, the House refused to suspend the rules.

GRANTS OF LAND.

Mr. SIBLEY, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill, of which previous notice had been given, granting the right of way and making a donation of public lands to aid in the construction of a railroad from the falls of the St. Louis river to St. Paul, on the Mississippi river; which was read a first and second time by its title.

Mr. S. moved its reference to the Committee on Territories; which was agreed to.

Mr. HALL moved the reconsideration of the vote by which the bill was referred to the Committee on Territories, and that the bill be referred to the Committee on Public Lands. He had tried to get the ear of the Speaker before the question was taken upon the reference, but failed.

Mr. SIBLEY. Is that motion debatable?

The SPEAKER replied that it was.

Mr. SIBLEY. I do not wish to detain the House at this period with remarks of any length, on the motion just made by the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands to refer this bill to that committee. We have a standing committee of this House, whose business it is to attend particularly to the legislation for the Territories. Now, this bill is proposed to be taken from the committee to which I believe it properly belongs, and to be referred to the Committee on Public Lands, where, to a certainty, it will be served exactly as bills referred to that committee at the last session. Territorial bills always came in at the heel of the session, for the reason that the States have the preference. We have a standing committee with special reference to territorial legislation, and I hope this House will not, under any circumstances, agree in the motion just submitted by the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, and trust that they will adhere to their decision that this bill go to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. HALL. It is very true there is a committee of this House whose appropriate duty it is to take charge of the business of the Territories; but it is equally true that there is another committee of this House whose duty it is to administer the public domain. The Committee on Public Lands is the one. I believe that this bill proposes to make a grant of public lands for the purpose of aiding in the construction of railroads. Bills making grants for such works, and other internal improvements, have uniformly gone to that committee. We have before that committee now a great many bills upon this subject, coming from all parts of the country; and the committee are endeavoring to fix upon some principle which shall guide their actions upon all of them. I think it a matter of great importance, in order that justice may be done to every portion of the Union in reference to the subjects of these bills—the granting of public land to aid in the construction of works of internal improvement—that all of them should be referred to the same committee. If it be believed by this House that the Committee on Public Lands is not competent to discharge its duties, I trust the bills upon this subject will be taken from them and referred to the Committee on Territories. Now, as to the remark of the gentleman from Minnesota, [Mr. SIBLEY,] that this bill if referred to the Committee on Public Lands will never be heard of, I think it is entirely gratuitous. I believe that that committee are disposed—nay more, determined, in regard to this and all other subjects that may be referred to them, to report for or against. Now, the gentleman's bill, he may rest assured, will be reported upon time enough for the action of this Congress.

Mr. SIBLEY. I beg to say to the gentleman, I had not the least idea of imputing any neglect of duty, or any want of attention by the Committee on Public Lands, to the business that may come before them. The practice of this House has uniformly shown, that whenever territorial questions were referred to committees, they had to yield to those from States. In all questions that come before them—the Committee on Public Lands, as well as the other committees—the States have the preference.

Mr. HALL. I cannot understand the force of the objection made by the gentleman from Minnesota, [Mr. SIBLEY.] He says that his experience is, that all committees have given the preference to subjects from States over those from the Territories. Well, I suppose if this matter goes to the Committee on Territories, it will be treated just as it would be by the Committee on Public Lands. I will assure the gentleman that he need not be afraid of the non-action of the Committee on Public Lands. I am certain that it will act at the earliest practical period in regard to this matter, and all similar bills that may be committed to its charge. My desire is, that all these bills may go to the same committee, as they involve the same principle. They may be considered together, and reported to the House, so that a like action may be had in regard to all of them. There is another thing the gentleman knows well: that it is the practice of the House of Representatives to set aside three days each session for the consideration of territorial business. He need not be uneasy that this or the other territorial bills will be neglected, as they will come up as territorial business, and then will be determined upon by the House.

Mr. RICHARDSON obtained the floor, but gave way to

Mr. SIBLEY. I wish to ask a question of the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands—whether, last Congress, a bill providing for a donation of public lands to the Territory of Minnesota did not come into the House on the day set apart for territorial business, and under the rules of the House was not acted upon, because it was not considered strictly territorial business?

Mr. HALL. I do not remember the case. The decision of the House then was right. This is not strictly of a territorial character, and ought not to go to the Committee on Territories; and if it is not territorial in its character, the motion of the gentleman is improper.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I understand the question before the House is the reference of a bill granting a donation of land to the Territory of Minnesota to aid in the construction of a railroad. I believe, according to the uniform practice of the House, this subject properly belongs to the Committee on Public Lands, and not to the Committee on Territories. I expect, and I think the country expects, of that committee that they will originate some general system upon this subject by which they will provide for the construction of roads through the lands of the Government by donations, not only in the States, but in the Territories. I am very free to say, as one member of the Committee on Territories, that it is a subject that I do not want the charge of. We have enough to do if we discharge the other duties before us, without coming into conflict, as we necessarily should, with the system laid down by the Committee on Public Lands, were this bill referred to us.

Mr. HEARD obtained the floor, but gave way to—

Mr. SIBLEY. I want to ask a question of the gentleman from Illinois—whether he does not recollect that a bill granting a donation of public lands to Florida, passed during the first session of the last Congress, was reported from the Committee on Territories? The Committee on Public Lands had nothing to do with it.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I have no distinct recollection upon the subject. I will, in reply to the gentleman, say that my opinion is, the Government ought to deal liberally with these Territories in donations. It is the policy and interest of the Government to do so—to settle them up as rapidly as possible, by making improvements that will give facilities for settlement, and for the transportation to market of the agricultural products of the country. I am not hostile to the object of which the gentleman is in favor; nor do I believe it is the policy of this Government, of this House, or the Committee on Public Lands, to be so. I do not recollect whether at the last session of Congress an important bill of this character came from the Committee on Territories. I should have no hesitation in reporting such a bill back if I believed it right, and I speak only for one member of that committee.

Mr. SIBLEY. I will withdraw my opposition to the reference of the bill to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. HEBARD. I did not rise to discuss the question, not having any interest in it; but merely to save further time in discussion. I will not move the previous question as the bill is now to be disposed of.

The question being taken upon the motion to reconsider, it was agreed to.

On motion by Mr. HALL, the bill was then referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

EMIGRANTS FOR THE WEST INDIA COLONIES.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia, asked the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a resolution calling on the President for information.

Objection was made.

Mr. BAYLY moved the suspension of the rules for the purpose of introducing his resolution; which was agreed to.

The resolution was read by the Clerk, as follows:

Whereas there was issued on the 16th October, 1850, by the Secretary of State of Colonial Affairs of the British Government, the following circular, viz:

"CIRCULAR.

"DOWNING STREET, October 16th, 1850.

"Sir: I have to acquaint you that it has been suggested to me that a desirable class of emigrants for the West India Colonies might be induced to come to them from among the black and colored population of the United States, whose arrival and location, if they choose to come, would, I have no doubt, be advantageous both to themselves and the Colonies. I am not aware of anything which can be done by the Colonial Government to encourage such immigration, beyond showing a readiness to pass acts giving the privilege of naturalization to any such persons as might come and settle there, and providing that a bounty should be payable on such immigrants under such arrangements as may be thought desirable. I would also suggest, as deserving of consideration, whether laws might not be passed rendering binding on certain conditions engagements to pay sums of money which may have been agreed on by immigrants, although such engagements may have been contracted in America, and while the parties were in a state of slavery. I have, &c., GREY."

And whereas the subject referred to in said circular is a matter of the deepest interest to the people of one portion of this Confederacy; now, therefore,

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to this House, if not incompatible with the public interest, any information he may possess respecting said circular; and particularly what action the Legislative Assemblies of the British West India Islands have taken in pursuance of the suggestions contained therein.

Mr. BAYLY demanded the previous question; which was seconded, and under the operation thereof the resolution was adopted.

WIDOW OF GEN. WORTH.

Mr. BRIGGS asked the unanimous consent of the House to take up Senate bill No. 32, for the relief of Margaret L. Worth, for the purpose of referring it to a standing committee.

Objection was made by several.

Mr. BRIGGS moved to suspend the rules for the purpose of allowing him to introduce his motion; and upon which he demanded tellers; which were ordered, and Messrs. JOHNSON, of Tennessee, and KING, of New York, were appointed.

The question being taken, the tellers reported—ayes 101, noes 19.

So the motion to suspend was agreed to.

Mr. BRIGGS then submitted his motion; and the bill was read a first and second time by its title.

Mr. B. moved that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. DUNHAM moved that it be referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The question was put on the motion to refer to the Committee on Military Affairs; and it was disagreed to.

The latter motion was then agreed to.

Mr. ROBBINS asked the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a resolution, which was read for information, as follows, viz:

Resolved, That the Committee of Elections be requested to ascertain and report the amount due to Alderman Gallaway, for services rendered as commissioner to take testimony in the contested-election case from the fourth district of Pennsylvania, in accordance with a resolution of this House, passed January 23, 1850.

Mr. R. moved that the resolution be referred to the Committee of Elections.

Mr. MOORE, of Pennsylvania. I move that the Committee of Elections also be requested to ascertain the amount due to John S. Littell for contesting that case.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. The resolution is not before the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood that the resolution was before the House by unanimous consent.

Mr. JONES. I understood the consent was only for reading it for information.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moved that it be referred without the Chair inquiring whether there was any objection or not. If there is no objection, he will entertain it now.

Mr. JONES. I object.

Mr. ROBBINS. Then I move a suspension of the rules for the purpose of enabling me to introduce the resolution just read.

The question was then taken, and it was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended.

Mr. ROBBINS then demanded the previous question; which was seconded, and the main question ordered.

The question was then taken, and the resolution was adopted.

A message was here received from the President of the United States.

On motion by Mr. STUART, leave was granted to withdraw the petition and papers of Samuel Spalding for the purpose of transferring them to the Senate.

On motion by Mr. KING, of New York, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers relative to the claim of Lyon and Howard be taken from the Clerk's files and referred to the Committee of Claims.

IMPROVEMENT OF RIVER SAVANNAH.

Mr. JACKSON asked the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a bill, of which previous notice had been given, for the removal of obstructions in the river Savannah, in the State of Georgia.

Mr. CLARK objected.

Mr. JACKSON moved to suspend the rules for the purpose.

The question was then taken, and the rules were not suspended.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I rise to inquire of the Chair whether it is resolution or petition day?

The SPEAKER. The Chair rules it is petition day.

Mr. JONES. I call, then, for the order of the day.

The SPEAKER. The order of the day will be to call upon the States for petitions, beginning with Maine.

Mr. McNAIR. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a resolution, and I feel certain that no gentleman in this House will object to it when they knew something about it. I will say a word—

The SPEAKER. Debate is out of order.

Mr. McNAIR. I want simply to give an idea—

The SPEAKER. It is impossible for the Chair to allow discussion under the rules.

The resolution was then read, as follows:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the firmness and solidity of the foundation of the extension of the Capitol, now laid, and whether the strength of the stone be sufficient to uphold the superstructure about to be erected thereon.

Mr. McNAIR moved to suspend the rules.

A division being asked, the question was taken, and there were—ayes 78, noes 45.

Mr. McNAIR demanded tellers; which were ordered; and Messrs. McNAIR and BEALE were appointed.

The question was then taken, and there were—ayes 77, noes 34.

The SPEAKER. There appears to be no quorum voting.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, moved that the House adjourn. On which motion,

Mr. JOHN W. HOWE demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered; when—

Mr. STEPHENS withdrew his motion.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to offer a resolution; and hope there will be no objection.

The SPEAKER. The motion cannot be entertained at present. The proposition is now to suspend the rules for the purpose of enabling the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McNAIR] to introduce a resolution, which will be again read for the information of the House.

Mr. MOORE, of Pennsylvania. I would suggest to my colleague that if he would substitute the Committee on Public Buildings, the resolution would pass without any objection.

Mr. McNAIR. I prefer a select committee.

Mr. FICKLIN said tellers were ordered, and there was no quorum. I ask for a recount, that we may see if there is not a quorum present.

A recount was then had, (Messrs. PENN and McNAIR acting as tellers,) and there were—ayes 84, noes 42.

So the rules were suspended.

Mr. McNAIR moved the previous question upon the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. COBB demanded tellers; and they were ordered.

Mr. FOWLER. Will it be in order to move the reference of the resolution to the Committee on Public Buildings?

The SPEAKER. The reference will not be in order during the pendency of the previous question.

Mr. FOWLER. I think that is the appropriate committee.

The question was then taken on the call for the previous question, (Messrs. FOWLER and McNAIR acting as tellers,) and resulted—ayes 78, noes 23.

The SPEAKER. There is no quorum voting. Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. JOHN W. HOWE demanded the yeas and nays; which were not ordered.

The question was then taken, and the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, January 6, 1852.

Prayer by the Rev. L. F. MORGAN.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, accompanied by a memorial addressed to the President of the United States by the petty officers, seamen, and marines, attached to the United States squadron in the Pacific, asking an increase of pay; which was read.

Ordered, That it be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

REPORT OF SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair has received the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the state of the finances, which will be read.

Mr. HUNTER. I move that, without reading, it be referred to the Committee on Finance, and that it be printed.

The report was so referred, and it was ordered that it be printed.

Mr. HUNTER. I move that ten thousand extra copies be printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. BRADBURY. It was my purpose, Mr. President, had I been able to take my seat here before the extra copies of the public documents of this session had generally been ordered to be printed, to have offered a resolution providing that a COMPENDIUM or ABSTRACT of the annual public documents be prepared and printed. It has long appeared to me that something of this kind is imperiously demanded. By the mode of printing the public documents now adopted, large numbers of volumes of the President's message and the accompanying documents are printed for general circulation, containing, with a great amount of valuable matter, a still greater amount of no public interest whatever. These documents sometimes extend to three or four or more large volumes at a single session. By a reference to these books, it will be seen that hundreds of pages are occupied with mere details and estimates, of no earthly service except to members of Congress, or possibly for deposit in the public libraries. What possible interest can it be for us to print and send abroad amongst our constituents, the minute estimates for the various items of provisions and clothing required at our various naval and military stations? With this mass of useless detail we bury the valuable information which the documents otherwise contain. We should separate that which is of public interest from that which is not, and print for general circulation only that which is of general interest. I can perceive no way in which this can be accomplished, except by the preparation of a COMPENDIUM or ABSTRACT of the public documents. I believe it to be practicable to condense all that is valuable for general use, into a single volume of reasonable size, suited for circulation, and with a good index, made exceedingly valuable and convenient. Every individual to whom such a volume should be sent, would have the substance of the documents, showing the operations of the Government, and all that is of value to him, in a convenient form.

It would be a volume which, for its compactness and convenience, would be worth more to the general reader than the whole set of annual documents, as now published. But it is known to every Senator that the sets, as now distributed, are very generally broken. One volume is sent to one constituent, and one to another. If the full set is sent to each person to whom the first is forwarded, the circulation is necessarily confined to a small number of persons, and they have a small library of the valuable and the worthless bound up together.

Another reason for the change suggested, is the saving of the expense of printing volumes of useless matter.

It may be necessary that the proposed abstract or compendium should be prepared by the head of one of the Departments—perhaps the Secretary of the Treasury or the Secretary of the Interior. It can hardly be expected that it could be conveniently done by the Secretary of the Senate or a committee of either House.

The subject has been brought to the attention of the Senate somewhat unexpectedly, as I was not aware that a question of this kind would come up at this session. I throw out these suggestions for the attentive consideration of the Senate, and hope they may lead to the adoption of a system by which the evils of the present may be avoided, and we may be able to condense into a single volume what is material for general information. By so doing we can greatly increase the circulation of all the important matter, and at a great saving of expense. I throw out these suggestions, not with the view of interposing any objection to the motion of the honorable Senator from Virginia, [Mr. HUNTER,] inasmuch as the report under consideration is one of the most important of our public documents, but rather as a notice that I intend to call the attention of the Senate to the subject hereafter.

The question was then taken on the motion of Mr. HUNTER, and it was decided in the affirmative.

THE CUBAN PRISONERS.

The following message was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. M. P. FILLMORE, his Private Secretary:

To the Senate of the United States:

I transmit to the Senate a report of the Secretary of State relative to the persons belonging to the expedition of Lopez, who were taken prisoners in Cuba and afterwards sent to Spain, and who have now been pardoned and released by her Catholic Majesty. The appropriation, the expediency of which is suggested in the report, I cordially commend to the consideration of Congress, with the single additional suggestion, that to be available it should be promptly made.

MILLARD FILLMORE.

NOTICE OF A BILL.

BILL INTRODUCED.

FLOGGING IN THE NAVY.

Mr. GWIN. There was a memorial laid upon the table some time ago, which I promised to call up to-day. It relates to flogging in the Navy. I move that it be taken up and disposed of.

Mr. BRIGHT. A week ago this morning, the joint resolution in relation to the printing of the returns of the Seventh Census, was made the special order for to-day, and the morning hour has now passed.

The PRESIDENT. That is the first special order.

Mr. BRIGHT. I hope there will be no objection to proceeding with its consideration now.

Mr. SHIELDS. But committees have not yet been called upon for reports, and I have one which I wish to present.

The PRESIDENT. The hour of one o'clock has arrived, and if the Senator from Indiana calls for the special order, that will be the next business for the consideration of the Senate.

Mr. BRIGHT. I withdraw the call for the special order, to give the Senator from Illinois an opportunity of presenting his report.

Mr. GWIN. If the call of the Senator from Indiana for the special order is withdrawn, I must insist upon my motion. The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. STOCKTON] wishes to make some remarks, and I also wish to offer some observations on this subject. I hope, therefore, that the memorial will now be taken up.

Mr. STOCKTON. So far as I am concerned, I am quite willing to be satisfied so long as this memorial is allowed to lie upon the table; but as soon as it puts its head above the table I shall talk about it.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair will not call for the special order until reports are made, if the Senator from Indiana wishes to withdraw his call for the special order.

Mr. BRIGHT. I withdraw the call for the present.

REPORTS FROM STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. GWIN, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill to establish a navy-yard and depot on the Bay of San Francisco, in California, reported it with amendments.

He also made a report on the subject; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. CLEMENS, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred a bill to indemnify the State of South Carolina for money expended for the use of the United States in the war in Florida with the Seminole Indians, reported it with amendments.

Mr. DAWSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill to provide for the payment to the State of Georgia for moneys expended by the State for horses and equipments lost by volunteers and militia whilst engaged in the suppression of the hostilities of the Creek, Seminole, and Cherokee Indians, in the years 1836, 1837, and 1838, reported it without amendment.

DESTRUCTION OF THE CONGRESSIONAL LIBRARY.

Mr. HUNTER, from the Committee on Finance, to which, was referred the bill from the House of Representatives making appropriation to meet the expenses incurred in consequence of the late fire at the Capitol, and the amendment of the Senate appropriating ——— dollars for the increase of the Library, reported them back, and recommended their passage.

He presumed there would be no objection to the immediate consideration of the bill, and he therefore asked the unanimous consent of the Senate to take it up.

The motion being agreed to, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and the blank in the amendment was filled with $10,000.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill as amended was subsequently read a third time and passed.

Mr. HUNTER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Buildings be instructed to inquire into the expediency of appropriating a sum not exceeding ——— dollars, to fit up the document room near the Library and a part of the adjoining passage, for the temporary reception of the books of the Congressional Library.

MARINE CORPS.

Mr. CLEMENS submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of adopting a separate code of regulations for the government of the Marine Corps of the United States.

Be it further resolved, That said committee be also instructed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the President of the United States to appoint annually two cadets to the Military Academy at West Point, to be educated with a view to appointment in the Marine Corps.

WIDOW OF GENERAL BELKNAP.

Mr. SEWARD submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Pensions be instructed to inquire into the justice and propriety of awarding a pension to the widow of the late Brevet Brigadier General Belknap, who served during the late Mexican war with distinguished fidelity and ability, and recently died while actively engaged in the public service.

PRINTING OF THE SEVENTH CENSUS.

The Senate proceeded, as in Committee of the Whole, to consider the following resolution, introduced by Mr. BRIGHT, and reported back by the Committee on Printing:

Be it resolved, &c., That the Joint Committee on Printing be directed to contract with Donelson & Armstrong for printing the census returns, upon such terms as the committee may deem reasonable.

Mr. BORLAND. When this resolution was before the Senate on a previous day, I stated that I should offer an amendment to it. I now propose to strike out the words "Joint Committee on Printing," and insert "Secretary of the Senate and Clerk of the House of Representatives." I shall also move further to amend it, by striking out the word "committee," in the latter part of the resolution, and inserting "Secretary of the Senate and Clerk of the House of Representatives," so as to make it read consistently with the first amendment.

The PRESIDENT. If the former amendment is adopted, the latter follows as a matter of course.

Mr. BORLAND. I do not offer this amendment with the view, as some might suppose, of defeating the resolution. I offer it in good faith, for the purpose of putting the resolution in what I consider the proper form. I am in favor of the purpose of the resolution; but I deem it due to the Committee on Printing, to myself particularly as chairman of that committee, and still more due to the Senate, that this alteration should be made in the resolution as reported from the committee. In its present form the resolution proposes to impose duties upon the Committee on Printing which I do not think ought to be imposed upon it, and which I think calculated to do injury rather than good to the public service. It requires executive, or rather administrative duties of the committee—a class of duties which are not required of the other committees of the Senate. It constitutes them an executive board, and imposes upon them duties analogous to those which are performed in every other Department of the Government by a bureau, at the other end of the avenue. I am not opposed to performing any duty which the Senate may impose upon me, as the member of any committee. I think I have labored faithfully; I know I have labored industriously and assiduously in the performance of duties which have been imposed upon the Committee on Printing, and those duties are well known to be arduous. But, sir, I am opposed to being burdened by duties which I have neither the time nor competency to perform in a manner or with results satisfactory to myself or useful to the public; and which, even if I had the time and competency to perform ever so well, were never intended to be performed by any Senator, and are not contemplated or provided for in the organization of the committees of this body.

This resolution requires the Committee on Printing to go out into the streets, as it were, and engage in chaffering and bargaining with those who wish to do this portion of the public work. The mere statement of this fact, it seems to me, shows that the resolution is wrong in this respect, and imposes duties upon Senators which would carry them beyond their legitimate and proper sphere, and utterly incompatible with their other and appropriate duties.

I have said that I do not feel competent to perform the duties required by this resolution. I repeat it with emphasis, and in all sincerity and candor. There are details in the proposed arrangement of this business which I do not understand, and which I have neither time nor inclination to learn. But the persons whom I propose to substitute in the place of the committee, have the qualifications which I do not possess. It is in the line of their duty—a duty which they have habitually performed for years past.

I am not a practical printer, though I have some knowledge of the printing and publishing business, from having heretofore been engaged in it; but I do not know enough about it to do this work as it ought to be done, and as it must be done, if the public interest is to be taken care of. To require it of me is to require impossibilities at my hands; and I now notify the Senate and all concerned, that if, notwithstanding what I have said, the resolution shall pass in its present form, some other member of the committee will have to perform the duties it imposes, if they shall be performed at all. But who is the member who will or who can perform them? Sir, I turn to my associate on the committee, the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HAMLIN,] who alone may be supposed to be competent to perform these duties, and he says that, like myself, he is not. I am sure then no other member of the committee is competent.

In justice to the other members of the committee and to myself, I must say, I do not oppose the imposition of these duties upon us, because we are unwilling to perform any amount of labor, assume any responsibility which may legitimately fall to our share. But, sir, because I am convinced that these cannot properly be required of us; and even if they could be, they exceed our powers of performance. The passage of the resolution, then, in its present form, will, in my opinion, result in confusion in the public business, and, in all probability, defeat the object sought to be accomplished by its introduction. On the other hand, if the gentlemen I propose to substitute for the committee, be charged with these duties, there is the best reason for believing they will be faithfully and efficiently performed.

Mr. CASS. I desire to say one word upon this subject. It seems to me, that under any view which we can take of it, this committee is quite as competent to perform the duty as the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House; the members of the committee are as much practical printers as they are. I believe the committee has a clerk, who could collect all the necessary facts. There is a good deal of responsibility about the matter, and it seems to me that it will be much safer with the committee than with the Secretary and the Clerk. I wish, for myself, that the Committee on Printing may go on with it; and if they do not, I would much prefer the appointment of a select committee to attend to it. I think the responsibility had better be assumed by a committee of this body than by the Secretary and Clerk.

Mr. BRIGHT. The practical effect of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas would be to let out this contract to the lowest bidder. That, for one, I wish to avoid, for the reason that experience has proved that under that system we cannot get our work done in a suitable and proper manner, and in reasonable time. It is clearly demonstrated that this work, to be valuable, should be performed promptly, and for its prompt and proper execution we are willing to pay a fair price. Hence, the resolution was framed to pay a fair price, and to give it to gentlemen who, we knew, were able to go on immediately with the work. I am sorry to hear the honorable Senator say that he is unwilling to undertake the labor of making the contract and disposing of the work. It is a duty which belongs legitimately to the committee of which he is the chairman. This is a legitimate method of disposing of this branch of the public business. There are precedents on the Journal showing that, heretofore, we have authorized public printing to be done through the medium of the Committee on Printing; and I hope the honorable Senator will reconsider his determination.

The Joint Committee on Printing of the two Houses can afford to do that which the officers of this body dare not do. They can afford to say that they will give to gentlemen who are ready and qualified to do this work, a fair price for it; and they would not be censured for doing so; but if the officers of the two Houses should do that, they would subject themselves to censure; and it is for the purpose of relieving them that I object to the amendment. I feel quite sure that the Joint Committee would be sustained in giving a fair price, provided the work were done immediately and done well. For these reasons I object to the amendment, and hope it will not be agreed to.

Mr. BORLAND. I repeat that it is not to avoid either labor or responsibility that I proposed this amendment. I am as ready to perform labor or to assume responsibility, here or elsewhere, as any other Senator. I have never shrunk from either. I would remind the Senate, however, in support of what I have already said, that the Committee on Printing are acting under the joint resolution of 1846, which prescribes their duties. When that committee was appointed they looked to that resolution for the rule and prescription of their duties; and I hold that it is not proper or competent for the Senate to change that resolution and make the committee a pack-horse—if I may so express it—to perform any drudgery which it may please the Senate to have performed in the dispatch of its business. Why, sir, if you may legitimately require us, under a resolution of this sort, to do what it proposes, you may also require us to go out into the streets and bargain for the wood with which we make our fires; or you may require us to establish a public printing office, and then give all our time and attention to the details of a printer's business. This might all seem very right and proper in the eyes of the Senators who are urging the adoption of this resolution. But for myself, as a Senator, and as member of the committee, I protest against it, and against everything of like character and tendency.

The Senator from Indiana [Mr. BRIGHT] says that the committee can perform this duty in a manner, and give "a fair price" for the performance of this work, which the Secretary of the Senate and Clerk of the House "dare" not do. Why "dare" not do it? Does the Senator mean to say, or does he think, that the committee could or would give more than "a fair price," and that if they did, they would be censured, and justly censured, for doing so? Surely he does not. And if not, why would not the Secretary and Clerk "dare" do the same thing? A "reasonable"—that is, a "fair"—price is what the resolution provides for. Let the Secretary and Clerk give that—as I am sure they would—and who would, who "dare," censure them? If any one, his censure would be harmless. I do not seek to save the committee from such responsibility as that. The Secretary and Clerk need not fear to incur it.

Some Senators seem to think it an easy task to perform the duties of the Committee on Printing. The duties may seem simple, and the matters referred to them very trivial. True, the matters referred to them are often very trivial; but they are, nevertheless, very troublesome, and require much time in attending to them. Senators can convince themselves of this by undertaking for a short time some of the duties they are so anxious to impose upon others.

Even as it is now, and has been for the last two years, it has been difficult for the committee to perform their duties with satisfaction to themselves—impossible it has seemed to give satisfaction to the Senate or the country. And why? The first obstacle in the way of success has been found in the "contract system," under which our printing has been, and is now, required to be done, and which not only permits, but encourages bad faith in the execution of the public work. And the second obstacle—the most pertinent, perhaps, to be mentioned here, has been found in the action of the Senate itself—in this: that when the committee have time and again faithfully performed their duty, in requiring the terms of the contracts to be complied with, the Senate, instead of sustaining the committee, and thus insuring the proper execution of the public work, have (invariably, I think I may say, for I can recall no instance of the contrary) abandoned and overruled the committee, and sided with and sustained the faithless contractor. This was the case during the last Congress, as most of the Senators well know; and unless some radical change be speedily made in the system I have spoken of, and also in the practice of the Senate, there is reason to fear that the same things will be done over again during the present Congress. In view of this state of things, consider, sir, the position of the Committee on Printing! It surely is bad enough, and the burdens you have already imposed upon us are heavy enough, to entitle us to be spared that which this resolution proposes to add.

The advocates of this resolution seem to agree with me in condemning the contract system, and speak of this as if it were a remedy for the evils of that system. In this, I beg leave to say, with all respect, they are widely mistaken. The proposition of the resolution is, that a contract be made, and it differs from the present evil system in no material particular. It differs only in changing the parties to the contract, and allowing latitude for paying a somewhat higher price. Instead of putting the work out to the lowest bidder, it names the contractor who shall have it; and instead of making it the duty of our executive officers, the agent of Congress, it imposes that duty upon the Committee on Printing. Supposing the committee to be qualified to perform this duty and the contract to be made, it might be that the work would be better done and furnished in better time than it has been our fortune to obtain under the present system. But all that would depend upon the good faith of the contractor, as it now does, and has done for years past under the present system. Where, then, is the advantage to be gained? Let those find it who can. But, sir, suppose the contract to be violated in this case, as it has heretofore always been, there is this additional disadvantage to the committee: They would then be liable to censure not only for failure to perform the impossibility of holding the contractor to his terms when the contract had been made by another agency, but as the agents who themselves made the forfeited contract. For the committee and myself, I ask to be spared this additional burden.

Mr. GWIN. I can appreciate the desire of the chairman of the Committee on Printing to get clear of the labor of making this contract. I can appreciate his feelings. I know that it would take a great deal of his time to attend to that work. But really I do not think his arguments should influence the Senate at all. The Committee on Naval Affairs was raised for the purpose of attending to the business of the Senate pertaining to the Navy; and we all know perfectly well that they have to attend to business relating to the carrying of the mails. The Senate imposes that duty upon them. One of the most responsible of the duties imposed upon them is the directing or superintending of the great lines of mail steamers.

Mr. BORLAND. I would ask the Senator one question. He alludes to the increased duties imposed upon the Committee on Naval Affairs. I will ask him if, in these increased duties, the Senate have ever directed that committee to contract with individuals for constructing ships or carrying the mail? If they have done that, I will admit that the cases are parallel; not otherwise.

Mr. GWIN. The printing is a specific object. We must have it done, and we have appointed a Committee on Printing to attend to it. This is a question pertaining to that subject. We must have the census returns printed; and as to the additional duty which it will impose upon that committee, it strikes me that if it is as laborious as it is represented, it would impose a duty upon the Secretary and the Clerk which would incapacitate them for the discharge of their present duties, which are onerous. But I am convinced that the labor which will attend this contract is overrated. I take it for granted that the parties who have authorized this application to be made to Congress are prepared to relieve the Committee of this great labor, by laying before them the conditions upon which they propose to do this work. They will do it in a manner so simple that it will be impossible for the committee to misunderstand the contract. I am confident that the labor of making this contract will be taken from the Committee by facts which will be laid before them by the parties. I agree with everything which has been said about the necessity of printing these census returns in a manner that will make them a part of the archives of the country, of which we shall not be ashamed. I hope the Senator will review his determination, and consent to attend to this work, and, if he does, I am sure he will do it as he always does the work which falls into his hands.

Mr. CASS. It seems to be conceded on all hands that we have arrived at a position in respect to this business in which there must be some special contract made. The census was taken a year and a half ago. It has not been published and laid before us yet. I do not believe there is another country on the face of the globe in which such a delay would have taken place. The decennial term will almost expire before the people get the information contained in this census. So we are treated in all our printing. Where is the Biennial Register, which should have been laid on our tables? Shall we get it this session or the next?

A SENATOR. Who was to print it?

Mr. CASS. I do not know who was to print it; but it should be here. The law contains a provision that it should be here. So it is with everything we have. All our printing comes to us after the subject-matter of it has almost passed from the public mind.

Here is some printing which is to be done. How is it to be done? The proposition is to refer the making of the contract to a committee of this body. Can it be in better hands? What is the objection to it? The honorable Senator from Arkansas objects to the labor which it will impose upon the committee. I suppose it will not amount to much. They will have to go into no specific details, for the facts will be before them.

But the Senator does not like the responsibility; and then the proceedings of the committee have been censured by the Senate! I never knew that they had been censured. But is it not better that this responsibility should be taken by a committee of this body, rather than by the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House? What was said by the honorable Senator from Indiana [Mr. BRIGHT] is very true, that they can make a more just contract than the Secretary and Clerk, for the best of reasons. If the Secretary and Clerk should go to every man in the country and ask him what he would do the printing for, and thus bring it down to the lowest bidder, which is the position in which we are now, it would defeat our object, which is to have the work done speedily. It cannot be done unless it is done by persons who are every way prepared to do it; and that preparation is perhaps in the hands of only one or two. I appeal to my friend from Arkansas, whether the responsibility had not better be taken by himself and the other members of the committee, than laid upon the two persons whom he proposes to substitute for the committee, neither of whom, in a practical point of view, has better information than the members of the committee. Why, then, should not the responsibility be with the committee? It seems to me that it would be the better way to treat this very extraordinary case.

Mr. BORLAND. I am sorry to trouble the Senate any further. Still I feel it due to myself and to the position I occupy in this matter, to say a few words more. The Senator from Michigan, [Mr. Cass,] I am happy to find, agrees with me upon one point—that responsibility should never be avoided in this body. I am glad to be sustained by his high authority. I certainly never have avoided, nor desired to avoid, responsibility. I hope I shall be joined in that respect by that distinguished Senator always hereafter, and that when questions involving responsibility come before this body, he will, with me, (to use a phrase common in the far West, where I live,) "toe the mark."

I must confess that I cannot fully understand one position taken by the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. BRIGHT,] and sustained by the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. Cass,] to which I have already alluded. It is, that the committee can go further than the Secretary and Clerk, and, in the price to be paid for this work, do what those officers "dare," not do. I cannot understand the precise meaning and force of that position without an explanation. To me, it is an enigma which I am not able to unriddle. The resolution provides that the contract shall be entered into at a "reasonable" rate of compensation. No one, I apprehend, who knows the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives, and who has any knowledge of the proposed work, will doubt that they are peculiarly and eminently qualified to judge of what is "reasonable" in this respect; certainly better qualified than any committee that either House, or both Houses of Congress can appoint. The Secretary of the Senate has for years been engaged in the performance of work of this very kind. It has for years been part of his annual duty. He has become perfectly familiar with it. The committee would have to rely mainly upon him, if they undertook to perform it. The Clerk of the House of Representatives is, perhaps, one of the most experienced men in the business of printing that we can find in this city or elsewhere. He is peculiarly well qualified.

But I come back to a point which I wish to insist upon. I said that in the joint resolution of 1846, under which the committee was raised, its duties are prescribed. I hold in my hand the rules of the Senate, from which I will read what are the duties required from the Committee on Printing:

"A Committee on Printing, to consist of three members, to whom shall be referred every question on the printing of documents, reports, or other matter transmitted by either of the executive departments, and all memorials, petitions, accompanying documents, together with all other matter, the printing of which shall be moved, excepting bills originating in Congress, resolutions offered by any Senator, communications from the Legislatures, or conventions lawfully called, of the respective States, and motions to print by order of the standing committees of the Senate; and excepting, also, messages and other communications from the President of the United States, and such reports and communications from the heads of departments, as may be made to Congress, or to the Senate, in obedience to law, or in answer to calls from the Senate; and it shall be the duty of said Committee on Printing to report in every case in one day, or sooner, if practicable."

You perceive from this the character of the duties required of the committee. It is to report upon the propriety of printing various papers which come before this body, and we are required to report, certainly in one day, and sooner if practicable. Will any one undertake to say that the committee can perform the duties required by this resolution in one day, or in one week? No one who knows anything about it, would say they could be performed in a week. Even if competent to do it ever so well, I would not undertake to do it in any time less than one month. A practical printer, or one experienced in the performance of such duties, might do it sooner.

The joint resolution prescribes also that the committee shall audit the accounts of the public printers. That duty they have been in the habit of performing. But this resolution goes further, and requires them not only to do this, and to make reports, but to go out into the market and make contracts.

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. Cass] says this is all very easy and simple, and will require but little time and labor. He surely has never looked into the manner of making the contracts for the public printing. If he had but examined one sheet of the calculations necessary to be made in order to provide for the different classes of printing, he would not, he could not say that it is a simple thing, and one easily done.

I insist that the resolution under which the committee was formed, and the rule of the Senate under which they have heretofore acted, shall be adhered to and observed. And I protest against being required to perform these other duties, which are altogether foreign to the purpose for which the committee was raised, and for which it can be legitimately employed.

Mr. BRIGHT. The honorable chairman of the Committee on Printing has made a remark which seems to require a reply from me. He says that I made use of an expression which is an enigma to him, particularly when it was coincided in by the honorable Senator from Michigan, [Mr. Cass.] He cannot understand how it is that the Committee on Printing can afford to give a higher price for this printing than the ministerial officers of the two Houses. I will explain what I meant by that remark, but first let me go a little further back.

The first speech of the honorable Senator is a sad commentary on our mode and manner of legislating here. He states that we have a law authorizing the letting out of the public printing to the lowest bidder, and yet there is not a day that we do not see a practical violation of that law. Day after day the printing is laid on our tables bearing on its face evidence of the violation of the contract. It is our duty as legislators to improve the morals of those for whom we legislate. It is certainly immorality on our part to tolerate this violation of contracts day after day. It is to prevent that state of things that I advocated this resolution. I know that there is a violation of the contract regulating the public printing, and I believe that if we were to let out this class of valuable printing under this system, it would be violated again.

I have hitherto advocated the letting out of the public printing to the lowest bidders. As a general rule, I approve of that manner of disposing of the public work, but having seen so many practical illustrations, which prove that we cannot get our printing done in a suitable manner under that system, I am now opposed to it. If this work should be let out to the lowest bidder through the officers of the two Houses, I do not believe that it will be done in the manner which the public service requires. If the officers of the two bodies have the matter referred to them, I believe they will have no alternative, and we shall have these important returns printed like every class of public printing for the last few years.

Every morning we have public printing laid on our tables. It is done under a law which provides that it shall be executed on paper of fifty pounds to the ream, and at a cost of seven dollars and a half. Now, I presume those who execute our printing will not pretend that their paper weighs over forty pounds to the ream, or that it costs more than five dollars. And I learn from others that the paper on which the printing is generally done is but two and a half instead of seven dollar paper. Shall these valuable census returns be thus printed? And yet, if we impose the duty of making this contract upon our Secretary and the Clerk of the House of Representatives, will they feel themselves authorized to do otherwise than submit it to this ruinous system of competition which is productive of such lamentable results? The joint Committee on Printing, on the other hand, from their position before the country could do that which the officers of the two Houses would not venture to do. The joint committee could calculate the cost of good paper; they could ascertain how much it costs per hundred ems to set type; they can sit down and in a few hours make a calculation showing how much the whole work will be worth; and then they can say to these parties on what terms they will be willing to make a contract. They can say we will give you so much for performing this work, meaning that they will give a fair price for paper and for setting the type, and a fair profit on the work. That, I apprehend, Congress is willing to give. We do not desire to give less. It is for the purpose of avoiding the evils resulting from the present contract system of printing that it is proposed to give to the Committee on Printing the privilege of selecting those whom we know can do the work, and do it well.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. These are very precious confessions which the gentlemen are making. The gentleman from Indiana tells us that the contract system of letting our printing to the lowest bidder, has proved a failure; and the gentleman from Arkansas says that one reason of that is, that the Senate will not sustain the Committee on Printing in its efforts to prescribe a remedy for the evil. What does all that mean? Why, that we have not the virtue and the firmness to rein up those persons who make contracts with us to perform their duty. That I understand to be the plain English of it. I, for one, am not willing to bear any imputation of that sort. I wish to sustain the Committee on Public Printing in its efforts to make the undertakers, these employees of the Government who make contracts with us, perform their duty. I am not willing, for one, to say to my constituents, that "that rule by which all your bridges are built, by which all your jails and your court-houses and public works are erected, by which you do everything in your neighborhood, and which works so well at home, fails in Congress, because we have not virtue and firmness enough to have it executed." I am not willing to go before the country with any such acknowledgment as that. Sir, if we will do our duty—if we will say to these bidders who are endeavoring to get jobs and contracts, Put in such a bid as you can live by, and if you do not, we intend to make you suffer and feel the effects of your own folly; nay, of your own frauds,—if we will do that, my word for it we shall have our work well and promptly done; and we shall have no more complaints about not being able to get it done.

These acknowledgments are reflections upon this body, reflections upon the whole country, and reflections especially upon the employees that they are permitted to trifle with their contracts, to impose upon us a fraudulent article in paper, to execute their work in such a manner that when the documents are placed in the archives of the country they will not last perhaps ten years. These avowals are degrading to us and to the country. We ought to enforce the remedy by telling all these people, in the language of the Senator from Arkansas, You must "toe the mark;" you shall "toe the mark;" and if you do not you shall reap the consequences of your own folly and improvidence in making bids by which you cannot stand. It is manifest that it is the conduct of Congress, in endeavoring to patch up those who put in improper and fraudulent bids, that has led to the whole series of mischiefs of which complaint is now made.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. President, the Senator from Kentucky says that these are "precious confessions," which have been made on this side of the House, and that they reflect very injuriously upon members of this body. I am not responsible for the inferences which may be drawn from what he calls "confessions" on this side of the House. I have always acted upon the rule, that truth should be told, and I have told it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I thank you for it.

Mr. BORLAND. I am not responsible for the inferences which may be drawn. I based my statement upon what I know to be facts, and I will give the case to which I particularly referred at the time I made the remark. During the last Congress the public printing was let out by contract. As chairman of the Committee on Printing, I examined that contract; and my knowledge of the printing business, though not extensive or minute, was sufficient to satisfy me that the contractors had taken the public printing at prices at which, if the contract should be faithfully executed, they would lose a large amount of money. Before any of the public printing was done, I notified them that this was the opinion of the committee—I reminded them of the fact that the contractors of the preceding Congress had come before us and exhibited a loss of about twenty thousand dollars; and I knew that they (the new contractors) had taken the work at about twenty-five per cent. lower, and that it was impossible for the work to be performed according to contract without heavy loss. By authority of the committee, I accompanied this notice with the assurance, in advance, that they would be held to a faithful performance of their contract, and that no work below the contract standard would be received or paid for.

Well, the work came in; it was at first a little below the standard; it became worse; it got to be very bad; it became intolerable; I rejected it. What was the consequence? Was I sustained? In despite of my rejection of it, the work continued to be done in this inferior, this miserable style, and was sent here, and piled up in the document room, till it reached the ceiling. I was called upon every day by Senators, who requested me to receive the work. I refused. I said it was done in violation of the contract; that I could not receive it, nor approve any account for its payment. The contractor came to the Senate, and made his appeal here; and the consequence was that I was overruled; and the work was received. Senators had the documents folded and sent to their constituents. But the contractor never sent his bill to the committee while I remained in the city. He retained them till after I had left.

I was complained of, I was censured, but I stood upon the contract, and insisted upon its being executed. Senators know that. I make no random assertions. I state what is known to be true by all who were here at the time. Work of an inferior quality, not half up to the contract standard, was received. And not only was the proposition made here, but it actually passed this body, to pay the contractor a profit of ten per cent. upon the whole amount of his expenditures. That failed in the other House. But at the last session the House of Representatives passed a joint resolution, not only receiving all his work, but providing for paying him a profit of nearly two hundred thousand dollars on that work. It came to the Senate at the close of the session, and was not passed. If it had come earlier, I cannot say what would have been its fate. The resolution, as it passed the House of Representatives, allowed a profit, as I can show any one by a simple calculation, of very nearly two hundred thousand dollars on the work. Was that no censure on the Committee on Printing that had performed their duty in rejecting the work? Was it no censure on the committee to receive the work and to pay the contractor a profit in double the amount of the contract, for a violation of that contract? These are the facts to which I alluded; and they are facts which cannot be controverted. Call them "precious confessions," or what you please; let them reflect injuriously upon whom they may, I appeal to the Senate for their truth, and am not responsible for them or their consequences. I did all in my power to prevent their occurrence. Had I been sustained in that attempt, the Senate would have been spared these "confessions," and have avoided any censure they may imply.

Mr. PRATT. Mr. President, the proposition under consideration is, as I understand it, that the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives shall be substituted for the Committee on Printing, and that the same powers shall be given to the Secretary and the Clerk, which this resolution proposes to give to the committee, to make this contract. My friend from Indiana says the object of this amendment will be to put this printing out to the lowest bidder. I cannot see that that is to be the legitimate result of the amendment which has been proposed. What is to be the effect? The Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives would be directed, if this amendment should prevail, to make this contract; they would be directed to make it in the same words in which the resolution directs the committee to make it. Why, then, are we to assume that the Secretary of the Senate and Clerk of the House would let this work out to the lowest bidder, if the committee are not bound to do so? The gentleman tells us, that it is because the committee would assume responsibilities which the Secretary and Clerk would not assume. The argument of the honorable Senator from Michigan [Mr. Cass] is, that the Secretary of this body and the Clerk of the House will employ persons who are not prepared to do the work. His whole argument is predicated upon that assumption.

Mr. CASS. If the Senator will allow me, I will correct him. I meant to convey no such idea. I merely meant to say that the Secretary of this body and the Clerk of the other House might conceive it to be their business to go to every printer, and ask the lowest price at which he would do the work, and take that as a standard. That was my idea.

Mr. PRATT. The idea conveyed to my mind by the Senator's remarks was, that he supposed the Secretary and Clerk, if this matter were left to them, would employ persons who were not prepared to do the work; whilst the Committee on Printing would employ those persons who had their printing presses and paper and everything ready, prepared to go on with the work. It occurs to me, that from the very fact that the persons who would have to make the contract, if this amendment should pass, would not be willing to assume the responsibility which it is supposed the committee would be willing to assume, that they would take care to employ those who were prepared to do the work—persons who would do the work well, and who would do it at a fair price—because they would act as though they owed responsibility to the respective Houses for which they acted. On the other hand, a committee might act without any fear of that responsibility. I think, therefore, that we have every reason to suppose that, by the adoption of this amendment, the performance of the work will be better secured than if it were left to the committee.

I can see no reason why the committee should be preferred to the Secretary and Clerk, except the ground, not brought into view very directly, but certainly covered up by what has been said, that the committee might give this printing to a political press irrespective of the manner in which it is to be performed, and irrespective of the price; whilst the Secretary of this body and the Clerk of the other House, owing responsibility to their respective bodies, would be afraid to do so.

Mr. BORLAND called for the yeas and nays upon the amendment; and they were ordered.

Mr. BADGER. As the yeas and nays have been ordered on this amendment, I wish to say a few words to explain the reasons of my vote. I agree that the duty which the amendment of my friend from Arkansas proposes to impose upon the officers of the two Houses, is at once a difficult and delicate one. For myself, I should be perfectly willing that the resolution should remain in its original form; but that the honorable Senator from Arkansas, who is at the head of the Printing Committee, informs the Senate that he is not willing to take the responsibility which it is thus proposed to devolve upon him. He is not willing to become an agent for contracting to let out the work of the Senate. And when I recur to the rule of the Senate under which that committee was constituted, and find that no duty of the kind was contemplated to be imposed upon that committee; and that this resolution, in its original shape, directs this committee to perform what does not properly belong to the Senatorial duties of members of this body, I do not see how I can, with propriety, with a just regard for the motives which the Senator from Arkansas has stated, and from the circumstances of this case which entitle him to ask an exemption from having placed upon him a duty not belonging to his office as a Senator, and not belonging to the position which he occupies on the committee, refuse a vote which is to concede to him what he desires, and what I think he has a right to ask. I do not see how I can refuse to exempt him from a duty which I think the resolution cannot rightfully impose upon him and his associates of the Printing Committee. For that reason, and that reason only, I shall vote for the amendment.

Mr. GWIN. I wish to make a statement, which I think will induce the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BADGER] to change his opinion. I wish to ask this question of the Printing Committee: Suppose the present contractor fails to perform his duty, would it not then be the duty of the Printing Committee to make a contract for the printing? I so understand the law. The very duty which it is said we are now throwing upon the committee is already imposed upon them by law. They are now required, if I understand the law, in the event of the contractor failing to perform his duty, to make another contract for the Congressional printing. Then this is not a new duty which we would impose upon them. It is merely acting up to the letter and spirit of the law.

Mr. CLEMENS. I wish merely to get the statement of a fact. I understand that this matter was submitted to the Joint Committee on Printing, and that a majority of that committee overruled the Senator who has offered this amendment, and refused to accede to it.

Mr. BORLAND. The Senator from Alabama is correct. I did not offer this amendment as coming from the committee. I offered it from my own sense of propriety. Since the Senator has referred to the action of the joint committee, it will not be improper, I apprehend, to state the vote of the committee. I will state it. The joint committee, as is known to the Senate, is composed of three members of the House and three Senators. The vote was, three in favor of the resolution, two against it, and one member of the committee did not vote at all. I voted with the majority. I so voted with the express declaration, that it was for the purpose of getting the matter before the Senate, but that I would offer this amendment. If the whole of the committee had voted, I think there would have been a majority in favor of the resolution as I proposed to amend it, and that it will be so found when the vote comes to be taken here. At any rate, this amendment of mine represents the sentiments of a majority of the Senate committee.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President, I only desire to state, in addition to what has been said by the chairman of the Committee on Printing, in relation to the vote which decided this matter, that I am, myself, the individual upon that committee who withheld his vote. I withheld it for this reason: I was in favor of giving the contract to the persons named in the resolution; and so I am now; but I was not in favor of making any committee a "pack-horse" for the Senate, nor was I in favor of making any committee of Senators go out into the streets and chaffer for the Senate, while they had ministerial officers to whom those duties properly belonged. The Senator from Arkansas will recollect the fact, that I withheld my vote, not because I was opposed to the resolution, but solely because I wished this business to be done by our ministerial officers and not by the committee.

Mr. BORLAND. That is the fact.

Mr. BRIGHT. Mr. President, I certainly felt some delicacy in pressing this resolution after the Senator from Arkansas announced that he was opposed to the performance of the duties imposed by the resolution upon the committee; but since his first speech I have turned my attention to the general law under which the printing of Congress is now done, and I find that this joint resolution proposes nothing more than is now in force under a law that was passed on the 3d of August, 1846. I understand from that law that if a contractor should fail to perform the public printing, or any part of it, it is the business of the committee of the two Houses to select another agent, and make full and ample provision for the public printing. But the law does not stop there. It goes on to say, that these committees shall audit the accounts of the public printers. There is great force and propriety in that law, because the Committee on Printing in each House has been furnished with a clerk; and during the recess of the last Congress, or the Congress before the last, I am not certain which, a committee of Senators sat, and for services which they then rendered as members of the Committee on Public Printing, they received their per diem of eight dollars.

Mr. BORLAND. The statement of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. BRIGHT] has reference to a state of things which existed before I became a member of the committee or of the Senate. Prior to that time it was customary, not for the committee to remain, but for one member to remain to audit the accounts of the public printers, presented after the adjournment of the Senate. Since I have been on the committee, a different practice has prevailed. Now, instead of any member of the committee remaining to audit the printers' accounts, and drawing his per diem during that period, the Secretary of the Senate, the Clerk of the House of Representatives, and the clerk of the Committee on Printing, are constituted a board to audit and settle the accounts of the public printers during the recess. The Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House receive no extra compensation for that service; but the clerk of the Committee on Printing merely receives his per diem. That is the present state of the case.

Mr. BRIGHT. I do not understand the law, however, to have been changed since the period mentioned. The same law under which Senators and Representatives acted as a joint committee, and drew pay during vacation then, is now in force. The Senator complains of the duty which will be thrown upon the Committee on Printing. I think that the reading of the law will clearly demonstrate that we do not propose to impose any additional duty on that committee. This joint resolution will throw no additional labors on them whatever. The law of 3d of August, 1846, under which the public printing is now done, provides—

"That a committee, consisting of three members of the Senate and three members of the House of Representatives, shall be chosen by their respective Houses, which shall constitute a Committee on Printing, which shall have power to adopt such measures as may be deemed necessary to remedy any negligence or delay on the part of the contractor to execute work ordered by Congress, and to make a pro rata reduction of the compensation allowed, or to refuse the work altogether, should it be inferior to the standard."

This committee, as it is now organized under this law, has large and plenary powers. It has a right to declare a contract under that law abrogated by any non-fulfillment; and I think our committee ought to have declared the present contract void, if the character of the printing be as it is represented to be by the chairman; and I think he represents the case correctly. That, however, is perhaps outside of the question now before us.

The honorable Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BADGER] was inclined to vote against the amendment until he was convinced by the remarks of the Senator from Arkansas that this would impose additional duties upon the Committee on Printing. I have read this section of the law of 1846 for the purpose of relieving his mind, and the minds of other Senators, upon that point; for it really does impose no additional duties.

Mr. BORLAND. The Senator from Indiana, [Mr. BRIGHT,] it seems to me, must perceive a very material difference in the cases to which he has referred. In the joint resolution of 1846, from which he has read, provision is made against a contingency that is supposed not likely to happen; that in case the public printer should violate his contract, then the Committee on Printing should have power to employ somebody else to do the work and pay for it. It provides further that the public printer and his sureties shall be responsible for the difference between the contract price and the increased amount which shall be paid for the work. Such a case has not arisen since the Committee on Printing has been constituted.

There has been no case in which this duty has been performed; and although the committee might have to perform it, it is a provision against a contingency which was supposed not likely to happen, and not a prescribed duty. At the time the joint resolution passed, I suppose no one expected that the contractors would not fulfill their contracts. But here it is proposed to send the committee out beyond the walls of the Capitol to chaffer and make bargains. Nothing of the sort is done by any committee of either House. We have a Committee on Public Buildings, which takes charge of all matters relating to the public buildings; but that committee is not required to make contracts for building. There is a Commissioner of Public Buildings for that purpose. We have a Committee on the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. That committee, I suppose, audits the accounts for the fuel consumed, and the stationery used by the Senate; but do we send that committee out to contract with the wood haulers and paper makers of the country to supply the Senate? We have a Committee on Naval Affairs, but that committee does not make contracts for the building of ships of war. The Senator from California has referred to carrying the mails. The Committee on Naval Affairs pass on the policy or propriety of a particular measure, but it is not required to make contracts with persons for carrying the mails. Why, then, should we require the Committee on Printing, which was raised for the purpose of examining questions submitted to the Senate as to the propriety of printing documents, to go into market and perform a duty so different from any duty performed by other committees of the Senate? Why should you require that committee to contract with printers for doing this work? I can see no reason for it. It is without precedent. I adhere to my objections.

Mr. BADGER. Mr. President, there is nothing in the joint resolution of 1846, as I think was well stated by the Senator from Arkansas, which is at all conclusive upon the objection which he has stated, and which I was inclined to support by my vote. That joint resolution requires contracts for the printing to be made by the executive officers of the two Houses. They advertise for proposals. They receive proposals. They come to a decision. They award the contract. And then the resolution proceeds to make provision for cases, not, as some gentlemen have supposed, unlikely to happen, but I presume from the very nature of the joint resolution of 1846, to provide for a case which it was supposed would be very likely to happen; that is, a case wherein the contractor would not discharge his duty; and in such an event, it directs the Joint Committee on Printing to take such measures as should be necessary on account of the failure on the part of the contractor. They were to do what the emergency required. The law provides, that during the session of Congress, when there would be no opportunity of resorting to any other instrumentality, this joint committee should at once, and promptly, supply the means of doing the printing which the two Houses had ordered. That is, in substance, what the joint resolution of 1846 directs.

Now, it is proposed to put the Committee on Printing in a new attitude—to originate contracts and make bargains. Well, it shows, if anything were necessary to show it, how exceedingly unfortunate the joint resolution of 1846 was. It was unfortunate in many respects; unfortunate, as I think, in the whole contract system, which has produced nothing but difficulty, delay, bad paper, bad printing, and bad binding, for the Senate as well as for the House of Representatives; and unfortunate in this—a consequence flowing out of the first unfortunate step of the resolution—in introducing a joint committee of the two Houses to a function, which I believe was never before discharged by any committee. We are now to take a still further step, and put a committee of the two Houses in the attitude of making contracts and bargains. It seems to me that this is taking a step which the two Houses will find reason to repent. There is great force in the suggestion of the honorable Senator from Arkansas, that, whilst we have committees charged with a great many subjects relating to contracts, in no instance has any of these committees been charged with the making of contracts.

Mr. GWIN. Has not the Committee on the Library been required by the Senate to make a contract for the printing of the papers of Jefferson and Madison? This is a case in point. I appeal to the chairman of the Library Committee if that is not a fact.

Mr. PEARCE. The statement of the Senator is correct. The Committee on the Library were charged with the duty of attending to that matter.

Mr. BADGER. If the honorable Senator had only adverted to the facts of that case, he would have seen that it had no reference to such a one as is now under the consideration of the Senate. When the Congress of the United States purchased the papers of the distinguished dead, to whom he has alluded, it was a subject of literary taste—it was a subject of Congressional and delicate discretion that must have been exercised by the committee of our body to determine which of those papers should be printed. It was not intended by Congress that the whole of the papers indiscriminately purchased should be printed at the expense of the Government, and it necessarily and properly devolved on its committee the difficult and delicate duty of making a selection. A just regard to the interests of the public made it necessary that that matter should be under the disposal of the committee.

But I was about to say that my friend from Arkansas, in his zeal of illustration, (if he will permit me to say so,) fell into one grave error—he undertook to refer to the functions discharged by the Committee on the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. I beg him to be more cautious hereafter—he was touching a subject which should never be alluded to in open Senate. He knows very well that in one of the Departments of the Government which has charge of our external affairs, there is secret service money, and whoever heard any inquiries made with regard to that fund? The remark of the Senator was irregular. I know it was not intentional. I was once a member of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. Unfortunately for the Senate and for the country, I am no longer so. [Laughter.] But still I cherish a very high respect for the confidential operations of that committee, and I hope on no occasion hereafter to see such indiscretion committed by my friend, or by any other member of the body, as to allude to the particular functions which they discharge.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. I shall vote against the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas; but lest I should seem discourteous towards him, as the chairman of the Committee on Printing, I desire to make an explanation of the reasons which influence my vote. I think that some reform is necessary in regard to our printing. I think something should be done by which efficiency would be secured, and when we order documents, that they will be printed in some reasonable time. I have received various letters and communications from all parts of the country asking me for copies of the census returns. I received some of them so long since that I have lost or mislaid them; and I do not know that I could find them all. Now, I know, by repeated conversations with the worthy Secretary of this body, that he does not desire that this duty should be imposed upon him. I know that he has besought me, as a member of the body, to keep this duty off him.

In reply to the political argument of the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. PRATT,] I am ready to say; that so far as the bestowment of this job, or any other job which is proposed here, is concerned, I shall expect the Committee on Printing to give a preference to those of their own political faith; but I expect them to do it upon most reasonable and just terms. I believe that the Committee on Printing of this body is competent to discharge all and singular its duties; and if a comparison must be instituted between that Committee and the Secretary of the Senate or the Clerk of the House of Representatives, I believe, whether as Senators or as practical printers, I should give the committee the preference if the printing were my own or if it were to be done for the Senate. They have had experience in their station. As a member of the body, I have had something to do in retaining them in their present position for this session. I have been glad to help to replace them in the position which they have heretofore occupied. I approved of their course during the last session, and I am disposed to sustain them in this position, believing, as I do, that they are more competent as practical printers, and better judges of what is economical and proper to be done under this contract than either the Secretary of the Senate or the Clerk of the House of Representatives.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. President, I have not at all changed my views upon this subject. Before doing what I now rise to do, I wish to say a very few words. I reassert, and I do it with all candor and sincerity, that I am not competent to perform the duty which this resolution proposes to impose on me. I candidly confess that I do not know how to perform it, and I have not now time to learn. If the other members of the committee have this competency, they will have to perform the duty. If not, it will not be performed by the committee at all. Of this I now give fair notice to the Senate. I have deemed it my duty to make this statement. Whatever opinion other Senators may entertain of my competency for this business, I think I know what I am able to do; and I know that I am not competent to do this. I am not one of those who believe that a man cannot know himself. I have always thought that a man's capacity is better known to himself than to anybody else. I have looked somewhat into this matter, and I know I am not capable of performing this duty. For that reason, I do not wish to be obliged to perform it. But as I fear that my amendment may embarrass some of my friends, and as I am unwilling to impose duties on the executive officers of the two Houses of Congress which would involve them in any painful or injurious responsibility, or which their friends are unwilling that they should assume, I will withdraw the amendment which I have proposed; closing my remarks with a repetition of the assurance to the Senate that I am unable to perform the duty required by the resolution, and if it is imposed on the committee I shall not undertake it. I withdraw my amendment if it is in my power to do so.

The PRESIDENT. By unanimous consent the amendment can be withdrawn.

There being no objection, the amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. SMITH. I have some views which I desire to present to the Senate in regard to this subject, which will be very likely to occupy more time than remains at present according to the ordinary practice of the Senate. I would, therefore, be very glad to have this resolution postponed until to-morrow. I therefore move, if it meets the approbation of honorable members of the body, that the resolution be postponed until one o'clock to-morrow, and be made the special order for that time.

The motion was agreed to—ayes 22, noes 18.

ASSIGNMENT OF PRIVATE BUSINESS.

Mr. DOWNS. The bill for the relief of William Darby was under consideration yesterday, but it was then interrupted by the introduction of the distinguished stranger who then visited us. I hope it will now be disposed of. It was laid on the table yesterday on my motion. I move that it be now taken up.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair will take this occasion to call the attention of the Senate to a resolution which was adopted some time since in these words:

"Resolved, That after the 1st day of January next Fridays of each week shall be set aside for the consideration of private claims, and that on those days private bills shall have priority over all other business."

The Chair brings the subject to the consideration of the Senate in consequence of a different construction being put on this resolution as he understands by different Senators. There seems to be doubt as to whether it is intended that that day shall be exclusively set apart for private bills, and that they shall not be taken up on any other day, or whether they shall be taken up in regular order on the calendar as they are reached and yet have entire preference on Friday. The Chair is unwilling to give any construction of the resolution, inasmuch as it is for the Senate to decide what they intended when they adopted the resolution.

Mr. DOWNS. I think the Senate itself has put a construction on that rule. I recollect that a similar rule was in force two or three sessions ago, and the construction then was, that such a rule did not prevent private bills being considered when they were reached on the calendar in regular order, even though it was not on the day fixed.

I consider that the Senate has at this session put that construction on this rule, because yesterday they took up several private bills and disposed of them.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair, without consulting the Senate yesterday, finding them upon the general orders, took up several bills, which were ordered to a third reading. They have not been read a third time to-day, because the Chair kept them back until the Senate should decide whether private bills were to be acted upon on every day of the week or only on Friday.

Mr. DOWNS. It certainly was my construction, and the construction of the honorable Senator who offered the resolution, that fixing a particular day for the consideration of private bills should not deprive them of the privilege of being considered on other days when reached in their order, because it might very well happen that such a rule as that would do great injury to those whom it was intended to benefit. It very often happens that in the early part of the session we do not sit on Friday, and very often on those days private bills are necessarily interrupted by a press of other business. And if by fixing a particular day for the consideration of private bills, we cannot take them up at any other time, such a rule, instead of promoting the interests of parties, might subject them to great inconvenience.

I hope the Senate will agree with me in the construction which I have given to the rule, that when these bills are reached in their regular order in the calendar, they will be taken up as well as considered on Friday. I think that was the general understanding of the rule when it existed at previous sessions.

Mr. HUNTER. I recollect distinctly that I opposed the resolution at the time it was introduced and one of the grounds that I took was, that it would work an injury to private claimants, for it would devote Friday to them, and they would be denied a place on the calendar, which they had hitherto enjoyed. It certainly could not have been the intention of the Senate to have given private bills a precedence over public bills, not only on Fridays but on all other days. They could not have intended by setting apart a day for their consideration, that on other days they should also have precedence over bills of general interest. Under the rules of the House of Representatives, Fridays and Saturdays are set apart for the consideration of private bills, and under these rules, they are not considered on any other days. I think such is the fair consequence of the establishment of such a rule; and therefore it was that I thought at the time of the adoption of this rule, that we would be better off if we adhered to the old practice of the Senate, and stood by the calendar. We would be better off if the Senate would return to the ancient rule. I suppose the rule must be construed as it was construed in the House of Representatives. If certain days are to be assigned to private bills, they ought to be confined to those days, that we may have the rest of the week for the transaction of public business, or else let us return to the old rule, one or the other.

Mr. BADGER. There is nothing in the rule or resolution adopted by the Senate on the subject of private bills which either expresses or implies that these bills should not be in order on any other day of the week than Friday. The resolution simply declares that on Friday they shall have priority. On the other days they have no priority. There is nothing in the resolution which says they shall not be considered on any other day. There is nothing in the resolution to prevent them being considered when they are reached on the calendar—no matter on what day. This is not the first instance in which the Senate has passed the resolution setting apart Friday for the consideration of private bills. It has been done at former sessions at which I have been here, and I have never heard it suggested before that in consequence of setting apart Friday for the consideration of private bills it was not in order to take them up on any other day, when they were reached on the calendar. There is nothing in the resolution—nothing in the practice of the Senate under former resolutions of the kind which sanctions the idea that by having Friday given to private bills they lose their chance on every other day of the week.

Mr. BRADBURY. Mr. President, I voted for the rule setting apart Friday for the consideration of private bills. I believed, that by assigning a particular day for their general consideration, our attention would be drawn to those bills which were matters of private concern, and that we should be more likely to give them a careful consideration, and discriminate between those which have merit and those which have not. One difficulty which I hoped to avoid, was the constant habit of springing upon the Senate the consideration of matters about which we necessarily could know nothing. If we are repeatedly called upon, and without any indication as to the time when to consider those matters which are not of such general concern, we necessarily pass our opinion upon them without the requisite information. If, however, we set apart a day, as the Senate has already done, for their consideration, every Senator has notice that such bills are to come up. I do not say that we should be confined to that day when they are reached on the calendar in their order. I would consider them on other days; but if, after having given them priority on one day, we will now say that we are to call them up irregularly, we shall have ourselves exposed to the difficulty to which we had hoped we had put an end, by setting apart a particular day. I hope, then, that private bills will not be brought up irregularly, but that we shall consider them only when reached in their order upon the calendar, or on Friday, except some good and satisfactory reason can be given for taking up a particular bill out of order. After having given them priority on one day, they should stand on the calendar until reached in regular order on other days. I hope, therefore, the motion of the Senator from Louisiana, a gentleman whom we would all very gladly accommodate, may not prevail, unless some particular reason can be given why the bill which he proposes should be taken up.

Mr. RUSK. Mr. President, all this opposition to private bills, it seems to me, proceeds, or seems to proceed, from the principle of guarding the Treasury of the United States. We have got into difficulty by almost repudiating all the debts of this Government. This is the way that fraudulent claims pass. Individuals who have claims against the Government, come forward and present them, and are delayed in one way or another until they become twelve, fifteen, or twenty years old, and all the facts are forgotten. Then it is that claims, sometimes not well-founded, are enabled to pass the Senate and the House of Representatives, and become a charge on the Treasury.

The rule, setting apart Friday for the consideration of private bills, has been adopted several times before by the Senate. It has never before been construed to exclude bills on any other day when reached on the calendar. There seems to be a general disposition to give private bills the go-by. If we are to repudiate the debts of the Government, let us do it at once. What will be the consequence of the continuance of these claims? It will be to break up the individuals who have them, and to fill the Capitol with agents to get them through, who will annoy every Senator. It is time that we should take up these bills and dispose of them one way or the other. Let us reject or adopt them, and do it immediately, that individuals may have their claims decided while they are alive, and not leave their heirs to prosecute them when they die.

The PRESIDENT. The Senator is aware that it is simply for the Senate to decide what construction they will put on the resolution.

Mr. RUSK. That is the point to which I am trying to direct my attention.

Mr. HAMLIN. I wish to inquire whether it is the decision of the Chair that a formal motion should be submitted?

The PRESIDENT. The Chair was under the impression, though it has been stated otherwise by honorable Senators, that when a rule of this kind has prevailed heretofore, private bills were passed over on other days, and were taken up only on the day set apart for their consideration. Such was the impression of the Chair, but it is for the Senate, who adopted the resolution, to say whether it was intended that the general orders should be taken up as they stand on the calendar, whether of a public or private character; and that on Friday all questions of a public character should be excluded.

Mr. HAMLIN. I move, as the sense of the Senate, that the rule adopted by the Senate shall not affect the standing of the private bills on the calendar on other days.

Mr. BADGER. A motion is already pending.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair does not consider that a motion is necessary. He has simply endeavored to ascertain the sense of the Senate as to the construction of the resolution. He wishes to conform to the view of the Senate.

Mr. HAMLIN. I voted for that resolution. If the Chair had not called attention to the subject, I should never have dreamed that there could be any question about the matter. As has been well said by the Senator from North Carolina, what is not in the resolution does not belong to it.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair then understands that the construction put upon the resolution is, that the calendar shall be taken up in regular order, whether the bills are of a private, or public nature; and that on Friday public bills are to be excluded, and private bills solely acted upon. Is that the understanding of the Senate?

[Several Senators. "Agreed!" "Agreed!"]

The PRESIDENT. The Chair was under the impression that it was necessary to bring the question to the notice of the Senate, because some Senators had entertained a different opinion from that expressed by the honorable Senator from Maine, and the honorable Senator from North Carolina, and others.

Mr. DOWNS. One of the honorable Senators from Maine [Mr. BRADBURY] thought that we should not take up private bills out of their order. I have moved to take up this bill because yesterday being a day of ceremony it was not disposed of. It would have been passed in five minutes, but for the arrival of our distinguished guest. That is the reason why I want it taken up and disposed of now. It will take but a short time.

WILLIAM DARBY'S RELIEF BILL.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill for the relief of William Darby.

Mr. DOWNS. I concluded yesterday what I had to say in relation to this bill. It is one of very great merit. It was passed before by the Senate, and I hope we will pass it again. The gentleman for whose benefit it is intended is very old and very poor. I hope it will pass without opposition. I will not take up time by discussing it.

Mr. FELCH. I believe there was a report made in this case some two or three years ago. I recollect that last year we voted on this question by yeas and nays, and I think the Senate was very nearly equally divided. I should like to hear the report read.

The report not being on the Secretary's desk, Mr. FELCH continued: If I understand the matter, there was a report from a select committee, of which Mr. Corwin, then a member of the Senate from Ohio, was chairman. That report was acted on that session. The bill has since been twice introduced on leave, but no new facts

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

32d CONGRESS, 1st Session.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 8, 1852.

NEW SERIES.....No. 14.

have been laid before the Senate. Last year, or the year before last, the bill passed the Senate. At that time I listened to the discussion, and was unable to discover any principle ever sanctioned by this Government on which this claim could be allowed. This applicant claims that he was once employed by the Government in making certain surveys in Louisiana. He received his pay, as others do who are employed as surveyors. He claims that he acquired certain information in regard to the geographical character of that country, which information was disposed of by him to an individual named Melish, who published a map in Philadelphia about that time, and there was a difficulty between him and Melish in regard to compensation. He alleges in his petition that no compensation was ever received. But I am not aware that upon that ground there is any reason why we should interfere, and grant from the public Treasury a compensation for a loss which may have resulted from any private contract.

I do not understand that this individual was employed by the United States to acquire the information for which he now claims compensation. I do not understand that we have received anything from him for the benefit of the Government, for which compensation should be paid. He acquired certain geographical knowledge, and claims that in certain treaties—a treaty made with France, and a treaty made with Spain, in 1819, which referred to the Melish map—that map being made use of, received virtually the sanction of this Government to such an extent that his private information was not afterwards valuable to him, and that, therefore, he could not sell any maps which he might make after that period. I do not understand that he made any maps, but that he acquired information from which he might have made them; and he claims that we destroyed the value of that property, because we referred to the Melish map in the treaties made with France and Spain. That is the whole foundation of the claim.

Now, if we are to pay for information which individuals derive from their own private enterprise, and surveys for the purpose of publishing maps and literary works of any kind, I take it that we shall have plenty of persons applying to us for compensation. I do not see how the facts stated in the petition and in the report are to be a proper foundation for this claim. I looked into the report a few days since, and I do not see how, from any facts there stated, it can result as a consequence that the United States are under an obligation to pay this claim, unless we are under a general obligation, when an individual has become distinguished as a geographer, and has devoted his time and attention and talents to scientific pursuits, to come forward and pay from the Treasury on that account. I do not see why we should pay this claim in this particular case.

Mr. BADGER. I wish to ask a question of the honorable Senator from Louisiana. Has not a bill, precisely in this form, passed the Senate heretofore? I understand from him that such a bill has passed this body. I wish, then, to say, without any further investigation of the subject, that that fact determines my vote. If we undertake to investigate and reinvestigate all the private bills that come before us, we shall never be able, whatever diligence we bestow on them, to do justice to one fiftieth part of the claims which come here.

For my own part it is with extreme difficulty I can be prevailed upon to vote against a private bill which comes before us with the sanction of all the members of a committee of this body. The Senate have already determined this case. They have determined that in equity this sum is properly due to this individual. I am therefore relieved from all further difficulty. I will not go into an investigation to ascertain whether that decision of the Senate was right or wrong. I presume it was right. I am satisfied it was right. I am sure it was right.

The report of the committee upon this claim having been procured, was read to the Senate. It states that Mr. Darby was the first to furnish an accurate map of that portion of the territory of the United States lying west of the Mississippi, and bordering on the line between the United States and the Spanish dominions, as fixed by the treaty ceding Louisiana. The materials for a map procured by Mr. Darby, were used by Mr. Melish, in his map of 1816. Mr. Darby was never remunerated for his services, which were of great value to the United States. The committee consider that $1,500 was not an adequate compensation, but as his claim was not a strictly legal one, the committee have allowed this sum, thinking it might afford some small recompense to Mr. Darby.

Mr. BERRIEN. I am very desirous of voting for this bill. I know the very worthy man for whose benefit it is intended. If this Government has availed itself of his labors, it is proper that he should receive compensation for them, but I desire to be informed why it is that this claim is presented at this late day? Why it has not been presented before to the notice of this body? The Senator from Louisiana can probably give me that information.

Mr. DOWNS. I do not know any other reason than the fact that this gentleman, who is now very old, has been in previous portions of his life in a more prosperous situation, and did not feel the necessity of presenting the claim. There may be another reason. In the early history of this Government there were not very liberal appropriations made for surveys and maps. Recently the Government has been very liberal in this respect; and I think it was very natural, when Mr. Darby saw the thousands of dollars which were appropriated for the surveys in California and elsewhere, that he should think it right to come forward and claim some little compensation for much greater services, rendered at a much earlier period, in sections of the country of so much importance.

Mr. SHIELDS. I should perhaps do myself injustice if I did not say a word or two in favor of this claim. I know this old gentleman well. When I had the honor to be at the head of the land office he was one of the clerks. I examined the claim at the time, and I know it would never have been presented to Congress had it not been for his very dire necessity. I am satisfied that there is not a more worthy man presenting a claim to the Congress of the United States. I am also satisfied that he performed very great services for the country at that time, and that he even declined remuneration for them, for he was then wealthy, as has been stated by the honorable Senator from Louisiana. He was then in prosperity, and is now poor and old, feeble and disabled. I found him in office, and I was afraid then that he was not able to discharge its duties. But I retained him there, because I felt that to turn him out would be turning out an old and serviceable man, on the charity of a cold and unfeeling world. I shall vote for the claim, and shall be very sorry to see it rejected.

Mr. BRADBURY. I would gladly vote for this bill, but I cannot regard it in any other light than as a gratuity. Therefore, without going into the facts of the case I wish to record my vote against it.

The bill was reported to the Senate, and on the question of ordering it to be engrossed for a third reading,

Mr. FELCH asked for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered; and, being taken, were—yeas 29, nays 11; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Atchison, Badger, Borland, Bright, Brodhead, Clemens, Dawson, Dodge of Wisconsin, Dodge of Iowa, Douglas, Downs, Fish, Geyer, Gwin, Hamlin, Houston, James, Jones of Iowa, McKee, Miller, Morton, Pratt, Rusk, Sebastian, Seward, Shields, Smith, Spruance, and Walker—29.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Berrien, Bradbury, Felch, Hunter, Jones of Tennessee, King, Norris, Sumner, Wade, and Whitcomb—11.

BILLS PASSED.

The following engrossed bills were severally read the third time and passed:

A bill for the relief of Charles Melrose;
A bill granting a pension to Sally T. Floyd, widow of George R. C. Floyd, late a Lieutenant Colonel in the Army of the United States;

A bill for the relief of Sidney S. Allcott;

A bill for the relief of the heirs of Judith Worthen, deceased; and

A bill authorizing Victor Morass to relinquish certain lands, and to enter the same quantity elsewhere.

On motion, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, January 6, 1852.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m.
Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Mr. MORGAN.
The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

VIRGINIA MILITARY LAND WARRANTS.

Mr. MILLSON, by unanimous consent, and in pursuance of previous notice, introduced a bill making further provision for the satisfaction of Virginia military land warrants; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

RECEPTION OF LOUIS KOSSUTH.

Mr. CARTTER, from the select committee appointed to wait upon Louis Kossuth and introduce him to the House of Representatives, submitted the following report; which was read, and ordered to lie upon the table:

The committee appointed for that purpose beg leave to report, that they will be prepared to introduce Louis Kossuth to the House of Representatives on Wednesday at one o'clock, p. m.; and would recommend ceremonies similar to the action of the Senate in the same case.

Mr. HALL asked leave to make sundry reports from the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. HOUSTON objected, and called for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER stated that the regular order of business was the call of committees for reports, and thereupon proceeded to call the committees for reports.

APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. HOUSTON, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported the following bills; which were severally read a first and second time by their titles, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed, viz:

A bill making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30th, 1853;

A bill making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions for the year 1853;

A bill making appropriations for the payment of Navy pensions for the year ending 30th June, 1853; and

A bill for carrying into execution, in further part, the twelfth article of the treaty with Mexico of the 2d of February, 1848.

On motion by Mr. HOUSTON, it was Ordered, That the Committee of Ways and Means be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of John B. Rogers, and that it be referred to the Committee of Claims.

On motion by Mr. HOUSTON, it was Ordered, That the Committee of Ways and Means be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Vincent Walker and others, watchmen of the Gosport navy-yard, asking for an increase of pay; and the petition of H. W. King, clerk of the naval constructor of the Gosport navy-yard, asking increase of pay; and that they be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

PUBLIC PRINTING.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means to report to the House some papers which have been referred to that committee by the Secretary of the Treasury, that the House may take the order that it considers necessary upon the subject. There is a letter from the public printer, Mr. Hamilton, and also one from the acting Secretary of the Treasury, calling upon the Committee of Ways and Means to pay for printing the annual estimates of the Secretary of the Treasury, which were laid upon our tables some few weeks since. The Committee of Ways and Means do not conceive it to be their duty to investigate matters of printing. In the first place it seems to have been usual, as far as the committee can ascertain the facts, for the Secretary of the Treasury to pay for the printing of these annual estimates out of his own contingent fund for printing. He writes, however, that he has no fund out of which to pay it. The printer, it seems, has charged for the printing of the estimates as a job; he does not consider that it falls within the range and influence of his contract; and we were asked to make an appropriation to meet his account. We did not feel authorized to do so, for if the work went to the public printer as a part of the public printing of the House, then, in the opinion of the committee, it would fall within the range of his contract, and the rates of charge must be influenced and controlled by that contract. The matter was not, however, appropriately before the Committee of Ways and Means, nor could it be; and the committee therefore deemed it prudent to report the papers to the House, and let the House make such order as it might see fit upon the subject. I ask for the reading of the letters. I suppose that the Joint Committee on Printing would be the proper committee to which to refer them.

The letters in regard to the matter were then read.

Mr. HIBBARD moved that the papers be referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. GORMAN. It seems to me that this communication ought not to be so referred. It has been before that committee already, or at least it has been before one member of that committee. I have examined it myself, and I do not see what the Committee on Printing has to do with the auditing and settling of an account of the public printer. It seems that the Secretary of the Treasury had some printing done; the public printer presented his account to that officer for payment; the Secretary declined making the payment, alleging that he had no funds; the public printer then brought his account to me, and asked my opinion about it; and I told him—and, I believe, indorsed it on the back of the account—that, in my opinion, the Secretary of the Treasury was bound, under the law, to pay that account, or cause it to be paid. That the Committee on Printing should be compelled to make an auditor's office of itself in regard to the accounts of the public printer, is not, I apprehend, within the purview of the duties assigned to it. The Committee of Ways and Means have to devise ways and means for the payment of the debts of this nation. This matter has been referred once by the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury to that committee. It should go there now. They must find means to pay this account, if the Secretary of the Treasury has not the means of doing it. The Committee on Printing have no mode of ascertaining anything except whether the printing was done. That, I apprehend, is not in controversy. The only question in controversy is, how is the work to be paid for and the duty of ascertaining that, belongs certainly to the Committee of Ways and Means. The Committee on Printing do not want to have anything to do with the matter. It is not within the purview of the duties assigned to them. I am willing, however, to undertake any task which the House may impose upon me, and I have no doubt that I may say the same for the whole of the Committee on Printing.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GORMAN] I think misapprehends the force of my remarks. I have no doubt the House will see at once, after reading the letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, that there was a principle to settle, in connection with that account, before it could be paid by any committee. The Committee of Ways and Means did not refer it back to the House because they had not the ways and means of liquidating the debt, but because a principle was involved which they believed ought to be settled by some appropriate committee of this House before the Committee of Ways and Means should be called upon to make an appropriation.

Mr. HALL, (interrupting.) I rise to a point of order. I believe the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOUSTON] has already addressed the House once upon this subject, and according to our rules, he has no right to speak again so long as any other member wishes to speak upon the same subject.

Mr. HOUSTON. If the House do not want to hear me, of course I do not wish to press myself upon their attention.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama having once addressed the House upon this subject, is not in order, if any other gentleman wishes to speak upon the same subject.

No other gentleman having claimed the floor,

Mr. HOUSTON (resuming) said: I did not know that I was trespassing upon the patience of the House, or I should not have attempted to make any remarks upon this subject.

I was going on to say, that, in my opinion, the principle to be settled in connection with that account is one which ought to be settled by the Committee on Printing. It is their province to examine the contract with the public printer, and see whether, from the general scope and tenor of that contract, this account should not be embraced in it. If so, then the Committee on Accounts, if that is the appropriate committee, can pay it, or it may take such a direction as the House may choose to give it, that it may receive its liquidation. But unless the Committee of Ways and Means were satisfied what the proper charges were, and unless they were satisfied whether or not it should be included in the contract with the public printer, it is impossible for them intelligibly and satisfactorily to make an appropriation for its liquidation.

I am asked by some gentlemen around me how this printing has heretofore been paid for. A law was passed in 1846, providing that the Secretary of the Treasury should have prepared, printed, and laid upon the desks of the members, the first day of the session of Congress, annually, estimates of the appropriations required in that Department. The printing of those estimates has been paid for, as I understand it, out of the contingent fund of the Treasury Department, by the Secretary of the Treasury. I am not aware that it has ever before been referred to any committee of this House.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. At what rate has it been paid?

Mr. HOUSTON. I do not know what rate the Secretary of the Treasury has allowed for the work.

Mr. STEPHENS. What I wished to inquire was, whether this printing has heretofore been done at the contract, or job rates?

Mr. HOUSTON. I do not know what rates the Secretary of the Treasury has heretofore allowed. I presume, however, that it has been paid for at the job rates.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. The printing of these estimates has heretofore been done under the law of Congress requiring the Departments to have the printing done by contract. I inquired of my friend from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES,] how the work has been heretofore done, but he says he has no means of ascertaining, and I do not know.

Mr. ORR. I am under the impression that, heretofore, the estimates of the Secretary of the Treasury have been printed by a printer other than the public printer of either House of Congress. It has been included in a class known in the last Congress as "Department Printing." It was never done by the public printer.

Mr. HOUSTON. That is the point which I was endeavoring to present, that heretofore, in carrying out the law of 1846, the Secretary of the Treasury has let out this, as a part of the printing of the Department, and has paid for it out of the contingent fund of that Department; and paid for it at the rates which he pays for his other printing. I suppose he has paid for it heretofore as a job, under the contract or arrangement, such as he has made with his printer. I believe, furthermore, with the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. ORR,] that in every instance heretofore the printing of these estimates has been done by some other printer than the public printer for either House of Congress.

I have nothing to do with the contingent fund of the Secretary of the Treasury. If he has exhausted that fund improperly, it is a matter which has to come before this House, when he gives us an account of his expenditures. If then the Committees on Expenditures of the various departments of the Government see fit to take up this subject, they can give us all the information which may be desired, but until then, we have no course left but to bring the matter before the House, that it may take such direction as the House may choose to give it. For the present, I do not see how it can be disposed of otherwise than by referring it to some committee, for the purpose of settling the principle upon which the rate of compensation must be determined.

Mr. HALL. I rise for the purpose of moving the previous question. And I will say that my only object is to cut off debate. If any gentleman desires that I should make a motion to dispose of the matter, I will do it with the greatest pleasure.

Mr. FICKLIN. I would suggest to the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. HALL,] that he move to refer this matter to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instruction that they settle the principle whether or not this account should come under the contract with the public printer.

Mr. HALL. I move that this matter be referred to the Committee on the Expenditures of the Treasury Department. And upon that motion I call for the previous question.

Mr. HIBBARD. I rise to a question of order. There was already a motion pending to refer this matter to the Committee on Printing.

The SPEAKER. That motion will not be cut off by the previous question.

Mr. HIBBARD. Will not that motion take precedence?

The SPEAKER. It will take precedence.

Mr. ORR. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say—

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order pending the call for the previous question.

Mr. ORR. Then I move to lay the whole subject upon the table.

The question was put, and on division, there were—ayes 30, noes 74—no quorum voting.

Mr. CLINGMAN called for tellers; which were ordered, and Messrs. HAMILTON, and STEPHENS of Georgia, were appointed.

The question was then taken, and the tellers reported—ayes 10, noes 115.

So the motion was not agreed to, and the subject was not laid upon the table.

The previous question was then seconded, and the main question ordered to be put; which question was first on the reference of the subject to the Committee on Printing.

The question was taken, and decided in the affirmative.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York. The Committee on Commerce have instructed me to report to the House that in consequence of the large and increasing amount of business before them, they are in need of a clerk. They have, therefore, directed me to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be authorized to employ a clerk at the usual rate of compensation.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I think that it is unnecessary for that committee to have a clerk. I move, therefore, to lay the resolution upon the table.

The question was taken, and the resolution was laid upon the table—ayes 82, noes 46.

Mr. WALSH, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the petition of certain owners of the Swedish barque Ulrica, reported "a bill to admit a certain vessel to registry," which, having been read a first and second time by its title—

Mr. WALSH expressed the hope that the bill would be read through and put upon its passage. The vessel was now lying in the harbor of Charleston, ready for sea.

The bill was read through, and then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and having been engrossed, it was read a third time and passed.

On motion by Mr. HALL, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Public Lands be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of William S. Grayson and other settlers on the Maison Rouge Grant; the petition of Samuel Gladney; the petition of William B. Ross, and other citizens of Columbia county, Florida; and that they be referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

On motion by Mr. HALL, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Public Lands be discharged from the further consideration of resolutions of the public meeting of the citizens of Shelbyville, Indiana, on the subject of grants of the public lands, and against the assignment of land warrants issued under the act of September 28, 1850, and that they be referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. HALL also, from the same committee, reported "A bill in relation to a certain lot of land in the town of Gnadenhutzen, in the State of Ohio;" which, having been read a first and second time by its title, he moved that it be put on its passage.

Mr. H. said: I only wish to say in reference to this bill, that by an act of Congress in 1824, a lot of ground, about one acre in extent, was granted to this town for the purpose of a market square. The inhabitants of the town have now become so few in number that they no longer need the ground for a market square, and they ask that they may be permitted to use it for other purposes. The United States have no use for the ground at all.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and, having been engrossed, was read the third time and passed.

Mr. MOORE, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Public Lands, made an adverse report on the petition of William Fisher and Solomon Wood; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. HENN, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred House bill No. 27, to relinquish to the State of Iowa the lands reserved for salt springs therein, reported back the same to the House without amendment and with a recommendation that it do pass; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. RANTOUL, from the Committee of Claims, reported a bill for the relief of the Orange and Alexandria Railroad Company; which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. McMULLIN, from the Committee on Agriculture, reported back with an amendment the bill to encourage agriculture, commerce, manufactures, and all other branches of industry, by granting to every man who is the head of a family and a citizen of the United States, a homestead of one hundred and sixty acres of land out of the public domain, upon condition of occupancy and cultivation of the same for the period herein specified; which was read a first and second time by its title.

Mr. McM. I am instructed by the Committee on Agriculture to move that the bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, printed, and made a special order of the day for the first Tuesday of February next.

Mr. COBB. I suggest to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. McMULLIN] an amendment, that it be considered from day to day until disposed of.

Mr. McMULLIN. That is part of the instructions under which I act.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I rise to a point of order. The bill cannot be made the special order without unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. It requires a suspension of the rules. It cannot be made a special order unless by unanimous consent.

Mr. McMULLIN. I am not at liberty to depart from the instructions of the committee; but if it be the pleasure of the committee and of the House, I will move that the bill be printed and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and made a special order of the day for the first Tuesday of February next, and so continue from day to day until disposed of.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has stated that the motion to make this bill a special order cannot be entertained, it being objected to on the left of the Chair.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I understand that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] withdraws his objection, and it can be made a special order of the day by unanimous consent.

Mr. COBB. I suggest to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JOHNSON] that it should go to a Committee of the Whole House, and not to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. If it goes there we shall never hear of it again.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am in hopes the objection will be withdrawn. There will be ample time, and the bill can come up and be considered in its proper place.

Several MEMBERS. "I object."

Mr. COBB. I desire that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. McMULLIN] will consider whether the bill should not go to a Committee of the Whole. I have never known a bill considered in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union in my life.

Mr. McMULLIN. I accept of the modification of the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. COBB.]

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. If this bill be committed to either committee, it certainly should go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. It is a general bill—one not in the nature of a private claim, but proposes to dispose of a large portion of the public domain of the country; and it is one which will suggest itself to every member of the House as proper to go the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. I submit that motion.

Mr. McMULLIN. I have no authority to act for the committee, but so far as I am individually concerned as a member of the committee, and of this House, I would accept the proposition of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES.]

Mr. BROWN, of Mississippi. Before the question is taken upon the motion to print, I desire to give notice of my intention to introduce an amendment, which I ask to have included in the motion to print, that it may be printed along with the bill.

The question was then taken, and the bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed, together with the amendment offered by Mr. Brown.

Mr. BISSELL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, made an adverse report upon the memorial of James Rogers, asking compensation for the loss of a horse by his son, who was killed in Mexico; which was ordered to lie upon the table and be printed.

Mr. B. also, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of Edward Everett, late surgeon in the United States Army; which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to the Committee of the Whole House, made the order of the day for to-morrow, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WILCOX, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill entitled "An act for the relief of David C. Cash and Giles U. Ellis; which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, made the order of the day for to-morrow, and ordered to be printed."

On motion by Mr. FLORENCE, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Benjamin Holbrook, asking for a revision of the decision of the Board of Commissioners on Mexican Claims, and that the same be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

On motion by Mr. BURROWS, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the petition of Ira Baldwin, praying for the payment of a balance due him on a contract with the Navy Department, be discharged from the further consideration of the same, and that it be referred to the Committee of Claims.

On motion by Mr. MILLSON, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, to which was referred the petition of Jesse French, of Braintree, asking for a pension; and the petition of Cornelius Ziely, asking for a back pension, be discharged from the further consideration of the same; and that they be severally referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Ohio, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported a bill for the relief of John W. Robinson; which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to a committee of the Whole House, made the order of the day for to-morrow, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported bills for the relief of Gardner Herring and Silas Chapman; which were severally read a first and second time by their titles, referred to a committee of the Whole House, made the order of the day for to-morrow, and ordered to be printed.

On motion by Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which were referred the petition of John Gallagher, for an invalid pension; the petition of Alexander Estep, praying for a pension from the time he was disabled in the war of 1812, to the time he was placed on the pension list; and the petition of E. L. Gaines, praying for arrears of pension, be discharged from their further consideration, and that they be severally ordered to lie on the table to be printed.

Mr. H. also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill concerning invalid pensions, reported the same back to the House, with a recommendation that it do not pass.

He moved that it lie upon the table; which motion was agreed to.

Mr. ST. MARTIN, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported a bill for the relief of Philip Miller; which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to a committee of the Whole House, made the order of the day for to-morrow, and ordered to be printed.

Also, from the same committee, made adverse reports upon the petitions of John Concklin and Richard L. Jones, for increase of pensions; which were severally ordered to lie upon the table, and be printed.

Mr. KUHN, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, made an adverse report in the following cases; which were ordered to lie on the table and be printed, viz:

On the petition of Edward Quin for a pension;

On the petition of Mary Wright, of Conneaut, Ohio, for a pension; and

On the petition of William Batchelder for a pension.

Mr. K. also, from the same committee, reported two several bills for the relief of Albro Tripp and Joseph Johnson; which were read a first and second time by their titles, referred to Committees of the Whole House, made the order of the day for to-morrow and ordered to be printed.

Mr. EASTMAN, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported two several bills for the relief of Robert Milligin and Sylvanus Blodgett; which were read a first and second time by their titles, referred to Committees of the Whole House, made the order of the day for to-morrow, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. E. also, from the same committee, made adverse reports in the cases of Benjamin Holland, Hugh Wallace Wormly, and Mary Prettman, praying for pensions; which were severally ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. MOLONY, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, made two several adverse reports in the cases of Sarah Smith for a pension on the ground of the services of her husband, Elba Smith; and on the bill for the correction of an error in the pension of Orris Crosby; which were ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. M. also, from the same committee, reported two several bills for the relief of Amos Knapp and Artemas Conant; which were read a first and second time by their titles, referred to Committees of the Whole House, made the order of the day for to-morrow, and ordered to be printed.

On motion by Mr. M., it was Ordered, That leave be granted to withdraw the papers of James W. Low from the files of the House, for the purpose of reference in the Senate.

Mr. STUART, by unanimous consent, introduced the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee of Claims be instructed to inquire into the expediency of erecting spindles and placing buoys upon the "Muscle Ridges," on the coast of Maine; and that the said committee be authorized to take from the files of the House any papers showing the necessity of erecting spindles and placing buoys upon said Muscle Ridges.

Mr. BERNHISEL. I rise and protest against the publication by the returning officers of the United States for the Territory of Utah, on their return, in Missouri papers, and now in the New York Herald, and before it is communicated to Congress, of a report, extraordinary in its details, of high crimes and misdemeanors, and calculated, if not intended, to prejudice and render odious a distant and dependent people, and to involve them in inexplicable difficulties with the General Government. I ask for them a suspension of public opinion—of executive and legislative action—until the truth can be elicited touching the grave charges contained in an ex parte report.

Mr. CARTER. I wish to inquire of the Delegate from Utah whether he himself did not procure that publication, and cause it to be sent to the New York Herald; and whether it is not a garbled report of the Utah affairs?

Mr. BERNHISEL. I reply that I did not furnish, or cause it to be furnished.

Mr. CARTER. My information is, that the gentleman from Utah is the only person who has had access to the documents in the Department, and that there is reason to suppose that he caused the communication in the New York Herald (which is a garbling of the report) to be sent to that paper. If that is the case I should like to see an investigation had.

Mr. BELL. I ask leave to introduce a bill, of which previous notice has been given.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I insist upon going through with the call for reports.

Mr. BELL. I would not have asked leave for the purpose indicated, had I not supposed that the call upon committees had been gone through with.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I desire to propound a single question to the Chair. I want to know if there is upon the Speaker's table a communication from the President in answer to the resolutions of inquiry introduced by the gentleman from North Carolina, originating from the Committee on Territories, in relation to the matter just spoken of? If there is, I ask the unanimous consent of the House that it may be referred to the Committee on Territories, that they may get possession of the question before it is judged of by the public.

A MEMBER. Regular business is not yet through with.

The SPEAKER. There is a communication on the Speaker's table.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I will wait until we get through with the regular business.

Mr. MARSHALL, of California. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a resolution.

It was read for information by the Clerk, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Roads and Canals be instructed to inquire into the practicability and expediency of providing water by tanks, wells, or otherwise, upon the following routes to California: From Red river via El Paso del Norte, the mouth of the Gila, to Los Angeles; from Independence via the South Pass to Sacramento; from Independence, via Salt Lake and Humboldt's river, to Sacramento.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, objected.

Mr. HAMMOND, from the Committee on Engraving, made the following report, viz:

The Committee on Engraving recommend to the House the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Engraving be, and they are hereby authorized to contract for lithographing or engraving eleven (11) maps accompanying the President's message, provided the cost shall not exceed four thousand dollars; and four maps accompanying the report of the Secretary of War, showing the positions of the fortifications of the country, provided the cost shall not exceed seven hundred dollars.

And the committee further report, that there are a large number of plates accompanying the President's message, showing plans for the construction of buildings in navy-yards, and for such like purposes, which they do not propose to have published.

Mr. GORMAN moved to lay the resolution upon the table.

Mr. FOWLER demanded tellers; which were ordered, and Messrs. FOWLER and HAMMOND appointed.

The question being taken, the tellers reported—ayes 73, noes 46.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I rise to a privileged question. I voted upon the last motion under a misapprehension, and therefore move to reconsider that vote. I do not desire that it shall come up now.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky, moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table; which question was put and agreed to.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky, moved that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, for the purpose of taking up and considering the bill authorizing the Architect to continue in employment the workmen engaged on the additions to the Capitol.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. I will request my friend to withdraw that motion, until we can get off the table some Executive communications which ought to be referred. There is one I want to get myself. It will take but a few minutes.

Mr. STANTON withdrew his motion.

THE CUBAN PRISONERS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a message from the President of the United States; which was read, as follows:

To the House of Representatives:

I transmit to the House of Representatives a report of the Secretary of State, relative to the persons belonging to the expedition of Lopez, who were taken prisoners in Cuba, and afterwards sent to Spain, and who have now been pardoned and released by her Catholic Majesty. The appropriation, the expediency of which is suggested in the report, I cordially commend to the consideration of Congress, with the single additional suggestion, that to be available it should be promptly made. WASHINGTON, January 5, 1852.

[The communication from the Secretary of State covers the dispatches of the 12th ultimo, from Mr.

Barringer, the minister of the United States at Madrid, announcing the pardon and release of the prisoners taken in Cuba. It also recommends an immediate appropriation for the purpose of paying the expense which may have been, or may be incurred in administering to the necessities of those persons while in Spain, and until their return to the United States; and represents their condition as forlorn and deplorable.]

On motion by Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia, it was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

LIBRARY OF CANADIAN PARLIAMENT.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following communication from the President of the United States; which was read, viz:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

I transmit to the House of Representatives a copy of the resolution adopted by the Legislative Council of Canada, together with the copy of the note by which the resolution was communicated to this Government, expressing the satisfaction of that council at receiving intelligence of certain donations in aid of the reconstruction of the library of the Canadian Parliament. MILLARD FILLMORE.

WASHINGTON, January 2, 1852.

REPORT ON THE FINANCES.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the condition of the finances; which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Navy Department, transmitting a memorial addressed to the President of the United States by the petty officers, seamen, and marines attached to the United States squadron in the Pacific ocean, asking for increase of wages for the time they have served, and may serve faithfully in cruising in our vessels of war upon the western coast of America, and the islands adjacent. The Secretary of the Navy, in his communication, unhesitatingly recommends such additional compensation be granted to the petty officers, seamen, and marines, who served in the Pacific ocean and upon the coast of California, during the late war with Mexico, and until the present time, as Congress in its wisdom may deem just and proper. Referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Also, a communication from the Secretary of the Territory of Minnesota, (Mr. Alexander Wilkins,) transmitting, in accordance with the provisions of an act to establish the territorial government of Minnesota, a copy of the laws of Minnesota Territory, passed at the last session of its Legislative Assembly, and of a code of laws adopted at the same session.

The SPEAKER stated that he had had the communication in his possession for several days past, but as yet has not received the documents referred to.

On motion by Mr. RICHARDSON, the communication was laid upon the table.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, asked the unanimous consent of the House to take up the resolution of the gentleman from California, [Mr. MARSHALL,] to which he had objected.

There being no objection, the resolution was considered and adopted.

Mr. HASCALL asked to introduce a bill, of which previous notice had been given, authorizing the names of certain widows of revolutionary officers to be placed upon the pension roll.

Mr. CABELL, of Florida, objected.

THE CALIFORNIA MINT BILL.

Mr. MARSHALL, of California. I desire, if it is in order, and I know it used to be, to make an inquiry of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means as to the reasons why the bill has not been reported back to the House for the establishment of a branch Mint in California?

The SPEAKER. The courtesy of the House has usually allowed such interrogatories.

Mr. MARSHALL. It simply accords him a right he ought to have.

Mr. HOUSTON. In reply to the question of the gentleman from California, I have only to say, that the Committee of Ways and Means have not acted upon the subject of a Mint at California or at New York. They have not yet taken up that subject. They have been engaged with other matters for a portion of the time. Some of the committee have been out of the city, and we could not get a quorum. For the last ten or twelve days I have been unable to come either to the committee or the House; hence we have not been able to take up the subject.

MEXICAN INDEMNITY.

Mr. HOUSTON. I now move the rules be suspended, and that the House go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, for the purpose of taking up the bill reported from the Committee of Ways and Means to-day, making an appropriation to carry into execution the 12th article of the treaty with Mexico.

The question being taken, on a division there were—ayes 18, noes 28; no quorum voting.

Tellers were demanded and ordered; and Messrs. ROBBINS and CALDWELL appointed.

The question being taken, the tellers reported—ayes 102; noes not counted.

So the motion was agreed to, and the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, in the chair.)

The CHAIRMAN stated that, under the decision of the committee heretofore, the resolution of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CARTTER] comes up first as the unfinished business.

Mr. CARTTER, with the unanimous consent of the House, withdrew his motion.

THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

The CHAIRMAN stated that the next business in order was the resolution of the gentleman from Alabama proposing to refer to the standing committees the President's annual message.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky, moved that the message be laid aside.

The question was put and the motion was disagreed to.

The CHAIRMAN stated that the question immediately pending was the motion of Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York, to amend the 8th resolution, by inserting before the word "harbors" the words "rivers and."

The 8th resolution proposed to be amended was read, as follows:

8. That so much of said message as relates to commerce, the improvement of harbors, reciprocal trade between the United States and Canada, and other British possessions near our frontier, be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. ROBINSON. The House need not apprehend that it is my purpose to detain them very long. Standing, as I do, at the head of the Committee on Roads and Canals, I feel it my duty, however, to say a few words in opposition to this amendment and in reply to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. SEYMOUR,] the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, who offered it. The Committee of Ways and Means, as the House will observe, when they reported these resolutions to the committee, it was with a view of parcelling out and referring the President's message, and have referred so much of the President's message as relates to rivers to the Committee on Roads and Canals. The gentleman at the head of the Committee on Commerce desires that all that relates to the subject of rivers should go to his committee. I am aware, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. SEYMOUR] stated, that it has been the practice—an improper one, I think, however—for a very few years past, to send everything relating to rivers to the Committee on Commerce. To show that it is an improper practice, allow me to read the 98th rule:

"It shall be the duty of the Committee on Roads and Canals to take into consideration all such petitions and matters or things relating to roads and canals, and the improvement of the navigation of rivers, as shall be presented, or may come in question, and be referred to them by the House; and to report thereupon, together with such propositions relative thereto as to them shall seem expedient."

The rule in reference to the Committee on Commerce makes no reference whatever to the improvement of the navigation of rivers. The practice has grown up within a few years past, of making this Committee on Commerce a kind of reservoir, that has drawn into its vortex everything of this nature. The consequence has been, that they have reported what are termed omnibus bills like the one reported and passed by this House at its last session, and which fell in the Senate. Now, if this House, composed as it is of a very large majority of Democratic members, will carry out the principle—one of the fundamental principles of the party, as I think—and if they will undertake to break up this system of omnibus bills, they will then pursue that course of legislation which will make all those measures relating to harbors and rivers stand as much as possible each upon its own merits, so that the meritorious and unmeritorious will not be thrown together and the whole be defeated. The gentleman from New York took occasion the other day to remark, that so far as he had examined, it had been the uniform practice to refer these matters to the Committee on Commerce. In this he was mistaken, as it is a very modern practice. And if he will examine the resolutions parcelling out the President's message back seven, eight, or ten years, he will find, that no resolutions have been reported by the Committee of Ways and Means, referring the subject of the navigation of rivers to the Committee on Commerce. I say it is a new notion, grown up within the last few years, since omnibus bills have become fashionable; and since they have become so, no appropriations have been made for anything whatever. I do not recollect a single omnibus bill that has become a law, except the one under Mr. Tyler's administration, in 1843-'4, I think. There were two or three passed under Mr. Polk's administration, all of which he vetoed, and properly too. In 1831 the 98th rule of the House was inserted in your general rules, under the administration of General Jackson; and a committee was then raised with the special view of taking into custody and charge the subject of the navigation of rivers. That was the reason why the committee was raised, and it is the only important subject that is referred to them at all.

There is another view of this question, to which I wish to call the attention of gentlemen coming from the Northwest. Those of us who live in the Northwest know that it is the habit there, particularly with our political opponents, to charge upon us that while we vote large appropriations for the harbors upon the Atlantic coast, we always overlook the great West. Now, I wish to ask those who should feel an interest in the prosperity of the great West, to turn to the list of committees and see who compose the Committee on Commerce. Now, I will be the last man in the House to intimate a want of proper confidence in that committee; but committees are always raised with reference to the subjects referred to them: They are raised so as to represent the various interests involved. Let us see how many upon the Committee on Commerce come from the great Northwest, comprising thirteen States of this Union, and in which we find nearly all the great rivers of the Union. The first gentleman on the committee—its chairman—is from New York; the second from Tennessee; the third from Georgia; the fourth from Maine; the fifth from Massachusetts; the sixth from Pennsylvania; the seventh from Louisiana; the eighth from South Carolina; and the ninth from Maryland. Not a solitary man from one of the great States of the Northwest. Now, I would not have it inferred that I impute anything improper to the Speaker in the organization of this committee. I presume the Speaker followed the rule, and had it in his eye, when he appointed the committee; and seeing that the Committee on Commerce could properly have under its jurisdiction only those cases relating to our foreign commerce—there was nothing in the rules referring the subject of the navigation of rivers to them—he very properly formed the committee so as to represent the great commercial points on the sea-board. When he formed the Committee on Roads and Canals, he took gentlemen who resided, to some extent at least, upon the great rivers of the country, so as to have them represented.

I wish to note another fact here. I have stated that since this idea of making omnibus bills has become fashionable, bills of any character making appropriations for what are termed internal improvements, have generally failed. I have stated also that prior to this practice under the administration of General Jackson, when this Committee on Roads and Canals was first authorized, it was common for the western waters to get appropriations, and that bills making appropriations for these waters did not come from the Committee on Commerce, nor was it ever thought then that the power to make appropriations for purposes of this kind was to be found in that part of the Constitution which speaks of regulating commerce. If I were to look into the Constitution to seek for power upon the part of this Government to make such appropriations, that clause would be the very last to which I would refer.

I will not stop, however, to argue the constitutional question. Personally, as a matter of course, it can be of very little interest to me where this subject is referred. It will relieve me of a good deal of trouble if it goes to the Committee on Commerce. I only feel it my duty, however, to make this statement to the House, being placed in the position where I am, because I am friendly to appropriations for the improvement of the navigation of the great rivers of the country. To some extent, I say that I am friendly to such appropriations. I am not inimical to appropriations for harbors, when they come within what I deem the constitutional rule.

I warn northwestern gentlemen who feel a solicitude upon this subject, that if all these measures go to the Committee on Commerce, no bill can find its way through this House. While I would approve of a great many of the objects named in the bill of the last Congress, I will never vote for an omnibus of such a character as that one was. I promised not to detain the committee. They have the question now before them, whether they will follow the rules giving one of their standing committees jurisdiction over the subject, and which the rules say belongs to it; or whether they will allow the Committee on Commerce to usurp it.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York. I will only say a few words by way of reply to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. ROBINSON.] I think that gentleman has labored under a mistake in reference to the course of practice upon this subject. I concede that the rule to which he has alluded—the 98th rule—refers not only matters relating to roads and canals, but those which may relate to the improvement of rivers, to the Committee on Roads and Canals. I think he will look in vain, in the practice of this House, from the period when that rule was established, down to the present time, to find a single instance, when, either by a resolution of this House referring the President's message, or otherwise, the committee has had referred to it the consideration of the improvement of the rivers of the country. And I think he will also find, as a matter of fact, no such bill for the improvement of the navigation of rivers has ever emanated from the Committee on Roads and Canals. This, in my apprehension, has arisen from the very reason which was at the foundation of the committee designated now as a Committee upon Roads and Canals. If the committee will look at the facts and circumstances which attended the original organization of this committee, I think they will see a good reason which has influenced our predecessors, and which should influence this House in departing from the strict language of the rule, and adhering to the settled practice of the House upon this subject. This 98th rule, to which the gentleman has referred, the committee will see was incorporated in our rules in the year 1831, now twenty years ago. Previous to that time, and at that very session, there existed a select committee upon the subject of internal improvements. It was distinctly and emphatically an internal-improvement committee, organized and operating for the purpose of carrying out that great system of internal improvements which then occupied the public mind in this country—a system which had extended so far, that at the time when General Jackson interposed by his veto upon the Maysville road bill, there were reported ready for action by this House, bills involving the expenditure of more than $100,000,000. This system had grown up in this way. It had been fostered by the action of the Internal Improvements Committee. General Jackson's doctrine incorporated in his veto altered the course of things upon this subject, and a new doctrine was established, which was followed up by another message returning a bill which had passed Congress in the year 1832; and declaring that the true line of distinction should be, whether the works for which these appropriations were made were national or merely local in their character. At the session of 1832, for the first time, a Committee on Roads and Canals was appointed, and to that committee was referred, under the general reference of topics in the President's message, all the subjects that related to the internal improvements of the country, so that this committee was really a substitute for and incorporation of the select committee, formerly known as the Internal Improvements Committee, and occupied its place precisely, both in its character and the subjects which were referred to it. If you will take the trouble to look at the debates that occurred upon the motion to appoint this Committee on Roads and Canals, and the vote also that was first taken, you will find that the measure was sustained by the internal improvement party of this country, sustained and advocated upon this floor, and voted upon and carried by them by a majority of six votes.

I am right, therefore, in the assumption, that this Committee on Roads and Canals, in its organization, was essentially an internal improvement committee. Now, what is the reason that since the first organization of this committee by our predecessors down to the very last House that preceded us, the subject of the improvement of our large rivers—though in some cases the reference has not been specifically made on the subject—has been referred to the Committee on Commerce—to the same committee to which the subject of the improvement of harbors has been referred, and the general matters pertaining to commerce? I think it is clearly seen that it has, because the policy of this Government has changed in this respect, and we have put ourselves, since that period, upon the ground of appropriating only for national objects, and have left entirely this whole system of internal improvements, as a system, to be carried out under the auspices of the National Legislature. That being so, the Committee on Commerce has properly had under consideration all matters relating to the commerce of the country—to its foreign commerce—to the improvement, protection, and maintenance of that commerce, so far as a national legislature ought to interpose. It has been the national power that has been exerted for the purpose of supporting and sustaining the national commerce, whether that commerce shall be found upon the Atlantic coast, upon the Gulf of Mexico, the Pacific, or upon the great rivers of this country. That has been, I affirm, the settled practice of this House for the last twenty years.

Mr. CARTER. With the permission of the gentleman, I will make an inquiry. Does the gentleman understand that the structure of the committee confines it to appropriations for the improvement of harbors opening out upon foreign commerce alone? I wish to ascertain that fact, with a view to the harbors upon the lake, and of determining my vote.

Mr. SEYMOUR. I will say, in reply to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. CARTER,] that the Committee on Commerce have not as yet had this subject under consideration, for the reason that this question has been a pending question; and for another reason, also: Many of the committee have been out of town, and their opinions could not be ascertained. It would be improper in me to commit any gentleman to any precise line of action upon this subject; but as for myself, I am willing to say, that I think the true ground which should be taken by this House upon this subject, is the one which was marked out in the Maysville Veto Bill, and reaffirmed in the subsequent message of President Jackson, to which I referred.

We should report to this House, and this House should pass such a bill in relation to these works—many of which have been already fostered by Government and received very large expenditures, but now going to decay—as will sustain them. If there are new points at which the commerce of the country, in its most enlarged sense, which needs to be fostered and sustained, they should also receive proper appropriations for their protection. I am as much opposed as the gentleman who preceded me to what he terms an omnibus bill. I do not wish to be the organ of a committee, to present to this House a bill that shall not have in itself intrinsic merits—merits such as this House shall approve—such as our constituents shall approve, and upon which we can fairly stand before the country, and not by such strength as is to be derived merely from appropriations for the purpose of carrying out and subserving local interests. Thus much I feel prompted now to say.

Before I sit down I ought to advert briefly to a topic to which the gentleman has alluded, and that is, the construction of the Committee on Commerce. For my part, in relation to these matters of great national concern, I have not been disposed to scan closely the locality of gentlemen who might compose the committees. I had hoped that gentlemen who were placed upon important committees of this House would act, as I have no doubt they will, feeling that they represent every portion of this nation, so far as their action upon the committees of the House is concerned. I am not to see whether a man comes from the North or South, from the East or West, to judge of him in advance and determine whether he shall be favorable or unfavorable to any particular policy I may wish to advance by the action of a committee. I hope and believe that such will not be the judgment of this House, either as respects the Committee on Commerce or any other committee.

Let us go a little into particulars upon this subject, as the gentleman has, and denote the residences or cities from which the members of that committee have been selected. He has appealed to gentlemen from the Northwest in reference to their interests; and he said that no gentleman connected with or having any interest in the trade or commerce of that part of the country was to be found on the Committee on Commerce. If he will look at that committee, he will find a gentleman, [Mr. ST. MARTIN,] as far as his State is concerned, whose locality is at the mouth of the Mississippi river—a river upon which floats the great commerce of the West—a river upon which, and its tributaries, large appropriations are needed for the purpose of protecting that commerce. I have no doubt the interests of that quarter of the country, if they are to be represented by that gentleman, will be safe in his hands. If he will look at another State upon the western side of the mountains, he will find upon that committee the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JOHNSON,] an old and experienced member; and surely a gentleman coming from that quarter is safely to be intrusted, not only with the interests of his own State, but with all the interests that might pertain to the commerce of the great valley. He will find also another gentleman [Mr. ROBINSON,] representing the State of Pennsylvania, whose trade and commerce extend to one of the great western lakes, and finds its outlet upon the river nearest us. Finally, (and the committee will pardon me—the Speaker has been pleased to place me upon that committee. The State of New York, which I have the honor in part to represent, has an interest as deep and abiding in the source of the prosperity and trade of the great Northwest, as any State in this Union. The river upon which I reside—the Hudson river—is the great outlet of all that commerce scattered over the extreme Northwest, brought down through the Erie Canal and other avenues, and all concentrating in our great commercial emporium. It is needless—it would be improper for me to say, to what extent I would be willing to go to foster that trade. Suffice it to say, that I feel that my constituents have a deep and abiding interest in it, and as far as constitutional power will permit the House to go, in my judgment, on this subject, I shall be disposed to go for all necessary protection of that interest.

I have been constrained to go thus minutely into this matter from the course which the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON] has taken. I do not wish to detain the committee by a discussion of the vexed question of internal improvement. The whole matter will come up before the committee when a bill shall be presented. I would rather that that bill should be judged of by its own merits, than to have it forestalled here by the suspicions of any gentleman. I will merely say now, that it must be obvious to the gentlemen of the committee that this whole interest of internal improvement which relates to the commerce of the country, whether that commerce be upon the seaboard or upon the northern lakes, or upon our larger rivers, is almost identical. They are connected together, and the power that acts upon one should act upon them all. As I said when I had the honor of presenting my amendment, these improvements, in many cases, are themselves connected together. By the resolutions presented by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOUSTON] you grant power to the Committee on Commerce to report appropriations for harbors, and you grant to another committee—the Committee on Roads and Canals—power to report appropriations for rivers that enter into those harbors, when the very constructions, in many instances, which you propose to erect for the protection of your commerce, are connected together.

The experience of our legislation for twenty years past has sanctioned the reference of this whole subject to the Committee on Commerce, as the appropriate power that should act upon it; and I hope that the practice, thus uniformly followed, will be adhered to by this House. The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, of the last House, reported a resolution similar to this, separating the improvement of rivers from the improvement of harbors, and referring the former to the Committee on Roads and Canals, and the latter to the Committee on Commerce. After discussion, that resolution was negatived, and the whole subject sent to the Committee on Commerce. That is the most recent action upon the subject, and I hope that the example of our predecessors will be followed by this House.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I have heard no good reason assigned, in the course of this discussion, why this subject of the improvement of rivers should be taken from the Committee on Roads and Canals and sent to the Committee on Commerce. Two reasons have been given: one relates to the policy and the constitutional right of Congress to make these appropriations, and the other to the necessary connection existing between the two subjects—the improvement of rivers and the improvement of harbors. The policy of these appropriations for the improvement of rivers and harbors, and the constitutional right to make them, are questions to be discussed when the bill is reported to the House. But to say that those are appropriate considerations in deciding to which committee the subject shall go, is assuming a knowledge on the part of the House, of the feelings and opinions of the committees, which I think ought not to be assumed.

My colleague [Mr. SEYMOUR] says that rivers and harbors have a necessary connection, and relate to the commerce of the country. I would ask what thing is not connected with commerce? Is a river or harbor necessarily more connected with the subject of commerce, than agriculture is? Without exports, you cannot have commerce, and without grain and other produce, you cannot have exports. Is it any more connected with commerce than naval architecture is? Without ships, you cannot have commerce. Is it any more connected with it than astronomy? You cannot navigate a ship without the north star. Is it any more connected with it than electricity and magnetism? You must have a compass.

Why, according to that argument, the Committee on Commerce might claim that all matters and subjects relating to the arts and sciences, should be referred to them. I am myself a member of the Committee on Roads and Canals, but I am not so extravagantly fond of cold water, as to desire to have jurisdiction not only over rivers and canals, but also over the ocean. For myself, I would quite as lief get rid of the labor of taking up this subject, which will probably be a very laborious one, but I have had the pleasure of meeting our committee once or twice, and have a very high respect for our chairman. I know his intelligence and ability to take charge of this subject, and as the rules expressly assign this duty to us, I hold that it should be so referred.

Now I have had no experience in legislation, but permit me to ask whether—even if the precedents to which the gentleman has referred do exist—the practice of three or four sessions is to override the rules of the House, one of which expressly says that it shall be the duty of the Committee on Roads and Canals to take this subject into consideration.

There is another reason why this amendment ought not to prevail, and I mention it with all possible respect to the chairman of the Committee on Commerce. But I say that when the chairman of a committee appeals to this House, to refer to that committee a subject which is not before them, it is presumptive evidence that the subject ought not to be committed to them. Why? Because the very anxiety to get hold of the subject authorizes the presumption, that there is an opinion already formed; and certainly it is for the good of the country, that subjects should be referred to committees who, when they take hold of them, are entirely impartial and unbiased.

But I have yet another reason for opposing this amendment. I have a great respect for the Speaker of this House; and when he appointed these committees he had the rules before him, and knew the duties assigned to the different committees by these rules. And why did he put me on the Committee on Roads and Canals, and my colleague on the Committee on Commerce? Not certainly because, being taller than my colleague, I could perhaps touch bottom in the ocean as well as in the shallow rivers better than he could; for, as the poet says:

"The mind's the stature of the man."

When the Speaker appointed these committees, he inquired not only with regard to the general standing of gentlemen, but also as to their intellectual stature. I have no doubt, that in compliment to the high intellect of my colleague, [Mr. SEYMOUR,] he gave him the broad ocean, the great ships, the great steamers, and the whole commerce of the country, whilst he gave to me and my colleagues on the committee—being men of less intellectual stature—the shallow rivers and the little muddy canals. And we want to show that it is not too much for us. I express no opinion whatever, one way or the other, about the doctrine of internal improvements. My opinions on that subject are known, I believe, to no human being here. I have no personal feeling upon this subject, and should be glad to accommodate my colleague; but I have made these remarks because it is the desire of the respected chairman of the Committee on Roads and Canals, that this subject should be referred to that committee.

Mr. HOUSTON. I do not intend to occupy the committee long, and I am not going into a discussion of the amendment of the gentleman from New York. The rule has been read, and that is sufficient justification for me and for the resolutions which I had the honor to submit, proposing to distribute the President's message. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SEYMOUR] says that a like thing was done at the last session of Congress, and that the House overruled the then chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means by amending his resolution in reference to this subject, which was similar to that which I have offered. Well, sir, the House can give any direction they see fit to this subject, but I conceive that in submitting these resolutions for the action of this committee, I had no discretion at all in the matter. I am bound by the rules of the House which have been adopted for our government, and one of those rules expressly says that this subject shall go to the Committee on Roads and Canals. I have proposed, therefore, to give it that direction. If this committee shall see fit to overrule that rule of the House—if it shall see fit to adhere to its practice instead of to its rules, I shall be perfectly content that the subject should be referred to either committee. My main purpose in addressing the committee now is to call their attention to another subject which is pressing upon Congress for early action. I hope that the committee will vote upon the resolutions which I have submitted, and let us then pass on to a bill upon which the President has urged us in his message to take early action. I allude to the bill which I had the honor to report this morning, making an appropriation for the purpose of carrying out the twelfth article of the treaty between the United States and Mexico.

Mr. STUART, (interposing.) If the gentleman will allow me, I would suggest, that as there are several topics connected with the message that will probably give rise to considerable discussion, it would perhaps be better to lay aside these resolutions for the present, and proceed to the consideration of the bill to which he has referred.

Mr. HOUSTON. I have no hesitation in doing that, if it be true, as indicated, that an extended debate will be likely to grow out of it. I do hope that the message may be referred, and that we may come to this subject at once.

A MEMBER. We cannot get through with it to-day.

Mr. HOUSTON. Then I find myself in a very unpleasant situation in regard to this matter. We are called upon very urgently to take up the Mexican indemnity bill and pass it. I am satisfied that it ought to be taken up. I am satisfied that this bill appeals to this House for its early action. I therefore move that this subject be laid aside, with a view of reaching it.

Mr. GIDDINGS. Will the honorable chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means inform me at what time that Mexican indemnity will fall due?

Mr. HOUSTON. It will become due the 30th of May, 1852.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I understand it will become due the 1st of May, 1853. So it seems we are called on thus urgently to legislate for May, 1853!

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman is mistaken. The indemnity becomes due in 1852. I am sure I am right in this matter. If the gentleman from Ohio chooses to do so, he can examine the documents.

Mr. GIDDINGS. If the gentleman will permit me, I will say that I do not assert it as certain; but I am very certain that we legislated for the payment of the installment due next May, near the close of the last session of Congress. If this is so, the payment for which we are now urged to legislate will not fall due till the 30th of May, 1853. I am sure of that.

Mr. HOUSTON. If the message of the President is on the Clerk's table, I must ask that he will read that part of it which refers to this subject. But I know the fact, which I have stated, to be true. I know that there was no law passed the last session of Congress. There was a bill before the House during the last session of Congress, but it failed to become a law. By reference to the treaty, you will find that the last installment becomes due 30th May, 1852, and no payment is to be made in 1853.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman move to lay the resolutions before the committee aside?

Mr. HOUSTON. I do make that motion.

Mr. GIDDINGS. If the gentleman will permit me, I understand that the bill, to which I have alluded, passed the House during the last session, but failed to become a law.

Mr. HOUSTON. It is very necessary that we should legislate upon this subject as soon as possible. By our treaty stipulations, we are to make negotiations for $3,180,000, to be paid in the city of Mexico by the first of May, 1852. I think the time is already too short. I regret that the proper legislation was not had the last session. I therefore move that this resolution be laid aside.

The question was then put, and upon division there were—ayes 95, noes 17; no quorum.

Tellers were demanded and ordered; and Messrs. PENN and BRECKENRIDGE were appointed.

The question was again taken, and the tellers reported—ayes 113, noes not counted.

So the resolution was laid aside.

WORKMEN ON THE CAPITOL.

The CHAIRMAN stated the next business in order to be a joint resolution providing for continuing in employment the workmen engaged upon the extension of the Capitol.

Mr. HOUSTON moved to lay it aside.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman allow me to say a single word? I think there was, at least, an implied understanding that this business—

The CHAIRMAN. No debate is in order.

The question was then taken, and the bill was ordered to be laid aside—ayes 72, noes 47.

Mr. HOUSTON. Is it competent for me to move to lay aside all business which takes precedence of that relating to the Mexican indemnity?

The CHAIRMAN. Not except by unanimous consent.

No objection was made, and the committee proceeded to take up and consider the bill to provide for carrying into execution, in further part, the 12th article of the treaty concluded with Mexico at Gaudalupe Hidalgo.

Cries of "Read the bill!"

The bill was then read.

Mr. HOUSTON. I do not know that any explanation of this bill is necessary. I will say, however, that, as the reading of the bill has indicated, its object is to carry into effect the stipulations of the treaty between Mexico and the United States, by which the United States agreed to pay Mexico $15,000,000. Three millions was paid upon the ratification of the treaty, and the remaining $12,000,000 was to be paid in installments of $3,000,000, annually. According to the provisions of the treaty each installment carried with it the interest on the whole amount then due. The first installment which was paid at the expiration of twelve months after the ratification of the treaty was $3,720,000 according to the provisions of the treaty, it being $3,000,000, and six per cent. upon the whole $12,000,000 then due. The second payment was $3,000,000, and the interest upon $9,000,000 for twelve months at six per cent. In that way payments have been made until the last installment, which falls due the 30th of May, 1852, with the interest upon that amount for twelve months. That is the reason why the appropriation is for $3,180,000. The $180,000 is the twelve months interest at six per cent. upon that $3,000,000. The committee, I have no doubt, are just as familiar with the whole legislation that has occurred upon that subject, and of the provisions of the treaty, as I am, or as I can make them. This is one obligation growing out of the twelfth article of the treaty, in which we have stipulated and pledged our faith as a nation, that we will at certain periods pay certain sums of money to Mexico, upon the ratification of that treaty.

Mr. McMULLIN. I desire to know of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means how this indemnity is to be paid, and to whom it is to be paid? I remember that during the last Congress a payment was made to Mexico through a certain house, while there was a proposition submitted—informally, I admit—by which the Government would have saved from sixty to eighty thousand dollars. My object now is to ascertain from the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, by whom this money is to be paid—by what house, or by what concern?

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, I am unable to answer the question of my friend from Virginia, for the very good reason that I consider that it is a subject with which this House and committee have nothing to do. We are required—

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia, (interposing.) If the gentleman from Alabama will allow me, I will take the liberty of answering the question myself. I will not consume the time of the House now, but I wish to say that my colleague is entirely mistaken in the remark he made, that a proposition was rejected here which would have saved the Government a cent.

Mr. McMULLIN. I did not say the proposition was rejected here.

Mr. BAYLY. It was the proposition of Duff Green to pay three millions and a quarter of dollars, and in that proposition he offered to do it for one half of one per centum less than anybody else. The Committee of Ways and Means did not believe that Duff Green was the man to pay three and a quarter millions of dollars in the State of Mexico.

Mr. McMULLIN. I did not state that the proposition had been rejected. I stated that I understood there was a house, or an agent, who would have negotiated this payment, and by that negotiation the Government would have saved sixty or eighty thousand dollars; and I understood a house in this city proposed that the Government should not advance anything until they had absolutely paid over the last dollar required by the stipulation, and should show to the Government sufficient vouchers from Mexico that the payment had been made. My object now in calling the attention of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means to this subject is, that if we can save sixty or eighty thousand dollars by requiring the payment to be made through some other house than that of Corcoran & Riggs, I desire the attention of the House to be called to the fact, with a view of saving that vast amount of money, and I hope the chairman of that committee will give this important view of the subject his special attention.

Mr. HOUSTON. I have nothing to do with what was done by the Committee of Ways and Means or by the House, at the last session of Congress. My opinion is, however, that the Committee of Ways and Means of the last Congress, if I understand their action, acted as the Committee of Ways and Means at this session have done and propose to do—and as a matter of course I believe it to be right.

It is not our province, Mr. Chairman, to receive propositions from Corcoran & Riggs, or Duff Green, or anybody else, as to the mode of paying this installment. We are called upon to appropriate the money, but the responsibility rests with the Government of the United States—the present Administration—for its faithful and efficient and proper payment. We are not called upon to take from the President his responsibility. We have ours, which is to make the appropriation, and when we shall have completed our labors, the matter rests with him. If he sees fit to make any negotiation by which the Government loses, that is a matter between him and Congress and the country. His is the responsibility and not ours. It is not our province, as I conceive, to introduce a provision into this bill by which we should direct the manner or the agency through which that money should be paid to Mexico, because by so doing we should, at once, involve ourselves in all the difficulties and troubles which may grow out of it. By so doing we should make ourselves responsible for any loss or miscarriage that might occur, and relieve the President entirely of his responsibility in the discharge of his duties upon this important question. I believe that it is a matter entirely foreign to our examination and inquiry here. The question presented for the consideration of this committee is, in the first place, the amount of money due; and if it be determined that it is due, then what is the usual mode of action on the part of Congress to secure its payment. Why, Congress does not carry on the negotiation, we do not appoint an agent, we do not say how it shall be paid, but simply put the money at the disposal of the Administration, and then the power, the duty, the responsibility all rests with them, and not with us.

There seems to be no difficulty, Mr. Chairman, unless it may be one which I have endeavored to show is foreign to our inquiry, and which I hope will be kept out of this discussion entirely.

Cries, "Question!" "Question!"

Mr. BAYLY of Virginia. I have no disposition to say anything upon this subject, if there is a disposition to pass this bill.

Cries, "Let us pass the bill!" "Let us pass the bill!"

Mr. KING, of New York. There is a point in controversy, as to the expense of making the payment of the last installment to Mexico. It is charged that the expense was increased by making the payment through the Secretary of State, instead of the Secretary of the Treasury, and it is upon that point that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BAYLY] proposes to make an explanation, as chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means of the last Congress.

Mr. McMULLIN. I hope my colleague will postpone his remarks until morning. It is getting late, and I should like to have time to look into this measure.

Mr. BAYLY. I have but one objection to this, and it is, that I dislike to have a speech upon my mind worse than anything else in the world.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman must perceive the great difficulty in reaching this bill in the morning. We shall then have to go through half a dozen other matters to get at it again.

Mr. BAYLY. I think the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means is right. I think this bill should pass to-day. I will, in a few words, explain precisely the action of the Committee of Ways and Means of the last Congress upon this subject. In the first place that committee, at the last Congress, came to the same conclusion unanimously which it has come to at this; and that is that the payment of this indemnity was an executive and not a legislative duty. We were then of opinion that when Congress had appropriated the money to make this payment, our functions were at an end, and that the payment of this money was an executive duty.

We believed, as the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means has informed us that the present committee believe, that we ought not to take the responsibility of managing the mode of this payment, when we could not have any control over it. We did not think it was expedient for this House to assume a responsibility when it would have no control of the subject. Well, sir, for these reasons we reported a bill, which was precisely the bill now before us, with the exception of the sum appropriated. There were a parcel of speculators here, who put out pamphlets in reference to this matter, filled with misstatements. They succeeded in making an impression upon members of this House, and when we got before it we had a very long debate, which is reported in the Congressional Globe.

Amongst other points which were made was the point to which the gentleman from New York [Mr. KING] has referred—that the payment of this indemnity, which under Mr. Polk's administration had been made by the Secretary of the Treasury, had been taken by General Taylor's administration from the Secretary of the Treasury and conferred upon the Secretary of State. I informed the House at the last Congress of the reasons of this transfer: So far from either of these officers desiring to have the charge of this payment, Mr. Meredith, at that time Secretary of the Treasury, insisted that it belonged to Mr. Clayton, and Mr. Clayton insisted that it belonged to the Secretary of the Treasury, each one wishing to escape the trouble and calumny they knew they would involve themselves in making this payment. The officer to make the arrangement was made, as I was authorized to state upon this floor, a matter of Cabinet consultation; when the Cabinet of General Taylor decided, that inasmuch as it referred to our foreign relations; as it was a matter connected with a foreign nation, it properly belonged to the State Department, and not to the Treasury; that although it was a payment of a sum of money, yet if the Secretary of the Treasury had the management of the matter, he must have communicated through the Secretary of State, because he was the one that conducts all business with foreign nations. These were the reasons that induced the Cabinet of General Taylor to decide that the State Department was the one to make this negotiation.

Well, sir, General Taylor died. The present Administration came in when the affair stood in that plight, and Mr. Fillmore's administration determined to carry out, or rather to adhere to, the decision which General Taylor's administration had made, and Mr. Webster made a contract with Messrs. Corcoran & Riggs, Howland & Aspinwall, and Baring Brothers, to make this payment. They agreed to give three and a half per cent. to the Government for the privilege of making it. The proposition which was made by Green and his associates was to give four per cent. The debate upon that matter—I have not recurred to it, as I did not anticipate that this bill would be brought up to-day—but the debate will show that I demonstrated upon that occasion that the proposition of Corcoran & Riggs was the better proposition for this Government of the two in a pecuniary point of view, even supposing that Duff Green and his associates had been the proper persons to intrust with this business.

But I was authorized by Mr. Webster to say, that no matter what had been offered by Green and his associates—if it had been twenty per cent.—he should not have contracted with them in reference to the subject. I showed, too, that the arrangement the Administration made was, at least, as good a one as that of Mr. Walker's; and I believe, after a thorough investigation of the whole subject, that the conduct of the Administration in this matter had been fair—that there had been nothing exceptionable in it. That was the unanimous opinion of the Committee of Ways and Means. The matter was discussed in this House for several days, and the Committee of Ways and Means were sustained by a vote, I think, of two or three to one. The bill was carried to the Senate, where this whole discussion was renewed, and after full debate there, the bill which we sent there from this House was passed by an overwhelming majority. For the part I acted upon that occasion, in sustaining an arrangement which I thought was a judicious one, for reasons I have assigned at length in the debates at the last Congress, I have paid the usual penalty. A little sheet published in this city—The Telegraph—edited by one of the disappointed contractors, (Duff Green,) has been maligning and traducing me from that time to the present moment. I will tell my friend from Alabama [Mr. Houston] that he has not a conception of the number of insidious enemies he will have at the end of this Congress; for every man who has a scheme to plunder the Treasury—which it will be his duty to defeat—will recollect it as long as he lives, and they will use every opportunity of making him feel, as far as they can do, that it is remembered. But they will conceal the ground of their enmity. This is not the only case. I have referred to it especially, because I notice that some of the papers, from whom better things might be expected, copy these attacks, without knowing the source whence they emanate. This is not the only case I have traced to the manner in which I discharged my duty as chairman of that committee at the last Congress, of the most inveterate enmity any man ever had to encounter. I do not wish to go into this matter. If there is any gentleman who wishes to be informed on anything connected with the conduct of the committee at the last session, I am prepared to inform him. It was precisely that of the Committee of Ways and Means this session.

Mr. HIBBARD. One word upon this subject, and but a word. I concur fully with what has been said by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means [Mr. Houston] and the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. Bayly], with regard to the expediency of this House taking into consideration offers that any individual or firm may make for the payment of this money. It is with the Executive power solely and particularly. It belongs to them by law; and the responsibility is with them. If they do wrong, with them is the blame. There is no good reason, in my mind, for our entering into the consideration of the offers individuals may make, or may have made. Now, as to the history of the transactions in this House at the last session with regard to the same bill. I understand the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Bayly] to say there was an offer from Duff Green to negotiate the payment of this indemnity at one half per cent. less than those made by others. It was disregarded, as I understand the then chairman, by the Committee of Ways and Means, and by the House. Their action was based upon two grounds: one was, which has been referred to here, that it was not a matter properly coming within their jurisdiction; and another very good ground was, the general apprehension that it was not a responsible offer—a statement which, probably, might with safety be made. There was, however, another proposition made before the House and before the Committee of the Whole, by the firm of Rothschild, through their agent, Mr. Belmont, of New York, to negotiate the payment of this same installment at a rate materially less than that offered by the house of Barings—for it was virtually by the Barings, though I do not know in what name it was made—one half per cent. less. I think the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Bayly] will concur with me in this; and allow me to say, Mr. Chairman, that some proposition from the Rothschilds, through an agent authorized by them, to the Department of State, appeared before the Committee of Ways and Means, and I think before the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BAYLY. With the gentleman's permission. The offer of the Rothschilds, as I have shown on the occasion of the debate at the last session, was one that was inadmissible, inasmuch as it conflicted with the treaty. The debate will show it. I know the fact, that I satisfied the House they could not accept that offer without the negotiation of a new treaty.

Mr. HIBBARD. I do not make these statements with any view of expressing a different opinion touching the propriety of the action of the House. Thus much, I think, was apparent, that if the committee, or the House, had accepted the offer of the Rothschilds, the responsibility would have been upon the House, had there been any miscarriage. I do think such was the responsibility of the firm of Rothschilds, that no danger could have been incurred by the Department, had they accepted the offer of that house. I agreed in the conclusion the House came to, that it was inexpedient for the House to listen to the propositions. I was not so clearly satisfied as was the distinguished gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. Bayly], as to the propriety of the action of the Department upon that question. I was not satisfied that the Department of State could not with safety and with propriety have accepted the offer of the Rothschilds, because it was the first banking-house in the world—as responsible surely as that of the house of the Barings. I thought then, and I think now, that the offer might have been accepted without any additional increase of liability. I will not take up time with going into my reasons for that belief. I was a member of the Committee of Ways and Means, at the last session, and I was not satisfied that the action of the Department was clear upon this subject. It may have been as the gentleman from Virginia states. If it was so, well; but if there was fault—if there was blame—if there was an offer equally responsible that might have been accepted, saving to the Union from sixty to one hundred thousand dollars in the negotiation for the payment of the installment, let the responsibility lie at the door where it belongs: at that of the Department of State and the Administration. I repeat, that I am not in favor of the House taking into consideration these negotiations for payment which do not belong to them. The rules prescribe our duties, and if we enter into the consideration of the subject, we should transcend our duties. I hope the bill will pass as it now is, and with these remarks I take my seat.

Mr. McMULLIN. I did not expect when I propounded the interrogatory to the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. Houston], that it would lead to this debate. I am now satisfied that the House ought to take a little more time for deliberation before they pass this bill. This bill was reported to-day, and I believe it has not been usual to pass bills through the House upon the same day they are introduced. There is ample time for the House to give it that consideration which its importance demands. I am inclined to the position assumed by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, [Mr. Houston], my colleague, [Mr. Bayly], and the gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. Hibbard], that the provision for the payment of this money belongs to the Executive Department. It is true there has been a loss to the Government in the payment of the last installment of the indemnity of some sixty or eighty thousand of dollars. I ask of this House whether it is not worth while to stop and pause a moment to look into this matter. I tell the House and the country I am informed—not by a published pamphlet—directly by a gentleman, that he would engage the payment of the installment at one half per cent. less than it was negotiated by the Executive and the Secretary of State.

Mr. BOCOCK. I think it is perfectly evident this subject cannot be completed to-day, and with the consent of my colleague I will move that the committee rise.

The question was put and agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the Chairman [Mr. Jones] reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the state of the Union generally, and particularly House bill No. 46, providing for carrying into execution in further part the 12th article of the treaty concluded with Mexico at Guadalupe Hidalgo, but had come to no conclusion thereon.

On motion by Mr. BRIGGS, the House then adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, January 7, 1852.

Prayer by the Rev. L. F. MORGAN.

PETITIONS.

Mr. WADE presented the memorial of Daniel Slack, representing that there is a variance between the awards made on his claim by the two Boards of Commissioners for the settlement of claims of American citizens against Mexico, and asking the payment of the difference of awards.

Also, one of a similar character from Johnson H. Alford, by his administrator Henry P. Bates; both of which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. GEYER presented the memorial of Mary S. Wetmore, widow of the late Major Alphonso Wetmore, of the United States Army, praying a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. G. I present the petition of Richard B. Lee, an officer in the Army, praying to be allowed the amount of public funds stolen from him, and which he repaid to the United States.

The memorialist states that he was ordered by the commander to proceed to the Sandwich Islands and purchase supplies for that portion of the army which was in California and Oregon; that on his return he employed a vessel which was chartered by an individual who was in control of it. He further states that he deposited eleven hundred dollars with the charterer, and took a bill of lading. On his arrival at San Francisco, this money had been taken on shore and deposited with some merchants there. It appears, however, that this money was appropriated to the payment of the debts of this individual. He absconded, was pursued, overtaken, and searched, but no money was found. The major being without remedy against the general orders, sought relief by attaching the vessel, in which, however, he failed, this being before the admission of California as a State, and there being no tribunal there by which a specific remedy against the vessel could be enforced. Under these circumstances he felt obliged to make good the money; and he now prays the action of Congress for his relief. I move the reference of the memorial and the accompanying documents to the Committee of Claims.

The memorial was so referred.

Mr. SUMNER presented the petition of citizens of Boston, Massachusetts, praying that the expenses incurred by American contributors at the World's Fair in London may be defrayed by Congress; which was referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. BRODHEAD presented the memorial of Benjamin Holbrook, and the memorial of Charlotte B. Holtz, administratrix of Peter Holtz, praying the appointment of a Board to review the decision of the late Board of Commissioners for settling claims against Mexico; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. RUSK presented the petition of Charles Uhde & Co., praying the return of duties paid on certain cotton goods shipped by them at New Orleans for Point Isabel, in Texas, and lost at sea; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. FISH presented the memorial of the heirs of Charles Oakley, praying compensation for the services of said Oakley in the revolutionary war; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Also, a memorial of the heirs of Jacob Latting, praying indemnity for spoiliations by the French prior to 1801; which was referred to the select committee appointed on the subject.

Also, a letter from the Mayor of the city of New York, communicating a resolution of the Board of Aldermen and Assistants, tendering to the United States a plat of land within that city for the erection of a Mint; which was referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DOWNS presented a petition of citizens of Caldwell Parish, Louisiana, residing on the "Maison Rouge Grant," praying an amendment of the late act of Congress for the relief of purchasers of land in that grant: which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Also, the petition of Evariste Blanc, praying the confirmation of his title to a certain tract of land; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. GWIN presented the memorial of L. M. Goldsborough, S. J. Van Brunt, and S. F. Blunt, naval officers, praying additional compensation for services on special duty to California and Oregon; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. SEBASTIAN presented a memorial of the First Christian and Orchard Parties of Oneida Indians, asking interest on certain moneys improperly withheld from them after the same became due; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

CUBAN EXPATRIATED INVADERS.

Mr. CLEMENS. Mr. President, I desire to present a petition, which I will ask the Secretary to read.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

To the President and members of the Senate, and the Speaker and members of the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States:

GENTLEMEN: Your petitioner, a resident citizen of the city of New Orleans, in the State of Louisiana, most respectfully begs leave to represent, that, on the 3d day of August last, he, in company with 434 associates, embarked on board the steamship Pampero, for the Island of Cuba, with the only and openly avowed intention of joining the Creole population for the purpose, and that alone, of aiding and assisting them in the contest which we were fully convinced had then commenced for the overthrow of the Spanish authorities there, and the establishing in their stead republican institutions similar in all respects to those governing our own highly-favored and prosperous country; and in furtherance of their wishes, a debarkation of our force was effected on the Island on the night of the 11th and 12th of the same month, between the hours of 11 and 2 o'clock; but, after undergoing privations and hardships well calculated to appal as well as to demoralize the stoutest and purest heart, without the commission of a single outrage either public or private which can cause the blush of shame to mantle the cheek, or the breath of detraction to justly sully the soldier's escutcheon with the taint of dishonor, and the having been engaged in several very hotly contested battles with her Spanish Majesty's troops, your petitioner, with the entire force under his command, was entirely cut to pieces, or dispersed, rendered fugitive and finally captured and conveyed to Havana as prisoners, where 160 to 175 of the number were, by order of his Excellency the Captain General, Concha, condemned as public malefactors to ten years' servitude in the fortress of Cento, and were by him sent to Spain to undergo the infliction of the punishment decreed; but, through the exercise of the high prerogative of the pardoning power vested in her hand, her Catholic Majesty, the Queen of Spain, has deemed it both merciful, politic, and wise, to commute the sentence of punishment, to knock the shackles from the bound, and to set the prisoners free.

Therefore, with a full knowledge of the destitute situation of these brave and gallant, but unfortunate men, (the most of whom are known to be gentlemen in their own individual personal right, and of highly reputable relationship in the United States,) and in view of that devotion to liberal republican principles by them herein exhibited, and of the action of your honorable bodies in behalf of refugees driven from their homes on the continent of Europe in consequence of similar espousals of the cause of liberty, your petitioner does most earnestly and urgently pray the taking such immediate steps by your honorable bodies as will authorize and command the Executive head of the nation to furnish a vessel with all necessary supplies for the transportation, in comfort and health, of these pardoned and released soldiers of liberty's army back to the shores of their own free and happy land; for which your petitioner in all good faith, must ever pray. WM. SCOTT HAYNES.

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 5, 1852.

On motion of Mr. CLEMENS, the memorial was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

RECONSIDERATION OF VOTE.

Mr. BRIGHT. Yesterday the Senate passed a bill entitled "An act granting a pension to Sally T. Floyd, widow of Lieutenant George R. C. Floyd." I see that the bill was introduced by the honorable Senator from Kentucky [Mr. UNDERWOOD.] As a general rule, I should defer greatly to his judgment in such matters, but on looking over the papers of this morning, particularly with reference to this bill, I find that it contains what I consider a dangerous principle—the granting of a pension to the widow of an officer who died outside of the service. I desire to move the reconsideration of the vote by which this bill was passed; and as I observe that the Senator is not in his seat, I will make the motion, and consent that it lie on the table till I may have an opportunity to examine the papers relating to the subject.

The motion was accordingly laid on the table.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion by Mr. GEYER, it was Ordered, That the memorial of the heirs of Herman Blannerhasset, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee of Claims.

On motion by Mr. MILLER, it was Ordered, That the petition of Eliza M. Evans, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

On motion by Mr. FELCH, it was Ordered, That the petition of William Miller, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

On motion by Mr. JONES, of Iowa, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Pensions be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Mira M. Alexander, and that it be referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. PRATT. My attention has been called to a memorial of citizens of the District of Columbia, which is on the files of the Senate, praying that the United States may purchase a portion of the Columbia Turnpike Road, which is in the District of Columbia, so that it may be made free.

The Senate are aware that the Government have built a bridge across the Potomac river, now connecting the District with the State of Virginia. Senators are also aware that we have purchased the bridges across the Eastern Branch, thus connecting the District with the State of Maryland. I believe that this turnpike road is the only thoroughfare through the District which may not now be traveled free of expense. I move that the memorial be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia, and I hope they will give it their early attention.

The memorial was accordingly so referred.

NOTICES OF BILLS.

Mr. CLEMENS gave notice that he should ask leave to introduce a bill for the relief of Thomas Snodgrass.

Mr. FISH gave notice that he should ask leave to introduce a bill to increase the salary of the judge of the United States district court for the southern district of Florida.

Mr. PEARCE gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill for the relief of Sarah E. McKay, widow of Lieutenant-Colonel McKay.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. BERRIEN, agreeably to previous notice, asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill to provide for the removal of obstructions in the river

Savannah, in the State of Georgia, and for the improvement of the same; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

REPORTS OF STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. DAWSON, from the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office, to whom were referred documents relating to the application of John Schley for the extension of a patent, reported a bill to extend a patent heretofore granted to John Schley, of the State of Georgia.

Mr. DAVIS, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill for the relief of Charles A. Kellett, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. BUTLER, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred a memorial of members of the Bar of the District of Columbia, reported a bill to make the salary of the judge of the criminal court of the District of Columbia equal to that of an assistant judge of the circuit court of said District; which was read and passed to the second reading.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a bill amendatory of an act entitled "An act to provide for holding the courts of the United States in case of the sickness or other disability of the judges of the district courts," approved July 29, 1850, reported it without amendment.

On motion by Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Military Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of the documents relating to the claim of the State of Rhode Island for advances to volunteers in the late war with Mexico.

On motion, also, by Mr. J., it was Ordered, That the Committee on Military Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Nathan Weston, Jr.

TONNAGE OF VESSELS.

Mr. DAVIS submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be instructed to communicate to the Senate the following information, to wit:

First. The number and tonnage of American and foreign vessels which have arrived annually in the United States from foreign ports after 1814, designating the countries to which such vessels belonged, and that from which they last, before their arrival, cleared.

Second. The number and tonnage of such vessels which have arrived, during the same period, annually, in the ports of Portland, Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Mobile, and New Orleans, respectively.

Third. The number and tonnage of such vessels which have arrived in the United States during the same period from foreign ports on the lakes, classifying in all cases such vessels in the usual manner.

FLOGGING IN THE NAVY.

Mr. GWIN. As I believe the morning business is concluded, I hope the memorial introduced some time since by the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BRODHEAD,] relating to flogging in the Navy, which has been laid upon the table, may be now taken up. Its consideration is due, as a matter of courtesy, to the honorable Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. STOCKTON.]

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BERRIEN. Let the petition be read.

The CLERK read it, as follows:

To the honorable the Senate of the United States of America:

The memorial of the subscribers, citizens of the United States, beg leave respectfully to represent to your honorable body, that at the last session of the Congress of the United States an important change was made in the regulations by which the discipline of the Navy and of the commercial marine of the United States was enforced, and which, in the opinion of your memorialists, if it be not modified or repealed, will lead to the most disastrous results to that great arm of the national defence and welfare.

Your memorialists refer to the law by which commanders of vessels are not permitted, for the commission of petty offences against the regulation of their ship and the laws of naval discipline, to inflict a prompt and ready punishment upon offenders for the commission of such offences.

Your memorialists most respectfully represent, that on the high seas, where ready access to legal civil tribunals cannot be obtained for the prompt punishment of offenders against the laws of the naval and marine service, and where it is neither possible to discharge such offenders from the service or to obtain others to occupy their places and perform their duties, it is of the highest importance that a power should be conferred upon commanders to compel the service of their crews by means and punishments which, under other circumstances, would not be required.

Your memorialists would state, in illustration of the foregoing proposition, that they have been informed, and believe, that considerable numbers of the crews of our ships, on approaching the coast of America in the winter season, have retired from their duty, knowing that the commanders had no legal authority to compel their service by the prompt and summary infliction of punishment, and that such vessels have been exposed in most inclement weather to great danger from such abandonment of duty on the part of this portion of their crew.

Your memorialists would also further state, that the desertion of duty before referred to in all cases had been on the part of the worst portion of the crews of those ships, and that it thus imposes upon the better portion of them so severe a duty that their strength may, in the hour of the utmost need, fail them, and that whilst deserters from duty are enjoying themselves in their hammocks, protected from the fury of the storm, their exhaustion may lead to the loss of the ship, and the destruction of the lives of all on board of her. Good men, who do their duty, fear no punishment, and it is not inflicted upon them. The good men of the service, it is believed, desire the repeal of the late law. It imposes upon them the duty of bad men, who shelter themselves under it from the performance of their duty. It is not, in the opinion of your memorialists, punishment, whether it be of the lash, the dungeon, or the sword, that disgraces a man. It is the offence which merits such punishment that disgraces him. Lafayette was not disgraced by incarceration in the dungeons of Olmutz, Algernon Sydney by the axe of the second Charles, nor the great Apostle to the Gentiles by the repeated infliction on his person of the Mosaic law of "forty stripes save one."

If a sailor be so lost to a sense of duty, feeling, and honor, as to desert his post, or to commit crime, there is little danger to be apprehended of his feeling disgraced by the infliction of punishment by the lash, the chain ball, or the treadmill.

And your memorialists would further add, that the necessary power of moderate and prompt punishment for petty offences committed on board ship has been, and still is, conferred on commanders of British vessels, and was so upon commanders of American vessels until the last session of the Congress of the United States; and will only refer, in addition to the foregoing statements, to the high state of discipline and efficiency attained by these great maritime powers as a vindication of that practice, and an argument in favor of its reenactment.

And your memorialists, as in duty bound, will ever pray.

Mr. STOCKTON. Mr. President, the subject of this memorial, in my judgment, is equal in importance to any which is likely to occupy the attention of Congress. It was, therefore, sir, that I asked the Senate, on its first presentation, to permit it to lie on the table for a few days, that I might have an opportunity to examine it. At the same time I promised the Senate, when it next came up, that I would express my views in relation to it. It is my purpose now to redeem that promise.

The memorial upon the table presents for the consideration of the Senate nothing less than the whole foundation of our naval structure—the human material by which your ships are worked and fought, your guns leveled, and their thunders pointed at your foes. Good ships, well built, well rigged, and fully equipped, are magnificent and perfect specimens of human science and art. But unless they are manned by good men they will sail only to become prizes to your enemies. If you do not desire to build ships for your enemies, you must give them crews worthy to defend them. Sir, the difference between sailors is as great as the difference between other classes of different nations. There is as much difference between the American sailor in our whaling and coasting service and the sailors of other nations, as there is between the raw European emigrant and the sturdy son of one of our frontier pioneers. The emigrant will, in some cases, almost starve, while the pioneer is building his log house, enclosing his cornfield, and making himself an independent and useful man.

I am of opinion that the nation whose service is supplied with the best common sailors, will excel in naval warfare, as well as in all maritime pursuits. I am further of opinion, that in versatility, education, courage, and industry, our sailors in the whaling and coasting service excel those of all other nations. I am furthermore of opinion, that the superiority of the American sailor has decided the battle in our favor in many a bloody conflict, when, without that superiority, it might have been otherwise. I desire to secure and preserve that superiority. To that end, and for humanity's sake, I am utterly and irreconcilably opposed to the use of the lash in the Navy, or anywhere else. The longest, the most arduous voyages are made in the merchant service without the use of the lash. In the Polar seas—among the icebergs of the Arctic and Antarctic oceans, the intrepid New Englander pursues his gigantic game and hurls his harpoon; and after a three years' voyage, returns with the oily spoils of his adventurous navigation. But he owes none of his success, his patient endurance, his exemplary discipline, and his indefatigable industry, to the guardian ministrations of the lash. To say that men who can make such voyages, and endure such hardships cheerfully and contentedly, cannot navigate their own national ships without the infliction of the infamous lash, is a libel. Is their nature changed the moment they step on the deck of a national vessel? Are they less men—less Americans—as soon as the custody of the American flag, or the national honor, is intrusted to their keeping? No, sir; it is a libel. I do not mean to use the word in an offensive sense, nor shall I to-day use any word in that sense. It is one of those inconsiderate, thoughtless opinions, which mankind seem to think they have a perfect right to express in regard to sailors. It was not long since, sir, that I had a conversation on this subject with a gentleman who had for several years commanded a fine ship in the merchant service, but who is now an honorable, active, and efficient man of business in one of our large cities, and to whose integrity, generosity, and humanity, I would intrust anybody but a sailor. After he had heard my views on this subject, he instantly replied, "Why you mean to treat them like human beings." The theory that the Navy cannot be governed, and that our national ships cannot be navigated without the use of the lash, seems to me to be founded in that false idea, that sailors are not men—not American citizens—have not the common feelings, sympathies, and honorable impulses of our Anglo-American race.

I do not wonder, when I look back on the past history of the sailor, at the prevalence of this idea. His life has been a life of habitual, I will not say of systematic, degradation. The officers who command him—the oldest, the bravest, and the best—have been accustomed from their boyhood to see the sailor lashed about the ship's deck like a brute. He who by the laws of the service in which he is engaged is treated, or liable to be treated, like a brute, soon comes to be thought of as at least but little better than a brute. Who in social life respects a man whose back has been scarred at the whipping-post? Into what depth of contempt does such a punishment sink its victim? And here is one of the worst evils of the system. It destroys those feelings of respect and kindness which officers ought to entertain for the sailors under their command. But this is only one of the worst evils of the system. It destroys those feelings of regard and respect which the sailors should entertain for their officers. The truth is, there are no relations of affection and regard between them. The one is the oppressor, the other the oppressed. Sir, a man may fear or hate; but he neither loves nor respects his tyrant. The worst government upon earth is that of fear; the best, that of love and affection. These sentiments, by a law of our nature, must be mutual sentiments. Bonaparte was the idol of the soldier, because the soldier was his idol. They loved him because they supposed he loved them. There is nothing that gallant and brave men will not do and suffer for a commander whom they love. Difficulties and dangers and death have no terrors for such men. In great battles, where the contest has been doubtful, those soldiers have always fought most desperately whose devotion to their commander was the greatest. It has always been considered as an essential element in the character of a successful commander, that he should be able to excite and encourage the confidence and affection of the men under his command. But what confidence or regard can be expected under the government of the lash? But more than this: this punishment destroys the sailor's own self-respect. What has honor—what has pride—what has patriotism to do with a man who may be, at the caprice of another, subjected to an infamous punishment, worse—aye, sir, in some cases worse a thousand times—than death? Can nobleness of sentiment, or an honorable pride of character, dwell with one whose every muscle has been made to quiver under the lash? Can he long continue to love his country, whose laws degrade him to the level of a brute? The infamous "question" of torture now only remains as a blot on the page of Anglo-Saxon history. The whipping-post, where the worst vagrants used to expiate their offences, has been discarded from society. The worst offences in our State prisons are no longer punished by the lash. Why is all this? Why are those punishments now condemned as the shameful relics of a barbarous age? It is because the light of a better day has dawned. It is because the precepts of the Gospel of Christianity have ameliorated our laws. It is because society has made the discovery, that if a man is fit to live at all, he ought not to be divested of all the qualities which make a man, by the infamous mutilation of his body. What is the answer which is given to all this by those who seek to restore this relic of barbarism to the Navy? Why, they tell us we intend only to apply this system of punishment to seamen—we intend only to flog sailors. That is quite true. It is only sailors who are to be treated like brutes—aye, sir, worse than brutes. There is no man who hears me, who would permit his dog to be thus treated. There is no spot on the habitable globe known to me, where a man would be permitted to seize upon a dog, and lash him until he cut the flesh from off his ribs, and the blood should be made to run down from his backbone to his heels. But, sir, it is only the sailor, for whom this punishment is to be reserved.

Who, O Senators! is the American sailor, that he is to be treated worse than a dog? He has been my companion for more than a quarter of a century—through calm and storm, privations, sufferings, and danger. In peace and in war I have lived with him, and fought with him side by side, by sea and land. I have seen him in the northern ocean, where there was no night to veil his deeds. I have seen him on the coast of Africa, surrounded by pestilential disease. I have seen him among the West India Islands in chase of pirates, with his parched tongue hanging almost out of his mouth. I have encamped with him on the California mountains, and on the plains of the Mesa. I have seen the rays of the morning sun play on his carbine and his boarding-pike. I have seen him march one hundred and fifty miles through an enemy's country, over mountains and through rivers. I have seen his feet scarified by the projecting rocks, as he hauled his cannon over the hills. I have seen him with no shoes on but those of canvas, made by his own hands, and with no provision but what he took from the enemy. I have seen him plunge into the Rio San Gabriel, and drag his guns after him in the face of a galling fire from a desperate foe. And finally, I have laid beside him on the cold ground, when the ice has formed on his beard. Sir, his heart has beat close to my own. I ought to know him. I do know him. And this day—now, before the assembled Senate of the Republic, I stand up to speak in his behalf. I hope he will find an abler advocate. Nay, I am sure he will find abler advocates on the floor. But, nevertheless, hear me.

Mr. President, the American sailors, as a class, have loved their country as well, and have done more for her in peace and war, than any other equal number of citizens. Passing by for a moment their antecedent glorious achievements, let me remind you that he has recently gained for his country an empire. Through perils by land and perils by water he has gained a golden empire, which has added to his country's renown and greatness, and perhaps saved his fellow-citizens from almost universal bankruptcy and ruin. And what has his country done for him? When the fighting was over, the battles won, the conquest achieved, you sent a band of Mormons to California to drive him to his ship, and rob him of his glory. And historians too have done more to prove that history is a lie. You refused to give him "bounty lands," which you gave to the soldier—his comrade fighting by his side—and you have neglected to give him even your thanks. And now, to cap the climax of his country's ingratitude, these memorialists would have him scourged. They would scourge him for drunkenness, when they put the bottle to his mouth. They would scourge him for inattention to his duty, when injustice and wrong have made him for an instant discontented and sullen. Shame! Shame! You would scourge him while living, and when dead consign him to a felon's grave. That I may not be supposed to have drawn upon my fancy, or to have exaggerated his country's inhumanity, I ask the Secretary of the Senate to read these documents.

The Secretary read them as follows:

To the Honorable the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

The undersigned, President and Trustees of the Boston Marine Society, of the city of Boston, in the State of Massachusetts, beg leave to represent to your honorable bodies, that, having had their attention directed, for many years, to the condition of seamen, abroad and at home, they have been much impressed with the fact of the sufferings of this valuable class of our citizens by sickness and accidents, and from poverty arising from these circumstances, connected with their proverbial improvidence for the future, with their pecuniary means.

The benefits of medical aid and comfort in foreign ports enjoyed by others, are hardly ever obtained by them, and, in consequence, after receiving such comforts and attentions as the ships they are attached to, and their officers can give, they are frequently brought home and placed in our marine hospitals, where no seaman can remain beyond the time limited by the laws regulating those institutions.

It is very often the case that they are dismissed from these hospitals, when not sufficiently restored to render them fit for their active service, and, in consequence, they become paupers or tenants of public almshouses, though most of them would rather die than suffer this degradation.

It is well known to all, observant of seamen, that they are always ready to answer the call for their services, whether it be in the service of the navy, or of the mercantile marine—as ready to fight with valor for their country as to aid in its commerce—and so true is this, that very few seamen, advanced in years, can be found who have not served in both our public and private ships.

Your attention is respectfully called to the fact, that there is, at this moment, in the public Treasury, as your memorialists have been informed, money to the credit of seamen who have been attached to the Government marine, and to the mercantile marine, amounting to more than a million of dollars.

This large amount has accrued from unclaimed sums due to deceased seamen, from unclaimed prize money belonging to seamen of private as well as public armed vessels, and to the contributions made by all seamen of twenty cents per month in the name of hospital money.

In view of these facts, your memorialists beg leave to solicit from your honorable bodies, that measures may be taken to ascertain the amount accumulated from these sources in the United States Treasury, and that, therefrom, suitable provision may be made in the principal seaports in the United States for the further maintenance of seamen, citizens of the United States, who are infirm and unfit for service, from sickness, advanced age, or any other cause.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

PRESIDENT AND TRUSTEES, B. M. S.

Z. RING, Esq.—DEAR SIR: I herewith furnish you with the information desired. During the year 1850 there were 106 deaths of seamen; of which number 45 were buried by friends, the balance (61) were taken by the Almshouse to Potter's field; for the latter cause the Government allow us $5 each—($3 for coffin, and $2 for ground.)

Not one in ten have money to provide for themselves.

Very respectfully,

JOHN L. ROOME,

Superintendent of City Hospital, N. Y.

POTTER'S FIELD.—The grand-jury for the September term examined 276 complaints, and found 133 bills of indictment. They visited the various public institutions, but made no presentment. Previous to being discharged by the court, the foreman, Henry Erben, Esq., at the request of the grand inquest, stated to the court that the jury had visited Potter's Field, and found it in a horrible condition. One pit was about half filled. The coffins were exposed to the sun. The stench from them was very great. They directed Mr. Webb, the keeper, to come before the grand-jury on the following day. On the 19th he made the following affidavit:

GRAND-JURY ROOM, September 19, 1851.

William O. Webb, being duly sworn, saith, that he is the keeper of Potter's Field; that the ground on Randall's island, used for a burying-place, is not at all suited for it; that it is full of rocks; pits are dug for the dead, where they are put in layers of six deep. The bottom of the pits being solid rock, when decomposition takes place, the liquid, not being able to go in the ground, passes through the top, causing a horrible stench, which can be smelt for more than a mile.

There is no earth between the layers of coffins, and there are only about eighteen inches of earth over the top layer of coffins—that it frequently happens that at high tides and heavy rains, the water gets into the pits, so that the coffins are floating. He further saith that in less than three weeks there will be no room left in the yard to bury another person. He also states that the south end of Ward's Island is a suitable place for a Potter's Field, the soil being good and free from rock.

Sworn this 19th day of September, 1851.

HENRY ERBEN, Foreman.

Mr. STOCKTON. Mr. President, to whom in time of peace are intrusted the lives of the thousands who traverse the ocean? Whose energy and skill, and hardy self-denying toil, carry the products of your soil through the world, and bring back the rich return? It is the American sailor. By his superior qualities as a man he has enabled you to rival in commerce the boasted mistress of the ocean. Where is the coast or harbor in the wide world accessible to human enterprise to which he has not carried your flag? His berth is no sinecure. His service is no easy service. He is necessarily an isolated being; he knows no comforts of home, and wife, and children. He reaps no golden rewards for the increase of treasure which he brings to you. When on shore he is among strangers and friendless. When worn out he is scarcely provided for. Making many rich, he lives and dies poor; carrying the arts of civilization and the blessings of the Gospel through the world, he is treated as an outcast from the mercies of both. But look to your history—that part of it which the world knows by heart—and you will find on its brightest page the glorious achievements of the American sailor. Whatever his country has done to disgrace him and break his spirit, he has never disgraced her; he has always been ready to serve her; he always has served her faithfully and effectually. He has often been weighed in the balance, and never found wanting. The only fault ever found with him is, that he sometimes fights ahead of his orders. The world has no match for him, man for man; and he asks no odds, and he cares for no odds, when the cause of humanity or the glory of his country calls him to fight. Who, in the darkest days of our Revolution, carried your flag into the very chops of the British Channel, bearded the lion in his den, and woke the echoes of old Albion's hills by the thunders of his cannon and the shouts of triumph? It was the American sailor. And the names of John Paul Jones and the Bon Homme Richard will go down the annals of time forever. Who struck the first blow that humbled the Barbary flag, which for a hundred years had been the terror of christendom, drove it from the Mediterranean, and put an end to the infamous tribute it had been accustomed to extort? It was the American sailor. And the name of Decatur and his gallant companions will be as lasting as monumental brass. In your war of 1812, when your arms on shore were covered by disaster—when Winchester had been defeated—when the Army of the Northwest had surrendered, and when the gloom of despondency hung like a cloud over the land, who first relit the fires of national glory and made the welkin ring with the shouts of victory? It was the American sailor. And the names of Hull and the Constitution will be remembered as long as we have left anything worth remembering. That was no small event. The wand of Mexican prowess was broken on the Rio Grande. The wand of British invincibility was broken when the flag of the Guerriere came down. That one event was worth more to the Republic than all the money which has ever been expended for the Navy. Since that day the Navy has had no stain upon its escutcheon, but has been cherished as your pride and glory. And the American sailor has established a reputation throughout the world—in peace and in war, in storm and in battle—for unsurpassed heroism and prowess.

Mr. President, I am no painter. I cannot draw with artistical skill the scene I would have you look upon. But it requires no artist. Picture it to yourself, sir. See the gallant bold sailor who has served his apprenticeship with Hull in the Constitution, or one who helped to drag the guns across the San Gabriel, stripped and lashed worse than a dog. Can you stand it, sir? Yet your laws have authorized it to be done—it probably has been done. And now it is proposed to give authority to do it again. Will the American people stand it? Will this more than Roman Senate long debate whether an American citizen, as he is—the sailor shall be entitled to all his rights as an American citizen or not; whether, freeman as he is, he shall be scourged like a slave? Cicero's climacteric, in his speech against Verres, is, that though a Roman citizen, his client had been scourged. And shall an American citizen be scourged? Forbid it, God of humanity, forbid it. For my own part, I would rather see the Navy abolished, and the stars and stripes buried with their glory in the depths of the ocean, than that those who won its glories should be subjected to a punishment so ignominious and brutalizing. Sir, if I had the power vouchsafed to others, to impress my own feelings upon the hearts of those who hear me, I would rouse in the minds of Senators such a sense of national pride and human sympathy that they would with one voice demand that the memorial which seeks to rob the American sailor of his rights as an American freeman, should be thrown under your table and trampled beneath your feet.

Mr. President, the object of all our legislation for our seamen should be to elevate them as a class, and not to degrade them. In proportion as you do this, and teach the sailor to respect himself, you will bring him to the performance of his duty with cheerfulness and alacrity. You best appeal to his patriotism by showing him that he is honored and respected by his country. You best appeal to his sentiment of native pride by presenting motives to his emulation. You can do infinitely more with him by rewarding him for his faithfulness than by flogging him for his delinquencies. Whatever the peculiarities of the sailor may be, he is still a man, with all the impulses, wishes, and hopes of a man. And if there is one trait more peculiar to him than another, it is the sentiment of gratitude. He never forgets a kindness, and would take his heart out of his bosom to save a friend. Let him only see that he is honored and respected by his country, and her honor and interest will always be safe in his hands.

I believe that many of the officers of the Navy have fallen into the error of supposing that sailors are more influenced by their fears than by their affections. They do not rightly appreciate his character. If they would take more pains to think for him—to keep him out of temptation—to attend to his wants—to see that he was fairly and justly dealt by—and properly to consider the fair allowance which ought to be made for him, they would find it much less difficult to enforce discipline, to gain his confidence, and find him much more tractable. It is not by the severity of discipline as much as it is by a firm, just, and generous government, that he is to be controlled. It is so among men everywhere. It is rather by humane and judicious laws, than by the severity of penal enactments, that good government is established and maintained. Again: in the training and governing those men who are to fight your battles, and face every danger with courage, their fear should seldom be appealed to. You ought not to cultivate the emotions which make men cowards, and teach them habitually to shrink from the fear of personal suffering. You ought rather to teach them to despise an honorable suffering. True heroism is an intellectual quality. It is moral intrepidity that makes the man of true and reliable courage. And this can only coexist with a proper sense of personal honor and self-respect. Degrade a man by an infamous punishment, which destroys his personal honor and self-respect, and you do all that human ingenuity can to make him cowardly.

But it is said that the Navy cannot be governed without the lash. As a general proposition, I express my utter dissent to it. I admit that among sailors, as among other classes, there will always be found some who are vicious and troublesome. That is the case in the Army as well as in the Navy; and they have abolished the lash in the Army. It is as easy to get other and less offensive punishments for the Navy as for the Army; and if those punishments will not answer, the refractory person had better be driven in disgrace from the Navy. He is not fit to be trusted in the hour of peril—he is unworthy to have the honor of the flag confided to him. Sufficient inducements should be offered to the better classes to enter the Navy; and a part of those inducements should always be good treatment. A free use of the lash—nay, its probable use, its permission by law—has always been an objection urged by the better classes to entering the Navy. They prefer the merchant service, where they can at least select their own commander, while in the Navy they know not into whose hands they may fall. Thus you see that the very necessity which is pleaded creates, in a great degree, the circumstances out of which it is supposed to spring. You flog because there are bad men in the Navy, and the fact that you do flog excludes the better class of sailors from entering the service; so that the mischief is self-perpetuating. But again, it is said that a large majority of the officers of the Navy are of opinion that the lash is necessary and indispensable. Well, there are differences of opinion about it. We all know, however, that old notions and opinions are hard to be rooted out, and that men are very apt to love arbitrary power when they are to exercise it, and not be subject to it. All history shows this, and the experience of all reformers confirm it. Lord Denman, late Chief Justice of England, in a letter on the subject of legal reform, complains that everywhere he met the objection that the judges were opposed to it. And Lord Brougham, in a speech delivered in Parliament on the same subject, expresses a similar sentiment; yet it was not long before the judges and the bar and the people concurred in opinion as to the beneficial effects of the same reforms. It would seem, sir, that it is a part of man's nature to yield with great reluctance the smallest atom of power with which he may be invested. He is unwilling to admit that he can abuse it. Its safest depository he considers is his own hands. For these and similar reasons, I think that the opinion of the officers of the Navy on this subject should be taken with many grains of allowance. I find no fault with the independent expression of their opinions. It is the opinion itself which I propose to combat. Their argument is as brief as it seems to some minds formidable. They declare the lash to be necessary and indispensable. If they are right in this opinion, there is an end to the matter. Necessity has no law. But I beg leave to inquire into this alleged necessity.

And first, I ask for what offences has this lash been so freely used? Has it been inflicted for serious or atrocious crimes, which involve the honor of our flag or the safety of our national vessels? Or rather, let me ask, has it not been inflicted for offences which, if they had been entirely overlooked, would not have injured the proper discipline of the Navy? Has the lash ever been used in the hour of battle, or in that of preparation for battle? Is it reasonable to suppose that a coward or traitor would face a cannon-ball to avoid the lash? It would seem, then, without multiplying words, that so far from the lash being necessary for the maintenance of discipline in the most important duty of a ship-of-war, it never has and never will be used. How is it, then, in regard to the next most important matter concerning the discipline of a man-of-war? Has it ever been used for the suppression of mutiny? No, sir; the law has provided for that offence, as well as for cowardice, the punishment of death. Having thus briefly stated what the lash has not been used for, let me inquire, what are the offences for which it is deemed so absolutely necessary? We may derive some information in this particular from the published reports of the offences and punishments which have actually occurred on board our ships-of-war. By reference to the report of the Secretary of the Navy on this subject, you will perceive that one of the offences for which it has been used is that of suspicion of theft. One would hardly say it was either necessary or proper in that case. The offence for which, however, there seems to have been more lashes inflicted than for all other offences, is that of drunkenness. Now, sir, the Government furnishes the liquor for the sailor, and if he gets drunk upon his allowance, the Government itself is responsible, and the sailor ought not to be flogged. If he procures it on board of a ship by theft or bargain, it is evidence of a laxity of discipline, for which others are responsible, and for which the sailor ought not to be flogged. The lash, therefore, is not necessary to prevent drunkenness, not only for the reasons just stated, but because it must be universally admitted that it never has and never can prevent the offence of drunkenness, if he who is habituated to it is permitted to have liquor.

The offence of disobedience of orders will be found frequently in this report. But we are not informed of the precise nature of the offence. Whether it is actual or constructive disobedience of orders; whether it is a serious or trifling matter; whether it is for accidentally spitting on the deck, or neglecting to clean the bright works of a ship, or not mending his clothes, or leaving his bag on deck; or whether it was a positive refusal to do his duty. We are, therefore, left to infer its seriousness by the punishment inflicted for it. I will hazard the opinion, judging by that standard, that stopping the offender's allowance of tobacco, or rum, tea, sugar, and coffee, would have been, in every case, a much more reasonable and a more efficient punishment. And now, sir, what has become of this plea of necessity?—I will not call it in this connection the tyrant's plea; the officers of the Navy do not deserve such a reproach from any one, and especially from myself, because I did when in the service execute, and permit to be executed, the law of the lash as I hope I did all other laws of the service, which I had sworn to obey and to enforce. And this should be a sufficient answer to those who expect to escape from the grasp of argument and facts by indulging in individual recrimination, and will be sufficient to remind them that there is some difference in the position of those who are called upon to make the laws and those whose duty it is to execute them.

The officers of the Navy, in my judgment, are entitled to high commendation. They are, as a class, brave, noble, generous, and patriotic men; and in all the elements of character which constitute valuable public servants, they have no superiors. But however much respect I may entertain for them as a class, it is my duty, which I shall endeavor to perform, to deal without reserve or false delicacy with their arguments, and the errors which disgrace and paralyze the service to which they belong. It does appear to me, Mr. President, that the argument, from necessity, has resolved itself simply into this: that the lash is an easy and short way to settle a trifling difficulty with a sailor. And so were the thumb-screw and the rack an easy and short way to get a confession, and the inquisition settled matters of faith easily and readily. But, sir, there has been a great change in the opinions of mankind on this subject, and I hope the change will go on until the last relic of barbarism shall be banished from the world.

But I care very little for the details of this argument, and will not detain the Senate any longer in relation to them. There is one broad proposition upon which I stand. It is this: That an American sailor is an American citizen, and that no American citizen shall, with my consent, be subjected to this infamous punishment. Placing myself upon this proposition, I am prepared for any consequences. I love the Navy. When I speak of the Navy, I mean the sailor as well as the officer. They are all my fellow-citizens, and yours; and come what may, my voice will ever be raised against a punishment which degrades my countrymen to the level of a brute, and destroys all that is worth living for—personal honor and self-respect.

Mr. President, reference has been made by these memorialists to the example of the British Government. With what propriety such an appeal is made by the citizen of a free republican Government to the institutions of monarchy, let others determine. But, sir, I am not aware that the British Parliament has ever by statute expressly authorized the use of the lash. There is no doubt that it is used in the Navy of Great Britain, and has been so used since the restoration of the monarchy under the Stuarts; but there is no evidence that the practice of flogging prevailed in the republican fleets of the English Commonwealth; and it is doubted by the best authorities that it ever was tolerated prior to the act of 13th Charles II. We have copied it from their practice, and not from their statute-book. But our Congress did what no British Parliament ever did: they sanctioned it in express terms by the laws of the United States. And here, Mr. President, you must permit me to call the attention of the Senate to a most singular fact, which is this: Our law of April, 1800, was principally copied from the statute of Charles II., and is openly and avowedly more severe and arbitrary than the British act, even under the Stuarts, and has remained so until last year, although flogging, as a punishment, was tolerated during the whole of that time, and up to the present moment, on land in England.

The act of Charles II. alluded to, was passed when the Duke of York, afterwards James II., was Lord High Admiral of England, and may be supposed to have been done at his instance. The English historian, the Earl of Clarendon, tells us, that when that prince entered on his duties, he found the Navy too republican for his taste or purposes, and set about reorganizing it by getting rid of the republican officers. In pursuance of this policy, he procured the passage of the act of 13th Charles II. Although that act does not, in express terms, authorize the use of the lash, yet by virtue of a clause contained in it, the Lord High Admiral, or the commissioners for executing his duties, issued instructions authorizing the use of the lash in the British Navy; and certainly it may be cited to justify any tyranny. I would not have noticed the reference of the memorialists to the practice in the British Navy, but that I desire, on this subject, not to leave a peg to hang a doubt upon. But, sir, the example of the British Government, such as it is, is no justification for the United States. The infliction of corporal punishment for certain offences has always, as far as I know, been sanctioned by British laws. The sailor in the British Navy receives the same punishment that is inflicted upon land in England; whereas, in the United States it has been almost universally abolished, and certainly has never been sanctioned by the laws of the United States, except in the Army and Navy. Justification it has none; and if palliation is to be looked for, it could only be found in its inflexibility by the judgment of the sailor's peers. But the trial by jury is unknown to the naval service. Those great conservative safeguards, so dear to the freemen—the arraignment and trial before a jury of his peers indifferently selected, counsel and defence, are unknown to the everyday discipline of a man-of-war. Much less has the sailor any appeal. The process by which he is tried is a short process, and the punishment follows immediately on judgment. Where the power to punish is so absolute, the law should at least protect its victim from an infamous punishment for a petty offence, which may disgrace and ruin him for life. If when a citizen enters into the service of his country, he is to forego the protection of those laws, for the preservation of which he is willing to risk his life, he is entitled in all justice, humanity, and gratitude, to all the protection that can be extended to him in his peculiar circumstances. He ought certainly to be protected from the infliction of a punishment which stands condemned by the almost universal sentiment of his fellow-citizens; a punishment which is proscribed in the best prison-government; proscribed in the school-house; and proscribed in the best government on earth—that of parental domestic affection. Yes, sir, expelled from the social circle, from the school-house, the prison-house, and the Army, it finds defenders and champions nowhere but in the Navy. To say that no laws can be devised for the government of the Navy which do not tolerate the lash, is an acknowledgment of imbecility which this Senate will never make.

The difficulty in regard to this matter has been, that in framing articles for the government of the Navy, three things have been overlooked, which ought never to be lost sight of. First, that an American sailor is an American citizen and a freeman, though in the service of his country. Second, that he has yielded no legal right, not inconsistent with his obligations of duty. Third, that naval officers are not infallible, and require as stringent regulations for their government as other citizens invested with authority.

And now, Mr. President, I come to the discussion of a part of this subject far from being agreeable. Why is it that naval officers, and even some seamen, as I am told, desire to have the lash restored to the Navy? It is a symptom of unfavorable augury. It is an indication, that the moral standard by which the Navy is estimated, is low and degraded. It argues a preference for the exercise of arbitrary power, rather than appeal to those feelings of respect and sentiments of honor, which should influence the conduct of honorable men towards each other in the service of their country. The great Montesquieu has said, that while virtue was the principle of a republic, honor was that of a monarchy. Now, the actual government, in peace or war, in your military and naval service, is necessarily, in some degree, monarchical. Within the limits of his command, and in reference to those immediately subject to him, the captain, the colonel, the general, or the commander of a ship of war, is a sovereign—a monarch; and I hold that honor is the principle on which the government of his subordinates should be founded. Tell me not that a sailor's heart is insensible to the dictates of honor. I know better. It is there. It may indeed slumber and remain passive, and be almost extinguished by sullen revenge or bitter hatred; yet there it is, as real, and in as perfect existence, as in your breast or mine. By proper appeals to it, by generous treatment, by manly and discriminating excitement, it kindles into activity, and becomes the supreme arbiter of the sailor's life and conduct. Sir, if the officers would only believe in the existence of this sentiment of honor, and appeal to it as an instrument for the preservation of discipline, we should not be asked to restore the lash. A requisition for the lash proceeds on the supposition that there is no honor in a common sailor. Now, so far from that dogma having any foundation in fact, it must be known to all who appreciate the character of a true-hearted sailor, that honor is almost the only principle by which nine tenths of them are governed. When an unsuccessful appeal is made to the honor of a sailor, it is not because he is destitute of the principle, but because the appeal has not been properly made.

In the view I take of the subject, then, the argument derived from a low and degraded estimate of the Navy, is unfounded in any of the characteristics belonging to the common sailor. Has it any foundation in the incapacity of the officers to excite and cultivate those feelings of honor in a sailor which make him obedient and tractable? I hope not. If there be any such, they should not be intrusted with any command. They are destitute of the faculty of commanding. They have not the necessary qualifications. They are not safe depositaries for such absolute power, or for the security of our public ships. How can they rouse the sailor's sense of honor in time of battle, who have proved themselves incapable of believing in its existence at all other times. I apprehend, if the restoration of the lash be made to hinge upon the question, whether the sailor is destitute of honor, or the officers of capacity to successfully appeal to that honor, that we should not be troubled with many importunate demands for its restoration. If the desire to restore the lash to the Navy is evidence that the standard by which the Navy is judged is low and degraded, it is also evidence, to my mind, that the Navy has not kept pace with the moral improvement of the age. If it be the general opinion in the Navy that the lash is necessary and indispensable for the preservation of discipline, then, I say, we are now just where public sentiment stood in 1660, during the infamous reign of Charles II. Then the thumb-screw and the rack were in vogue, too. And if we are to go back to the lash, I do not see why we should not retrograde likewise to the boot, the rack, and the torture. What would be thought of the man who should propose to introduce into our penal code those horrible and barbarous punishments of which I have spoken? What would be thought of the civilized community who would approve such a proposition, and reenact punishments in vogue three hundred years ago? Yet the proposition to restore the lash is of a similar character. It takes for granted that the sailor has remained stationary, ever since the rack, the thumb-screw, and the boot were abolished as part of the criminal law of civilized nations; it takes for granted that of all the light which has irradiated the human mind during the progress of the world, none of it has been poured on the understanding of the sailor. That he alone has remained stationary. That he alone has remained ignorant and incapable of improvement. That he alone is doomed to remain the victim of injustice and cruelty. Look, sir, through the various pursuits of human life, and wherever your eyes rest, you find that improvement has advanced with giant strides. You find that it has elevated and enlightened the ploughman in his field—the mechanic in his workshop—the merchant—the professional man—the daily laborer—all have felt the benign influences of improved civilization. If the sailor has not felt it in an equal degree with other classes, it is because you have degraded and abused him, by treatment from which other classes have been compelled to relieve them. His voice has not been heard like that of other classes in the halls of legislation. He has no representative in such places. He wields no political influence. He has no residence. His domicile is on the ship. If the interests of the sailor had received a tithe of the attention bestowed by legislators on the interests of other classes, we should not now be discussing the question whether or not he should be remanded to the tender mercies of these penal atrocities, from which the progress of modern improvement has relieved all other denominations of men—we would not now be discussing the question whether he should be treated like a man or a brute.

Mr. President, a word or two more and I am done. We hear a great deal of the delinquencies of sailors. There are delinquencies of officers, as well as of sailors. There are officers in the Navy, as well as sailors, who ought not to be there. If you desire to prepare the Navy for the exigencies of war—if you desire to preserve your ancient renown as a naval Power, you must, in my judgment, abolish the lash, and adopt a system of rewards and punishments in its stead. You must abolish the liquor ration; you must alter the whole system of the recruiting service; in one word, you must purge the Navy of all its foul stuff, in high places as well as low places; and you must lay broad and deep the foundation of your naval greatness in the character of the common sailor. The bone and sinew of every Navy is the common sailor. You require the commanding intellect of scientific officers to direct him, and you require good ships. But after all, the common sailor is the working power which enables the captain and the ship to gain laurels. 'Tis the sailor who works and sails and fights the ship; and in proportion as he is superior or inferior, will be the success of the captain and the ship. Sir, in all the best traits of character which distinguish sailors, no nation excels the United States. The American sailor is bold, intelligent, hardy, and enterprising, and in nautical skill is unsurpassed. He shrinks from no danger, he dreads no foe, and yields to no superior. No shoals are too dangerous, no seas too boisterous, no climate too rigorous for him. The burning sun of the tropics cannot make him effeminate, nor can the eternal winter of the polar seas paralyze his energies. Foster, cherish, develop these characteristics by a generous and paternal government. Excite his emulation, and stimulate his ambition by rewards. But above all, save him, save him from the brutalizing lash, and inspire him with love and confidence for your service; and then there is no achievement so arduous, no conflict so desperate, in which his actions will not shed glory upon his country. And when the final struggle comes, as soon it will come, for the empire of the seas, you may rest with entire confidence that victory will be yours.

I move you, sir, that it is inexpedient to grant the prayer of the petitioners.

Mr. HAMLIN. I do not propose to occupy the time of the Senate. It is known probably to Senators, that the Senator from Louisiana (Mr. Downs) has been for several days extremely desirous of addressing the Senate upon another subject. The Senator from California, upon whose motion the Senate this morning proceeded to the consideration of this matter, has been called from the Senate. He was desirous of submitting the motion to lay it on the table for the present; and in his absence I have risen simply to make that motion.

Mr. BADGER. I wish to make a few remarks upon the subject.

Mr. HAMLIN. I trust the Senator from North Carolina will yield, for the benefit of the Senator from Louisiana. I therefore move to lay the subject on the table.

Mr. BADGER. I hope it will not be done, sir.

Mr. HAMLIN. I submit the motion because I told the Senator from California that I would do so.

Mr. BADGER. And because the Senator from California is absent, is that to preclude a member of the Naval Committee from saying a word on the subject?

Mr. HAMLIN. I wish the Senator from North Carolina to understand my position. I do not propose, by moving to lay this subject on the table, to preclude all further discussion of it; but only to preclude it so far as to allow the Senator from Louisiana to address the Senate to-day upon another subject, as he is anxious to do, so that he may leave the city for a time. It is out of kindness to him that I make the motion.

Mr. DOWNS. I did desire to address the Senate to-day; but if the Senator from North Carolina desires to continue this debate, I shall be very willing to wait until to-morrow.

Mr. HAMLIN. Then I withdraw the motion.

Mr. BADGER. I have no disposition to inflict a speech upon the Senate upon this subject. The views that have been submitted to the Senate by the honorable Senator from New Jersey, have in some respects struck me with surprise; and I think that as they have been delivered to the Senate upon an occasion when it is not usual for us to go into discussions or investigations of this kind, as I am a member of the Naval Committee, to whose custody, long ago, according to my view, this memorial should have been intrusted; and as I entertain a very different opinion upon the subject of this petition from that which has been so forcibly and eloquently expressed by the honorable Senator from New Jersey, I could not think it right that remarks of this kind should go forth to the country without an instantaneous notice from some gentleman who belongs to that committee. In the absence of the chairman, I have assumed that duty myself.

Mr. President, it is necessary that, on every occasion of this kind, we should understand what is the subject that is presented for the consideration of the Senate. We should look at it as it is, not as it is presented to us by oratorical exaggerations. The honorable Senator from New Jersey speaks of administering the lash to these gallant and noble sailors until the flesh is torn from their backs, while the blood is running down to their heels; and he assumes, or supposes, that the petition now on your table is an application to the Senate of the United States to be instrumental in restoring—I should say, sir, in introducing—such horrible barbarity into the service. Now, what is the petition? It is simply a petition that the Congress of the United States will restore a discipline to the Navy which had existed in it from its institution, and was discontinued only during the last session of Congress. It is an application to restore a discipline to the Navy which went into operation under the sanction of the immortal Washington, and was continued under all succeeding administrations of the Government; and surely I need not say, sir, that asking us to restore such a discipline, is not asking us either to restore or introduce into the Navy a system of horrible, barbarous, and detestable exaggeration of punishment, such as cannot be stated without making the heart turn sick with horror and detestation.

The honorable Senator from New Jersey was pleased to say, that if he could make the proposition with propriety to the Senate, he would be glad to see that petition, praying for the restoration of a law more than half a century old, which was sanctioned by Washington and by all his illustrious successors, praying for nothing more, laid under the table and trampled under foot. I hope, Mr. President, that he would not also send with it under the table, and under the same trampling of feet, those of us here who think the petition right and reasonable and just; for it seems to follow, if those who ask this thing of the Senate are to be treated with indignity by this body, that either precisely the same or some similar treatment is justly due to those who advocate the petition they present. But little is gained in discussions in this Chamber or elsewhere, as I imagine, by observations which do not meet the merits of the question under consideration. To that I desire to invite your attention for a few minutes, without undertaking to follow the Senator through the whole of his remarks, or to notice in detail the statements which he has made on this subject.

His objections to the punishment which it is proposed to restore to the discipline of the Navy divide themselves into two heads. So far as I see, my task will be a very easy one, for the honorable Senator himself has distinctly refuted both of them in the course of his remarks. The first is, that this punishment is positively mischievous; that to subject the sailor to the lash is to teach him to be a coward; that if you expect him to maintain the glory of the country, to maintain possession of the public ships, to resist the enemy who assails him; if you do not wish to build ships, not for yourselves, but for your enemies, you must abolish the lash; for by accustoming the sailor to that punishment, you deprive him of the principles of honor, and make him a coward. Yet in the very same breath the honorable Senator reminds us of those gallant and noble achievements which distinguished the progress of the late war with England—of those victories upon the ocean and lakes which have made the names of the naval commanders immortal, and shed lustre upon this country; and of which I would only say, that I should be entirely satisfied, if the successes of our naval commanders under this, or any modification of the law, would equal them. How were those sailors bred? Under what discipline were they trained? Was it not with this very discipline of the lash, which the honorable Senator says must be abolished in order to make them brave? Every victory which they have gained, every monument of naval renown which, at the day, was received with shouts of joy and gratulation from one portion of the Union to the other, and the memory of which is cherished by us all, was gained by sailors, noble, daring, courageous sailors, but sailors who were formed under the discipline of the lash.

Now, it seems to me that nothing can be plainer, as I have said, than that this objection of the honorable Senator is refuted by himself; for, so far from speaking of these achievements and exploits as but the beginnings of naval renown hereafter to be emulated and exceeded, he speaks of them in glowing terms of eloquence, which I have not the power of language or the graces of delivery to equal. He brings them forward as glorious examples which we are to follow. If they are examples which we are to follow; if the ends then attained are what we are to propose as the ultimatum of our hopes, is it not a contradiction for the honorable Senator to say that the very discipline which trained men for their accomplishment, makes men cowards? So much with regard to the mischievous tendency of this punishment.

The next objection of the honorable Senator was, that this punishment is inexpedient and unnecessary. Let us see how that is. As I should have said, it is a punishment that obtains in every naval service on the globe. It obtained in ours from the establishment of our naval marine until the last Congress. It is said by the honorable Senator, that nothing is urged, in the form of an argument, in support of the necessity and propriety of that punishment. He says the common course is to say that the punishment is necessary, that it cannot be dispensed with, and there leave the subject. What more does the honorable Senator say in reply, but simply to make a strong and confident assertion; and what is that? That it is unnecessary. He says that no officer, who is fit to command a ship, needs the lash. Is that an argument? or is it not rather one assertion opposed to another? Certainly the opinion of the Senator is entitled to as much weight and consideration as that of any man in this country. But it is no more an argument, than the opinion of any other man. And then, as I have said, the honorable Senator has refuted his own proposition by his own statements. What does he say? "He that is fit to command a ship does not need the lash." The honorable Senator has certainly told us, in the eulogy he passed on the celebrated victory of Hull in the Constitution, that Hull was fit to command a ship. I suppose that Decatur, I suppose that Perry, the conqueror of the lakes, that Morris, that Warrington, were all fit to command ships. Yet they all needed, they all used, the lash. They formed their men with the lash; and in using that term, I do not mean to say that they were engaged in excessive flagellation. No one asks or contends for that; but that they used it as a means of discipline, as a means of coercing their authority and forming the sailor to habits of obedience. Then, if the honorable Senator has conceded the fact that these men actually needed the lash; if, as he has shown, they were fit to command ships, I ask if he has not repudiated all his objections?

But again: the honorable Senator has repudiated them further, for he tells us, in anticipation of what he supposes may be a reply, by an argumentum ad hominem, that when he was in the command of ships, he used the lash. And why? He says he acted in obedience to the law. What law? There never was a law in the United States that required the commander of a ship to use the lash. The law authorized him to use it when it was needful. It made him the judge, and the sole judge, of that necessity. He has no assessors in his tribunal. He has no jury to determine when the lash shall be used. He is the one supreme judge on his own ship. The law says to him, in fact, "When you shall deem it necessary for controlling and directing your vessel and governing your men, for restraining misconduct, for giving a proper degree of order to the ship and efficiency to the service, you are at liberty to use the lash." Now, the honorable Senator says that when he was in command of a ship he used it. There is no man who knows him, and who knows the kindness of his heart, who would suppose that he ever used it except in a case of necessity in his judgment. Then he himself, being in the possession of a power at liberty to use it at his own discretion when it was needful, and to forbear using it when it was not needful, actually used it. I suppose none of us here doubt for a single moment that he is fit to command a ship; he is eminently fit for it, at least he was while he was in the service. Thus I think I have a distinct refutation of the honorable Senator's own proposition. It is precisely logical. He that is fit to command a ship needs not the lash. It is refuted very simply. All the leading commanders in our service did need the lash as an instrument of authority, the honorable Senator himself included; they were fit to command ships; therefore the lash was needful.

The honorable Senator commenced his remarks by saying, that that government is the best which rules by love, and not by fear. I am a good deal in the habit of distrusting these abstractions. I do not know that we are exactly able to form an idea of what is the best government in the abstract. If we confine ourselves to the affairs of this globe on which we live, and on which our ancestors have lived before us, we will find that there never has been any such government in it, either human or divine, for one single instant of time. When that primeval pair, from whom we have all sprung, were placed in perfect and happy innocence in Paradise, with their affections all attuned in a harmonious disposition to love, to reverence, and to serve their great Creator, were they left without the influence of this principle of fear? Not at all. "In the day that ye eat thereof, ye shall surely die." However agreeable and pleasing it may be to us to imagine a state of society in which all men shall do exactly everything that is right, and nothing that is wrong, merely because of a spontaneous disposition to do it, it is very certain that no such government ever has existed, or ever can exist, until there is a total renovation of man's character. All governments, that is, all wise and just governments, act by the double influence of hope and fear, by the application at one time of reward, at another of punishment. Is not that the rule in the domestic circle? We encourage and lead our children; but if they will not be encouraged and led we punish them. We endeavor to induce them to do right from love to us; but if they will not do it from love, they must do it from fear. It is the object to be accomplished that is to be looked at. If we are faithful to ourselves, we do not leave them without the necessary coercive means. The end to be accomplished, is obedience and submission—the doing right. If you can bring it about by encouragement, and persuasion, and love, so much the better. If you cannot, you must resort to fear, because the end is too valuable to be sacrificed.

Mr. President, I believe greatly in the tribute which the honorable Senator has paid to the character of the American sailor; but permit me to say that the honorable Senator does not exactly, as I think, meet the question presented by this petition. He says the American sailor is a noble specimen of a man. As a general remark, what he says is true. He says that such a man as that ought not to be degraded. I admit it; but is it proposed to degrade him? Is this a petition that Congress shall pass a law compelling the officers who have charge of the public ships of the country to whip all the men, those who behave well and those who behave ill? It does not propose that commanders shall do as our old friend Caleb Quottem, the schoolmaster in the farce, did. He had to leave his school to go to the review. He first went to the school-house, and not being able to remain long, he thought it best to whip the boys all round before he started, because, he said, he knew they would deserve it during the day. There is no proposal of that kind. These petitioners simply wish to restore that discipline in virtue of which a man who offends—a man who, by his conduct, soils this fair and excellent character which belongs to the American sailor—shall be made to suffer, and to suffer by punishment sufficient to restrain him, if possible, and if not, at least to warn others, whose virtue and whose principles may not be very strong, from falling into a like error.

The honorable Senator says that it is very clear, upon looking at the report which has been made here of the number of whippings inflicted for drunkenness and other offences, that this punishment is useless and does no good, and is therefore unnecessary. Is that a proper conclusion? Is it one justly drawn? Can it stand the test of examination? Suppose that a man should come forward and call upon society to abolish all punishments, and trust to the genial influence of moral suasion to prevent those who have a disposition to put their fingers into their neighbors' pockets and take their neighbors' pocket-books, or those who desire to steal horses, getting over their neighbors' hedges, or those who are bloodthirsty from cutting their neighbors' throats, it seems to me that he might offer precisely the same argument for abolishing all punishments. He would take up the criminal calendars which show how many men were punished for stealing, how many were punished for murder, and say: "These punishments are of no avail—they have done no good, and therefore no punishment should be inflicted." No man supposes for one moment, that any institutions of society would ever prevent the occurrence of crime. But before we come to the conclusion of the Senator, we must ascertain what would have been the condition of things in the Navy, and the condition of things in society in the case I have taken, if all legal restraint were removed. Now the spirit of evil would rise refreshed, like a giant refreshed with wine. It would go forth for destruction and ruin upon all the best interests of society and social order. The Senator's argument proves this—if it proves anything—that the system of punishment, severe as it was, was not more than adequate to preserve a tolerably sound and healthy condition in the naval branch of the service, and, in my opinion, it proves nothing more.

Sir, I shall be extremely glad to see a state of things in which our officers would conduct our ships over the wide surface of the ocean, and that the service should be carried on always, and in all circumstances, by free and willing minds; and that under the stars and stripes there should never be a necessity for resorting to any punishment. We would all rejoice at it. I should be extremely glad to believe that the particular punishment alluded to can be dispensed with; but it does not help forward the consideration whether it ought to be dispensed with or not, to say that it is treating the sailor like a slave. That, I admit, conveys to the mind something shocking and terrible. Why, the honorable Senator would not at all object to confining the sailor who had been guilty of misbehavior in irons or in double irons. I think it would be extremely difficult to show how a man could exhibit more the appearance of slavery than with his hands and legs manacled with double irons, and he himself locked up in prison on board ship. It would not be thought right, if I objected to that punishment, to say, that putting a man in irons was treating him like a slave. In one sense of the word, whenever we seize an offender and restrain him in the exercise of his liberty, we are treating him like a slave, but we are treating him like a slave, because he has shown himself to need such treatment. We take from him that liberty which he has abused—he shows that he is not worthy to exercise the freedom of heaven, and we are obliged to take away some of his privileges.

Doubtless there have been men who have been so happily constituted in the command of an armed force as to be able to lead about their troops, as it were, by a charm. There may have been men under whose command punishment was unnecessary. The poet has told us of the gallant General Wolfe, that "his example had a magnet's force, and all were swift to follow whom all loved." Still, if the general who commands the army be not that attracting magnet which induces his men to follow him from love, the interest, not of the officers but of the country, requires that the men should be made to follow him from fear. Why, the poets tell us that the herds voluntarily followed Orpheus when he moved through the fields; but the ordinary herdsmen of that day were under the necessity of carrying goads to drive before them their reluctant steers.

We cannot argue from these particular instances; we must adapt our law to the general condition and character of mankind; and I think it would be as unwise to speculate upon the capacity of officers of the Navy superseding stringent and effectual punishment by attracting the love of their sailors towards them, as it would be if any unfortunate herdsmen in ancient times had said he would take a flute or a fiddle, throw away his thong, go out into the fields, and endeavor by piping to induce his cows and kine to follow him home to their pasture.

Upon the subject of this petition I will say this—although I was myself entirely opposed to the change in the law made by the last Congress—made, as we all know, in a manner irregular and not according to what are or should be the usages of sound legislation, by thrusting in an amendment upon a general appropriation bill—the civil and diplomatic bill—a proviso to abolish the punishment of flogging in the Navy; although, as you well knew, Mr. President, a vast number of petitions and applications upon this subject had been received by the Senate, and had been referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and as I knew that committee had been diligently engaged in collecting information from every quarter whence it could be obtained, and were exceedingly desirous to present to the Senate some measure of improvement which, while it preserved the power of the officer in circumstances where it was necessary to use the lash, should, at the same time, prevent its hasty and ill-tempered or excessive application; and while we had the materials ready to make a report on the subject after having paid such attention and vigilance to the subject as we had hoped might make it worthy the consideration of the Senate, this was put into the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill without any inquiry except a moment's discussion in the Chamber and was passed—although this measure was thus put, I, for one, am not for touching it now.

I want our policy on the subject to become settled. We have become dissatisfied with our past experience. The glories of the Navy, the admirable state in which it has always maintained itself and performed its duties towards the country under the ancient discipline, have not been sufficient to induce Congress to trust it as it was. They have abolished flogging in the Navy. Now, I want no frequent changes in the discipline of the Navy. I want the problem worked out by actual experiment whether this species of punishment is necessary to the Navy or not. We can only ascertain this by waiting and seeing what is the operation of the present system. If it shall prove to be entirely inadequate—if the punishment shall be seen by the country to be absolutely necessary—if it shall be restored with proper safeguards against its abuse if those safeguards did not exist before—then it will be restored by a community satisfied that the punishment is necessary, and then we may hope to have some rest, and escape from further agitation on the subject. That is my view; and, therefore, for my own part, I have no disposition to see the subject contained in that memorial further prosecuted at this session of the Senate. If the honorable Senator from New Jersey prefers it, I, for one, am perfectly willing that the petition shall lie on the table without being called up again. I want no hasty changes backwards and forwards on this subject. I assure that Senator, and every other Senator, that, if the naval service can be carried on with efficiency, and its character maintained, without that punishment, I will be as reluctant to see it restored as any member of this body. I was opposed to abolishing it because I believed it necessary to retain it. If it shall be found that it is not necessary, I shall be as strongly opposed as the Senator from New Jersey to restoring it. I am indifferent whether the petition goes to the Committee on Naval Affairs, or remains on the table without further action by the Senate.

Mr. STOCKTON. Mr. President, I have been accustomed heretofore to look to the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BADGER] for direction and counsel in important matters. I have always had great pleasure in considering him not only my friend, but worthy of the most entire confidence and respect; but however much I may regard him individually—however much I may esteem his great learning and acquirements, I must say to the Senate, even at the risk of being thought quite presumptuous, that I do not think that the Senator from North Carolina has treated my remarks with his usual candor and fairness. He has stated my arguments in his own way, and then unceremoniously declares, that I have myself refuted them. His speech seems to have been characterized by a degree of sentimental levity not altogether in good taste. It appears to me that under the circumstances, I had a right to expect something more kind and considerate from the honorable Senator. Certainly the attempt to turn my argument into ridicule was the last thing I should have expected from him.

Mr. BADGER. I beg pardon of the Senator. I intended no such thing.

Mr. STOCKTON. I thought the gentleman intended to do so.

The gentleman at a moment took advantage of the opportunity to display to the Senate, at the expense of my argument, the versatility of his genius, and his classical erudition. As far as it was agreeable to him, I am glad that he had the opportunity to do so. But, sir, there is nothing, in my judgment, which the Senator said worthy of a reply from me, except one remark. In referring to my remark, that when the sailor was flogged he was scourged like a slave, the honorable Senator intimated that I was claiming more for the sailor than he was justly entitled to. Sir, all that I ask for the American sailor is, that he shall be treated like an American citizen. I have asked for nothing more. Now, I would inquire of the Senator if American citizens are generally scourged?

Mr. BADGER. Certainly they are.

Mr. STOCKTON. They may be in North Carolina. I believe it is said that that State is a little behind the age.

Mr. BADGER. And in Virginia and Delaware. Most respectable company for North Carolina.

Mr. STOCKTON. I shall say nothing about Delaware, and I have no knowledge of flogging being allowed in Virginia. But I say, that the American citizen in the other States of the Union is elevated high above the scourge. All I ask is, that the American sailor should be treated like any other American freeman, and not punished like a slave. The slave is, perhaps, as universally punished by the lash, when he deserves it, as the American freeman is exempt from such a punishment. Therefore it was that I said that an American freeman as he was, the American sailor ought not to be scourged like a slave. Now, I would ask the honorable Senator whether he would have the punishment of the lash inflicted upon the freemen of the United States generally? If the honorable Senator is prepared to say that he is willing to have this punishment inflicted on all the citizens of the United States, there may be some consistency in his position.

Mr. BADGER. Does the gentleman wish me to answer that question?

Mr. STOCKTON. Certainly, if you see fit.

Mr. BADGER. Then I would say that I am totally opposed to any law for whipping all of the citizens of the United States, for we should be brought into the difficulty of being citizens of the United States. With regard to the subject of punishing offences, I am very well satisfied that the system of punishment prescribed by the laws of the United States, prevails over the citizens of the United States; and I am very well satisfied that the system prescribed by law, prevails over those citizens of the United States who are sailors. I would ask the Senator, if he intends that the sailors shall have all the privileges of citizens of the United States? Does he intend that bills shall be found against them by grand-juries, and they be brought to trial before judge and jury?

Mr. STOCKTON. I should be very glad if sailors could have the benefit of a trial by jury. The Senator says wisely, that he does not want all the citizens of the United States scourged. He does not wish to be scourged himself, nor does he wish that the Executive Department of this Government, nor the members of the two Houses of Congress, should be scourged. Now, sir, let him tell us why a Senator should not be flogged as well as a sailor. Or why any other public servant, as well as the sailor, should not be scourged. Especially let him tell us, why the defrauders of the Government—those men who rob the public Treasury—should not be scourged as well as the sailor.

The honorable Senator knew, when he began this argument, that he had no good cause, but, lawyer-like, he has worked all round the circle, and at last got back to the very same place from which he started. He now says, that he is not willing to restore the lash at present; therefore, Mr. President, I move that it is inexpedient to grant the prayer of the petitioners.

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. President, as one of the Committee on Naval Affairs, it is my misfortune to differ with the honorable Senator from New Jersey. The views which he has advanced so eloquently, came upon me very unexpectedly. I have been familiar with the Navy for some twenty-odd years, and in interest in the Navy, I can yield to no Senator on this floor. I have some views, which I could wish to express on this matter, but as it is now the usual hour of adjournment, if the Senate will indulge me, I would express those views to-morrow morning. I therefore now move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. GWIN. I hope the Senator will withdraw that motion, inasmuch as I wish to submit a few remarks on the subject at this time.

Mr. MALLORY. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. GWIN. I was absent when the Senator from New Jersey concluded his speech. I wish to make some few remarks upon this subject, but I am not now prepared to go into the discussion of this question, for a document which I called for and hoped would be on our tables some days ago, has only been placed before us this morning, and I have had no opportunity to examine it.

Several SENATORS entreated the honorable gentleman to yield the floor, as it was the usual hour of adjournment.

Mr. GWIN. I will yield the floor, then, to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. President, I again move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. DOWNS. Will the Senator from Florida withdraw the motion for a moment?

Mr. MALLORY. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. DOWNS. I have been prepared for two or three days to make a speech on the compromise resolutions. I expected that I should have had an opportunity to make that speech before this, and therefore I would ask the honorable Senator to move to postpone this subject until the day after to-morrow, so that I can have the floor for to-morrow.

Mr. MALLORY. I move, then, to postpone the further consideration of this memorial until the day after to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT. That will be Friday, the day which has been set apart for the consideration of private bills.

Mr. PRATT. I would remark to the Senator from Florida, that the only difficulty is, that Friday has been already appropriated to a specific purpose—the consideration of private bills; therefore if Monday would be agreeable to the Senator, I would move to postpone the further consideration of the memorial until that day.

Mr. MALLORY. Friday or Monday—it is indifferent to me.

The motion to postpone until Monday was then agreed to.

ANNIVERSARY OF THE BATTLE OF NEW ORLEANS.

Mr. BADGER. I would like to seize a single moment to call the attention of the Senate to a subject which I am afraid may escape their observation. To-morrow is the 8th of January, the anniversary of the victory of New Orleans. The other House, I believe, in accordance with usage has adjourned over until the day after to-morrow. We should not be behind them in respect for the day. As some of my Democratic friends do not like to take the responsibility of making this motion, I move that when the Senate adjourns it adjourn to meet on Friday.

The motion was agreed to.

BILLS FROM THE HOUSE.

The bill from the House of Representatives to admit a certain vessel to registry, was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The House bill in relation to a certain lot of ground in the town of Guadenhutton, in the State of Ohio, was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

WILLIAM DARBY'S RELIEF BILL.

The engrossed bill for the relief of William Darby was read the third time and passed.

The Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, January 7, 1852.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

A message was received from the Senate, by ASBURY DICKINS, their Secretary, informing the House that the Senate had passed the bill of the House, entitled "An act making an appropriation to meet the expenses which were incurred in consequence of the late fire at the Capitol."

Mr. BRIGGS moved that when the House adjourns, it adjourn to meet on Friday next.

The question was taken, and it was agreed to.

Mr. HOUSTON. My object in rising now is to make a suggestion to the House, that the few minutes left before the special order of the day is executed be appropriated, by universal consent, to the reception of bills from all gentlemen who have bills to offer, for the purpose of referring them to committees. I have no bills myself to offer at all, but I know that there are several gentlemen here who have. I move, then, that universal consent be given.

[Cries of "Agreed!" "Agreed!"]

Mr. CLARK, on leave, introduced a bill for the relief of Edward Brown; which was read the first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. BAYLY. I am directed by the Committee on Foreign Affairs to report back a bill—

Mr. RICHARDSON. I object. The Committee on Foreign Affairs can report at any time.

Mr. BAYLY. I report it, then, upon my individual responsibility.

Mr. BAYLY then, on leave, introduced "A bill for the relief of American citizens lately imprisoned and pardoned by the Queen of Spain;" which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BELL, on leave, introduced a bill to amend an act entitled "An act granting bounty lands to certain officers and soldiers who have been engaged in the military service of the United States," approved September 28, 1850; which was read a first and second time by its title.

Mr. B. I ask that the Clerk shall read a short communication from the Secretary of the Interior. [Cries of "I object!" "I object!"]

Mr. RICHARDSON. I move the reference of the bill to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BELL. I do not wish to take up the time of the House. It is a general act, and I make this motion for the purpose of having the communication printed. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

It was so ordered.

Mr. LOCKHART, on leave, introduced a bill "granting the right of way and making a donation of land to the States of Indiana and Illinois, in aid of the construction of a railroad from New Albany, in the State of Indiana, via Mount Carmel, on the Wabash river, to Alton, in the State of Illinois;" which was read the first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas, on leave, introduced a bill "granting to the States of Arkansas and Missouri the right of way and a portion of the public lands, to aid in the construction of a railroad from St. Louis, Missouri, via Little Rock, to a certain point on Red river, near the town of Fullerton, in Arkansas, and for branches thereto;" which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. SIBLEY, on leave, introduced a bill providing for the survey of the Mississippi river above the Falls of St. Anthony; which was read a first and second time by its title.

Mr. S. moved that it be referred to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. DUNHAM said that all other bills of this kind had gone to the Committee on Roads and Canals. He moved its reference to that committee.

The question was first taken upon Mr. SIBLEY's motion, and it was not agreed to.

The question was then taken upon Mr. DUNHAM's motion, and it was agreed to.

So the bill was referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Virginia, on leave, introduced a bill to provide for the survey of artificial sites for reservoirs, to be constructed in the main affluence of the Ohio river, in accordance with the plan submitted to Congress by Charles Ellet, jr., and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Mr. POLK. I rise to a privileged question. The hour is approaching when the order of the House is to be executed, and I have a motion which I desire to submit. I will, however, give way to enable gentlemen to get in their bills, with the understanding that I shall have the opportunity to submit my privileged motion.

Mr. HENN, on leave, introduced a bill to create three additional land offices in the State of Iowa; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. H. also introduced a bill to continue half pay to certain widows and orphans; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. McMULLIN, on leave, introduced a bill making grants, on certain conditions, to the Virginia and Tennessee Railroad Company, to aid in the construction of their railroad; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. McMULLIN. I rise to a privileged question, and I desire the attention of every gentleman present—

Mr. POLK. I rise to a point of order. [Great laughter and confusion in the Hall.] By universal consent, as I understood it, I was to be allowed to make the motion that the ladies be allowed to occupy seats within the bar. [Laughter.] The gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. McMULLIN,] I believe, is about to make that motion. He is going to take the wind out of my sails. [Roars of laughter, and great confusion.] I find, Mr. Speaker, to treat this question seriously—

Mr. BISSELL. I call the gentleman to order.

Mr. POLK. Will the gentleman reduce his point of order to writing? [Laughter.]

Mr. BISSELL. My point of order is, that there is no question before the House.

The SPEAKER. By unanimous consent the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. McMULLIN,] can submit his motion; but not otherwise.

Mr. McMULLIN. I ask most respectfully that the House of Representatives shall be as courteous and respectful to the ladies of our country as was the Senate of the United States; and that, by the unanimous consent of the House, the ladies be permitted to appear within the bar of the House and witness the ceremonies of the day.

There being no objection, it was so ordered.

The doors were then thrown open, and the vacant space outside the bar was soon filled with ladies. Many were also introduced within the bar, the members vacating their seats for that purpose.

Mr. COBB, on leave, introduced the following bills; which were severally read a first and second time by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands:

A bill granting the right of way and alternate sections of the public lands to the State of Alabama, for the purpose of constructing a railroad from Selma to the Tennessee river, in said State;

A bill granting the right of way and making a grant of public lands to the States of Mississippi and Alabama, to aid in the construction of the Memphis and Tennessee railroad; and

A bill to graduate and improve the price of the public lands belonging to the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. PHELPS, on leave, introduced a bill to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the payment of horses and other property lost or destroyed in the military service of the United States," approved March 3, 1849; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. FOWLER, on leave, introduced a bill for regulating the mileage of members of the Senate and House of Representatives; which was read a first and second time by its title.

Mr. F. moved that the bill be referred to the Committee on Mileage.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I object to that motion. When this matter is referred, I want another matter to go with it, and that is the payment of members after the time for which they have been elected has expired.

Mr. FOWLER. I will withdraw my motion for the present.

The motion was withdrawn.

Mr. BISSELL, on leave, introduced a bill making a grant of public land to the several States of the Union, for the benefit of indigent insane persons; which was read a first and second time by its title.

Mr. B. moved that the bill be referred to a select committee of five.

Mr. HALL moved to refer it to the Committee on Public Lands.

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

PUBLISHED AT WASHINGTON, BY JOHN C. RIVES.—TERMS $3 FOR THIS SESSION.

32D CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 10, 1852.

NEW SERIES... No. 15.

The SPEAKER. The question must first be taken upon the motion of the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. BISSELL. I hope that motion will not be persisted in.

The SPEAKER. If debate arise, the Chair will have to rule that the bill must lie over.

Mr. BISSELL. I do not propose to debate it. The question was then taken on Mr. HALL's motion; and it was agreed to.

So the bill was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. HALL moved to reconsider the vote on referring the bill, and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. DOTY, on leave, introduced a bill to establish an Agricultural Bureau in the Department of the Interior; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Illinois, on leave, introduced a bill for the improvement of the Rock Island and Des Moines Rapids in the Mississippi river; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Mr. MOORE, of Louisiana, on leave, introduced a bill granting the right of way and making a grant of lands to the States of Louisiana, Mississippi, and Arkansas, to aid in the construction of certain railroads; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CONGER, on leave, introduced a bill to provide for the construction of a ship canal around the Falls of the St. Marie river, at the foot of Lake Superior; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Mr. BROWN, of Mississippi, on leave, introduced a bill granting the right of way and making a donation of public lands in aid of the construction of a railroad from the city of New Orleans, in the State of Louisiana, to Jackson, in the State of Mississippi; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee, on leave, introduced a bill to encourage agriculture, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time by its title.

Mr. J. then moved to postpone the further consideration of the bill until the first Monday in February, and that it be made the special order for that day.

Mr. ORR objected.

The bill was therefore laid on the Speaker's table.

Mr. HASCALL, on leave, introduced a bill authorizing the names of certain revolutionary officers and soldiers to be placed on the pension list; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

Mr. DEAN, by unanimous consent, introduced the following resolution; which was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a post route from Fishkill village, in Dutchess county, through Brinkerhoff, Johnsville, Oregonville, Gay, Head, and Cortlandville, to Stormville, in said county.

Mr. JACKSON, on leave, introduced a bill for the removal of obstructions in the river Savannah, in the State of Georgia, and for the improvement of the same; which was read a first and second time by its title.

Mr. J. moved to refer the bill to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. DUNHAM moved that it be referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

The SPEAKER stated that the question would first be taken on the motion of the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. JACKSON.]

Mr. JACKSON demanded tellers on that motion; and they were ordered.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee, (it being now ten minutes to one o'clock,) said that it must be apparent to gentlemen that it was utterly impracticable to divide the House at the present moment, and he would therefore suggest that all further business be suspended until the order of the House should have been executed. It wanted but a few moments to one o'clock—the time fixed for the introduction of M. Kossuth.

The suggestion was concurred in; and, by general consent, all further business was suspended until the hour of one o'clock arrived.

RECEPTION OF LOUIS KOSSUTH.

M. LOUIS KOSSUTH, escorted by the Committee of Reception, and followed by his suite, entered the Hall and advanced up the aisle in front of the Speaker—the members of the House generally rising to receive him.

Mr. CARTER (the chairman of the Committee of Reception) then addressed the Speaker as follows:

Mr. SPEAKER: We have the honor to present Governor LOUIS KOSSUTH to the House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER. As the organ of this body I have the honor to extend to LOUIS KOSSUTH a cordial welcome to the House of Representatives of the United States.

M. KOSSUTH replied in the following words:

SIR: It is a remarkable fact in the history of mankind that while, through all the past, honors were bestowed upon glory, and glory was attached only to success, the legislative authorities of this great Republic bestow the highest honors upon a persecuted exile, not conspicuous by glory, nor favored by success, but engaged in a just cause. There is a triumph of republican principles in this fact.

Sir, in my own and my country's name I thank the House of Representatives of the United States for the honor of this cordial welcome.

M. KOSSUTH was then conducted by the Committee to a chair which had been prepared for him.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. For the purpose of giving the members of the House of Representatives an opportunity to pay their respects to the distinguished guest of the House, I move that we now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to, and the House adjourned until Friday.

The Representatives were then presented by the Speaker and Committee of Reception to M. Kossuth, as were also the immense crowd of ladies and gentlemen who had assembled upon the occasion.

PETITIONS, &c.

The following petitions, memorials, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. STUART: The petition of the citizens of Albion, Michigan, praying that Congress will make suitable provision for the erection of a line of telegraph from Fort Independence to some eligible point on the Pacific coast, by the passage of a law that will protect and encourage the telegraphic inventions of American citizens.

Also, the petition of the Board of Education of the State of Michigan, praying for a grant of lands to them equal in value to certain salt spring lands heretofore granted to said State and erroneously confirmed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

F and Seventeenth streets, in Washington city, now rented of him by the Government.

Mr. BAYARD presented a petition of citizens of Pennsylvania and Delaware, praying an appropriation for the repair of the piers at Port Penn, in the Delaware river; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, a memorial of the Commissioners of the town of Newcastle, Delaware, praying an appropriation for the improvement of the harbor at that place; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CLARKE. I am requested to present to the Senate a petition signed by a large number of merchants and underwriters in the State of Rhode Island, asking Congress to make provision by law for the survey of such parts of the China seas, Straits of Gaspar, and Java sea, as lie directly in the track of vessels proceeding to and from China. I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Commerce; and I beg leave to suggest to the committee that some provision should also be made to facilitate our trade in the North Pacific, so as to change the course of that trade, which now has to pass around Cape Horn to California, and thence to China.

The memorial was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HAMLIN. I am instructed to present to the Senate a memorial signed by the journeymen bookbinders of the city of Washington, in which they set forth their views at length why no contract should be made for the binding of the public documents. That matter has been considered by the Committee on Printing, and there is a resolution now before the Senate proposing to make a contract. Inasmuch as the committee have acted upon the matter, I move that the memorial lie upon the table, with a notice which I shall now give that when the subject shall come up for consideration before the Senate, I shall move the reading of that memorial, that the reasons stated by the bookbinders may be thus presented to the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SHIELDS presented a petition of citizens of Washington, in the District of Columbia, praying the incorporation of the Eagle Steamboat Company; which was referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion by Mr. WADE, it was Ordered, That leave be given to withdraw the petition of Joseph Venzie.

On motion by Mr. CLARKE, it was Ordered, That the memorial of Edward Dexter, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Finance.

On motion by Mr. MASON, it was Ordered, That the petition of William D. Porter, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

On motion by Mr. MASON, it was Ordered, That the memorial of the heirs of Caleb Swann, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee of Claims.

On motion by Mr. MASON, it was Ordered, That the petition of the Pioneer Cotton Manufacturing Company of Georgetown, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

On motion by Mr. BRADBURY, it was Ordered, That the documents on the files of the Senate relating to the claims of the States of Maine and Massachusetts against the United States under the treaty of 9th August, 1812, between the United States and Great Britain, be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

On motion by Mr. PRATT, it was Ordered, That the Committee of Claims be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Colonel John C. Hays, and that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

On motion by Mr. NORRIS, it was Ordered, That the memorial of Combs Greenwell, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee of Claims.

STATE OF THE SURVEYS.

Mr. SHIELDS submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be directed to employ a draftsman to mark and lay down on the maps now in the room of the Committee on Public Lands the state of the surveys, and also show what has been disposed of by sale or otherwise. The rate of compensation for the service shall be the same as that of a clerk not exceeding $1,800 per annum.

NOTICES OF BILLS.

Mr. BAYARD gave notice that he should ask leave to introduce a bill concerning the sessions of the courts of the United States within the State of Delaware.

Mr. BRODHEAD gave notice that he should ask leave to introduce a bill for the payment of outstanding loan office and final settlement certificates issued for money loaned, or for services, or for supplies during the revolutionary war.

Mr. GEYER gave notice that he should ask leave to introduce a bill declaring the assent of Congress to the State of Missouri to impose taxes on lands hereafter sold by the United States in said State, from and after the day of sale.

Mr. BORLAND gave notice that he should ask leave to introduce a bill to grant a quantity of the public land to the State of Arkansas, to aid in the construction of a railroad from the Mississippi river to the western boundary of Arkansas, by the Helena and Fort Smith Railroad Company.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. CLEMENS, agreeably to previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill for the relief of Thomas Snodgrass; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. PEARCE, agreeably to previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill for the relief of Sarah D. McKay, widow of Lieutenant Colonel McKay; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CLARKE, agreeably to previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill to remit or refund duties on goods, wares, and merchandise destroyed by fire; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BORLAND, agreeably to previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill to amend the act approved March 2, 1851, entitled "An act to provide for the punishment of offences committed in cutting, destroying, or removing live-oak and other timber or trees reserved for naval purposes;" which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

REPORTS FROM STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. BAYARD, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of H. P. Dorsey, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill for the relief of Theodore Oslutt, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report on the subject, which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. HUNTER, from the Committee on Public Buildings, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill to provide a room for the Congressional Library; which was read a first and second time by its title, and considered as in Committee of the Whole; and no amendment being made, it was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and subsequently it was read a third time and passed.

The bill simply appropriates the sum of $1,200, to be expended under the direction of the Superintendent of the Public Buildings, to fit up a room temporarily for the reception of a portion of the books of the Congressional Library.

Mr. WADE, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of A. H. Cole, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which was read a first time and passed to a second reading.

Mr. BAYARD, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the petition of James Dunning, reported a bill for his relief; which was read a first time and passed to the second reading.

MAIL SERVICE IN CALIFORNIA AND OREGON.

Mr. RUSK. The Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads have instructed me to report a joint resolution of the Senate and House of Representatives to authorize the Postmaster General to legalize certain contracts for the transportation of the mails in California and Oregon. As this is a matter of some importance, I hope there will be no objection to its being considered now, and I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to that end.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution as in Committee of the Whole, and no amendment being offered, it was reported to the Senate.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to have some explanation of this resolution.

Mr. RUSK. The object of the resolution is fully explained in the report of the Postmaster General to Congress, both at the last and the present session. Contracts were made in California and Oregon at the same time and under the same circumstances as contracts were made elsewhere. A proposition was before Congress last session authorizing contracts to be opened by the agent in California, and the contracts to be made there. Owing to the confusion which prevailed at the close of the session, this amendment to the Post Office bill was not adopted. These contracts have been made by the agent and the postmasters in California and Oregon, containing a stipulation that they might be set aside if it should be desired by the Postmaster General, inasmuch as they did not reach here by the stipulated time. All the mails are carried there by contract at this time, and at a rate of some forty or fifty per cent. cheaper than formerly. The Postmaster General has recommended that these contracts be confirmed; and if they are confirmed, they will remain in force until the year 1854. If they are rejected, new contracts will have to be made, and a large additional expense will undoubtedly be incurred in the transportation of these mails.

The resolution was ordered to be read a third time.

RESOLUTIONS.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolutions submitted by Mr. WALKER the 17th December, concerning the relations of the United States with foreign nations; and,

On motion by Mr. WALKER, it was Ordered, That the further consideration thereof be postponed until to-morrow.

PRIVATE CLAIMS.

On the 22d of December last, the Senate adopted the following resolution:

Resolved, That after the 1st day of January next, Fridays of each week shall be set aside for the consideration of private claims, and that on those days private bills have priority over all other business.

The PRESIDENT, after the presentation of executive communications this morning announced to the Senate, that under that resolution this day had been set apart for the consideration of private claims.

Mr. HAMLIN. Does that include the morning hour?

The PRESIDENT. The resolution is comprehensive so as to cover the whole.

Mr. CLEMENS. I ask leave to introduce a private bill of which notice has been given.

The PRESIDENT. It is not in order according to the resolution, which requires that we shall proceed in the order as laid down by the calendar.

Mr. SHIELDS. I hold in my hand a private petition which I wish to present.

The PRESIDENT. It cannot be presented.

Mr. HUNTER. Is it not competent to postpone that business, or would it require a suspension of the rule?

The PRESIDENT. It is an order of the Senate, and not a rule which requires notice to change it. The execution of the order of the Senate may be postponed by a majority of the Senate.

Mr. HUNTER. I move, then, that the execution of that order be suspended until one o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

When the hour of one o'clock arrived, the consideration of private claims was announced as the special order.

Mr. GWIN. I am entirely in favor of the consideration of these private claims; but we have no calendar, and it is very important that we should have one, that we may know what the bills are before they are called. I hope the chairman of the Committee on Private Claims will consent that these bills be passed by until we have a calendar, and that the special order may be postponed, that we may go on with other business. It is important that we have a calendar. We cannot act understandingly upon these bills without one.

Mr. BRODHEAD. It will not afford you any information.

Mr. GWIN. I cannot act understandingly without one; and if we postpone the special order now, by next Friday we can be prepared and ready to consider these bills. I hope we shall go on with the consideration of the resolution relating to printing the returns of the Seventh Census.

Mr. BRODHEAD. I do not feel at liberty to consent, nor do I know that my consent is necessary. The Senate can dispose of the motion of the Senator from California as it pleases.

Mr. PRATT. The objection of my friend from California is, that we have no calendar printed. Now, I do not know that we can learn from the calendar anything about the character of a bill, or the propriety of its passage. Bills are upon our tables as well as the reports of committees, and I suppose that the reading of these reports will give the principle upon which the committees have reported. From these reports we may judge, but certainly not from the calendar. I do not think the reason assigned by my honorable friend is such as to make it necessary that we should postpone this matter. It is now the first time within three years that the Senate of the United States have made an effort to devote one day in the week to doing justice to claimants against this Government; and this very first day that we propose to consider these claims, a motion is made to postpone their consideration because there is no calendar ready. I hope we shall show the whole country that we are determined, upon this day, to devote ourselves to the passage or rejection of as many of these bills as we can dispose of.

The PRESIDENT. There is no motion now before the Senate.

Mr. GWIN. Then I will make the motion that the order of the Senate, in relation to private claims, be postponed, in order to proceed to the consideration of the resolution in relation to the printing of the returns of the Seventh Census.

Mr. BRADBURY. I certainly am not disposed to interpose any objection to the consideration of private claims, whenever we are in a situation to examine them. I was in favor, and am still in favor, of the rule which was adopted, setting apart a particular day for their consideration. On a former occasion I gave my reason for favoring that rule, which was, that by this regulation we might have our attention particularly directed to the consideration of cases of that character. By an examination of the calendar we could ascertain what cases were to come up, and then, by a reference to the reports upon these cases, we should understand something of their merits. I do not agree with the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. PRATT,] that the calendar is of no service; on the contrary, I regard it as highly important. We all know that there is such a multiplicity of business presented to the consideration of the Senate, that we resolve ourselves into a sort of chancery court to consider private claims—a work which we are almost incompetent properly to perform; that there is such a large number of these claims, that it is impossible to investigate everything; but by a reference to the calendar, we can give our special attention to the cases which are first to come up on the day set apart for their consideration. I am, therefore, inclined to favor the motion of the Senator from California, to postpone the execution of this order till Friday next. We can probably have a calendar by that time, and have an opportunity to look into the cases which are to come up, and do justice to honest claimants, while at the same time we scrutinize all those cases which may be of a doubtful character.

Mr. BAYARD. The Senate, some time back, adopted a rule the object of which was to facilitate the transaction of business of a certain character. Now if we are to repudiate that rule on the grounds which have been urged to-day, it will be just as liable to be repudiated on other grounds which may be urged on other occasions. If we do not now adhere to this rule which was adopted by the Senate after much discussion, we might as well abandon it altogether. I confess I am unable to see the force of the argument in relation to having a printed calendar. I presume that the bills relating to private claims stand in their order upon the regular calendar of the Senate, and there can be no difficulty in taking them up in the order in which they there stand. You take them up on other days in that order; and there is no reason now, when you have excluded other business from being disposed of on this day, that I can discover, nor any want of sufficient means of obtaining the necessary information so as to act upon the private bills which have been brought into the Senate and reported upon. I am decidedly in favor of any system which, as far as practicable, tends to subdivide and appropriate to particular times particular classes of labor. For this reason I think that this reversing of a former order of the Senate, deliberately made, and that, too, on the very first occasion of its being acted upon, will have a bad effect, and tend to make the order a mere nullity.

Mr. GWIN. I made this motion for the purpose of advancing the action of the Senate in regard to private claims. For myself I confess that I have not hitherto had time to examine these claims. If we had a calendar we could examine the bills as they would have to come up in their order. I doubt whether the Committee of Claims will ever report a bill which I shall vote against, because they are close in their investigations. But at the same time it is the duty of the officers of the Senate to furnish a calendar, in order that we may know the business of the session. We ask for the reading of reports simply because these reports are not in the recollection of any Senators except, perhaps, those who made them; and I have asked that we may have a calendar, on the ground that we would make much greater progress on this day week than we would on to-day and this day week together without a calendar. There are a great many bills of this kind, and I am as anxious to have them considered and disposed of as any Senator can be. Now there is a question which has been discussed by the Senate at great length, and which might probably be disposed of to-day—I mean the question in regard to the printing of the Seventh Census; and there is another question which the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. Downs] has been waiting from day to day to discuss. Either of these questions might be brought up and disposed of while the Senate is getting ready to dispose of these private claims. I made the motion with no other object than to facilitate the business of the Senate, because I want these bills out of the way as soon as possible.

Mr. WADE. Will it be in order to move to lay the motion offered by the Senator from California on the table?

The PRESIDENT. It will be in order.

Mr. WADE. I fear that we shall not make much progress with anything if we go on in this way; and I therefore move to lay the motion on the table.

Mr. PRATT. I wish to say only a single word, and perhaps the Senator from Ohio will oblige me by withdrawing that motion for a few moments.

Mr. WADE. I withdraw it.

Mr. PRATT. We have now occupied nearly half an hour—

Mr. GWIN. Oh no; only ten minutes.

Mr. PRATT. Very well. Ten minutes, then, we have occupied in discussing the question suggested by the Senator from California. Now, the last argument of that Senator is, that if we do not act upon these private bills to-day, but postpone our action until Friday next, we shall do more on that day than we should do both to-day and next Friday, when the calendar will be ready.

Mr. GWIN. So I think; that is, on the supposition that we have no calendar before us.

Mr. PRATT. But the argument proceeds on the supposition that a calendar will be prepared by next Friday; and then, that if we do not act upon these claims to-day, we can do more on Friday next than we can do on both days together. Now, I cannot see the force of that argument. If the question is to be taken on the motion of the Senator from California, I desire that we may have the yeas and nays, so that the country may see whether Senators are willing to postpone action further in reference to claims of this character. The Senator has remarked that he does not know that the committee will ever report a bill for which he will not vote. The inclination is rather to protect the Government than the individual. I think the reverse should be the case, and that where an individual presents a prima facie case of an honest claim, they investigate it with all the scrutiny they can give.

Mr. GWIN. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. PRATT. Very well, sir.

CASE OF WILLIAM P. GREEN.

The Senate then proceeded, as in Committee of the Whole, to the consideration of a bill for the relief of William P. Green.

Mr. CLARKE. Mr. President, I beg leave to say to the Senate, that at the last session that bill was passed by the Senate without a dissenting voice. The bill is founded on a claim for services performed by him under an appointment as an officer of this Government. In 1849 he received the appointment of collector of the port of Providence, and he received a subsequent appointment as measurer of salt, and that appointment was sanctioned by the Secretary of the Treasury. It was afterwards ascertained by the Secretary that the two offices of surveyor of customs and measurer of salt were incompatible. The duties of the two offices were performed by him, and though he would have received the ordinary fees, amounting to but little more than three hundred dollars, the Secretary of the Treasury was obliged to disallow them. The collector had no other recourse than to apply to Congress for relief. I suppose the circumstances are all well understood, and I presume there will be no objection on the part of any member to the passage of the bill.

The bill was then reported to the Senate, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

CASE OF JOHN A. MCGAW.

The Senate then proceeded, as in Committee of the Whole, to the consideration of a bill for the relief of John A. McGaw.

Mr. HAMLIN. This bill received the favorable action of the Senate last year, and I believe the unanimous vote of the Senate, after a slight discussion upon it. If there be any necessity for an explanation after the reading of the report, a few remarks will place the matter distinctly before the Senate.

The bill was designed to pay to McGaw the sum of $1,400 for demurrage—$100 a day for fourteen days, while his vessel was detained at Vera Cruz, by the default of the agents of the United States.

The report was accordingly read. There being no proposition to amend the bill, it was reported to the Senate, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

REPRESENTATIVE OF WM. A. SLACUM.

The Senate proceeded, as in Committee of the Whole, to consider the bill for the relief of the personal representative of Wm. A. Slacum.

The bill enacts that the proper accounting officers of the Treasury be authorized to settle and adjust the accounts of the late Wm. A. Slacum, and pay his personal representative, in addition to what Mr. Slacum received in his lifetime, his charges for expenses incurred in visiting the Columbia river in pursuance of the direction of the Secretary of State, in the years 1836 and '37, provided that the amount allowed for such expenses shall not exceed the sum of $712 90; and also to pay his said representative for services rendered to the United States by Mr. Slacum on that mission, at the rate of six dollars per diem, commencing the first day of June, 1836, and continuing to the 15th day of March, 1837, provided, however, that the amount of pay received by Mr. Slacum, as purser in the Navy of the United States, during the period of time embraced in the above dates, be deducted from the amount of said per diem allowance.

Mr. MANGUM. I suppose that no explanation of this case is necessary. If any gentleman requires it, I will call for the reading of the report of the committee. That bill has passed the Senate three or four times, after a very full examination by the late Mr. Sevier, who was at the head of the Committee on Foreign Relations; and I think it was reported with entire unanimity.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, and was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

ELIZABETH ARNOLD.

The bill for the relief of Elizabeth Arnold was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It provides that the Secretary of the Interior be directed to place upon the pension list the name of Elizabeth Arnold, only child of Jonathan Pitcher, a lieutenant in the Navy during the revolutionary war, and pay her during her life twenty dollars per month, to commence December 20, 1851.

Mr. BRODHEAD called for the reading of the report of the Committee on Pensions.

The report was read accordingly, from which it appears that Elizabeth Arnold is the only child of Jonathan Pitcher, of Pawtuxet, in Rhode Island, who was appointed by Congress a lieutenant in the Navy on the 22d of December, 1775, and who rendered highly important services to the country during the revolutionary war; that she is now eighty-three years old; and that in view of the facts before the committee, they have deemed it proper to report a bill for her relief.

Mr. FELCH. I would inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Pensions, what principle is involved in the bill; whether by passing it we shall not be extending pensions to a class of cases which have never been recognized by us heretofore; and whether there are any special circumstances which require a departure from the rule?

Mr. CLARKE. If the chairman of the Committee on Pensions will allow me to state the peculiar circumstances of this case, I will do so. On the 22d of December, 1775, more than six months before the Declaration of Independence by Congress, it is known that a naval force was fitted out in this country, which went upon a cruise and finally took possession of the Island of New Providence, and brought to the country a large amount of the munitions of war. That naval force was fitted out in the waters of Rhode Island; and I may be allowed to say that in my own veins runs the blood of one of its commanders. A selection was made of the most able, experienced, and gallant men that could be found to officer the vessels of the force. Small as those vessels were, imperfectly fitted as they were, the most gallant men that could be selected were got to command them. Among the appointments made—and it is upon the very earliest record of your Government—was that of Jonathan Pitcher, a man whom I myself knew, and who had the universal reputation of being one of the most gallant, patriotic, and daring men that had entered into the service of the country, either on sea or on land. He was one of those men who did not look for his pecuniary reward from the Government. He went into the service from a warm and earnest zeal to sustain the Declaration which had been made by his country. He continued in the service as long as the naval force was sustained by the United States; and in that, as well as in the privateering service, did his whole duty to annoy and destroy the commerce of the enemy. While he was in France, and lieutenant on board the ship Providence, which was commanded by John Paul Jones, Dr. Franklin, I believe, after John Paul Jones had concluded, on account of some other engagement, to leave the vessel, put it under his command to bring it back to the United States. Perhaps in the Navy there might have been found a more accomplished man—he was rough, but honest; perhaps there might have been a more accomplished gentleman, but there was not one who entered into it more zealously, and did more effective service. He made no claims against his Government. He lived and died in a humble situation. He always said that his services were offered to his country, because of love to it and to liberty. He asked no pension for himself, nor any, during his life, for any one connected with him. During the last year, this aged daughter of his, who is his only surviving child, at the advanced age of eighty-three, came to me, and stated to me her totally destitute situation. She had nothing whatever but the recollection of the debt that was due from her country to her father, who so gallantly exposed himself in defence of its liberties, and she did hope that the Congress of the United States would give her this little pittance, which would make her comfortable for the remaining days allotted to her here. That is the situation of this lady; aged and infirm as she is, she cannot long be a tax to this Government, or to any one else in this world. She is now perfectly destitute; and if the services of her father, during the revolutionary war, do not entitle her to this small recompense from this Government and country, which has now grown so strong and rich, I know not what appeal can be made either to our justice or sensibilities. There is the whole case, sir. If any objection can possibly be made to this allowance, I shall be glad to hear it.

Mr. FELCH. I have no doubt of the statement made by the Senator from Rhode Island upon this subject, both as to the meritorious services of the father of this applicant and her poverty. I asked the question of the chairman of the committee which has been answered by the Senator from Rhode Island. What is the principle involved in this bill? Now, I have no objection to going as far as any one in providing liberally for those officers and soldiers who have served in the various wars in which this country has been engaged; but it seems to me that this bill is adopting an entirely new principle, which has never been applied either in the naval pensions or in the army. Naval pensions commenced about the year 1800, when a special fund was set apart for the purpose of paying them. Various laws, very liberal—so liberal as to have absorbed that fund, as I understand—have been passed at various times, naming the different classes of individuals who were to receive them; but there was never a law passed which embraces a case of this kind. All the provisions which have been passed embracing widows and children, only apply to those cases in which the father or husband died in the service, or of wounds or disease incurred in it. That is not this case. This would be a departure from the established rule. None of the laws which embrace widows and children have gone so far as this. They embrace, in most instances, the widows, or where they embrace children, it is only those who are minors; and then they are, most of them, for five years and for children less than sixteen years of age. The question now is, are we prepared to depart from the established rule? If we are prepared to depart from it in this instance, I am prepared to act upon a general bill to depart from it in all cases. This is, no doubt, a meritorious case. There can scarcely be any cases arising from the revolutionary war that can be characterized in any other manner than as highly meritorious. If we are to adopt this principle, I am prepared to act upon a proposition of that kind; I am prepared to go for it if it is advisable and right to do so; but I am not prepared to single out this individual case and apply it to it.

We had this same principle proposed here in regard to army pensions at the last session of Congress—a principle to extend it to children, and carry it beyond the provisions of the laws. It was first presented in the way of a general provision, or law, adopting that principle as a general provision. I had the curiosity—and I did it in the performance of what I considered my duty—to inquire at the Pension Office to see how far that principle led. I ascertained that, if it was carried out, we should adopt a provision which would require us to pay something like half a million of dollars from the Treasury. I take it that almost every man who looked at that bill without making inquiry, would have felt astonished, as I did, if he had traced it out in the same manner, and found it to involve a principle of so much importance. And now, before we adopt the principle here in regard to navy pensions, I am disposed to look into the matter, at least so far as to call attention to the principle which we are adopting, and ask that, if we adopt it, we may do it by a general provision of law, and not by a special provision in an individual case.

Mr. CLARKE. I certainly have no disposition to follow the honorable Senator through his remarks about a principle of which we have heard a great deal lately. But he asks, upon what principle is this bill to be passed? I simply answer, upon the principle of humanity.

Mr. MANGUM. And justice.

Mr. CLARKE. Yes, sir, and justice, too; I thank my friend for his suggestion.

Mr. BORLAND. And national gratitude.

Mr. CLARKE. Justice to an old and faithful revolutionary servant, who has left this daughter, his only posterity, in a destitute situation. That is the principle, and you never need fear that the Congress of the United States will be swayed from its propriety by such a principle too often or to too great an extent. The Senator, in speaking of the bills which have heretofore been passed, says that they were confined either to the individual who performed the service, to his widow, or to his children who were not above sixteen years of age. I simply answer the gentleman, that this poor old lady has arrived at her second childhood. I can conceive of no stronger appeal to present to the Senate of the United States than to ask this pittance for this poor old decrepit lady, who is suffering from paralysis and has nothing to support her—a lady who is the only surviving child of one of the bravest men who ever trod the quarter deck of a ship of the United States, whether in the revolutionary or any other war. She, herself, destitute as she is, reluctantly asks this small pittance from her country as evidence of its appreciation of the services of her father. I trust the Senate of the United States will not refuse the request.

Mr. BRADBURY. After the appeal which has been made by the honorable Senator from Rhode Island to the sympathies of the Senate, I feel, certainly, very great reluctance to the interposing of any objection to the bill now under consideration. But I do regard it as a bill involving a principle of very great importance. If we pass it, we not only open the door, but we take it from its hinges; we declare that we will grant pensions to the children of all those who served in our revolutionary struggle—for almost every individual who engaged in that struggle, whether he acted in the capacity of an officer or private, performed services of the most meritorious character. It is now proposed to take an insulated case and pension a surviving child. I know no reason why, if we do this, we should not do it in every other case; and if we proceed in this manner we shall soon have one half of the country pensioned upon the Government. I regret, as I said at the commencement, to interpose any objection to the bill after the remarks of the honorable Senator from Rhode Island; but I am not prepared to vote for a bill upon the principles of humanity alone, for I think that we cannot as legislators justify ourselves in acting upon that principle. We must have some principle beyond that of general benevolence, because we are not sent here to dispense alms. I hope that a bill of so much importance will receive the attentive consideration of the Senate, and with a view of having an opportunity of further considering it, I will move that it lie upon the table, in order that it may be called up again after we have considered it further. I do not make this motion for the purpose of having a test vote, but simply to give further time for an examination of the bill.

Mr. CLARKE. Will the honorable Senator do me the favor to withdraw that motion?

Mr. BRADBURY. Certainly, if the Senator will renew it.

Mr. CLARKE. I would merely say that this is one of those cases in which any delay is denial. We all know how long it would take to get through the other House. Once more I will say, that if her father, who served his country so faithfully and so well, had been living, he would have been entitled to a pension. That father has died and left this his only child, whose only inheritance is her father's good name, his blood, and the claim he had upon his country; and upon this she asks for a slight pittance to ease her lot, which will not be long upon earth. I have no more to say, but renew, according to my promise, the motion to lay the bill on the table.

The motion was not agreed to—there being on a division, 17 yeas and 17 nays.

Mr. PRATT. I would like to have the yeas and nays on that bill. The effect of the bill, as I understand it, will be to extend the pension laws to the children of deceased soldiers or officers. Now, sir, I can readily comprehend the results if the Senate are disposed to act upon the principle avowed by my friend from Rhode Island, [Mr. CLARKE.] They did act upon it the other day with reference to the widow of General Worth. If I had voted affirmatively on that occasion, I should vote now with my friend from Rhode Island. But having voted against that proposition, and looking upon it as a matter of principle involving a large amount of money, I ask the yeas and nays, that we may see who are disposed to extend the pension laws as far as the principle of this bill does.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment; and the yeas and nays were ordered upon the question of ordering it to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. BORLAND. Before the vote is taken, I desire to say one word in favor of the bill. I have often heard it said upon this floor, that the passage of a bill of this sort established a principle which would require us to extend the pension laws. I do not think that that follows as a consequence at all. It is not true, in fact, that we, by a bill of this sort, determine to extend the benefits of the pension laws to all the children of persons who have served the country in the Army or Navy in the revolutionary war, or any of the wars in which we have been engaged. It simply provides for the application of the benefits of this law to one child of one worthy and distinguished man. The propriety of doing so depends upon the merit of the particular case, and involves no principle that requires us to go beyond cases that are equally meritorious. I make these remarks in reference to this particular case. I made the same in regard to the case of Mrs. Worth, which has been referred to; and I do not hesitate to say, that whenever any case equally as meritorious as the case of Mrs. Worth, or this case, is presented to the Senate, I shall be prepared to vote for it. I think not only that correct principles of legislation authorize and require us to do so, but that every consideration of humanity and national gratitude requires it.

I am prepared to go even further. I am prepared to go as far as it is said the principle of this bill would carry us. I do not think it would carry us to the extent which has been stated; but whenever a proposition is made to carry it to that extent, I am prepared to go for it. As long as I have a seat on this floor, I will vote to take care of the destitute widows and orphans of those who have devoted their lives to the service of their country, and especially of those who have died in consequence of their devotion to the interests of the country.

Mr. CASS. Before I vote upon this question, I desire to ask a question. I did not listen attentively to what was said, and should like to know if the person for whose services the pension is asked died during the revolutionary war?

A SENATOR. He did not.

Mr. CASS. He did not die in the service, I understand. Of course this petitioner, his child, must be of a very advanced age.

Mr. CLARKE. If the honorable Senator will allow me, I will answer his question, whether the father of the petitioner died in the service. He did not. He received for his service in the revolutionary army his pay in what was called Continental money. But it is not upon that that this poor lady rests her appeal for aid. Under the circumstance it was her father's good fortune, perhaps, that he did not die in the service of his country; but it would seem as if it were her misfortune.

The question being taken by yeas and nays on ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading, resulted as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Berrion, Borland, Clarke, Cooper, Davis, Douglas, Fish, James, Jones of Iowa, Mangum, Miller, Morton, Seward, Smith, Upham, and Wade—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Bradbury, Brodhead, Cass, Dawson, Dodge of Wisconsin, Dodge of Iowa, Downs, Felch, Geyer, Gwin, Hamlin, Hunter, Jones of Tennessee, King, McKee, Mallory, Norris, Pratt, Spruance, Sumner, Underwood, Walker, and Whitcomb—24.

So the bill was rejected.

MRS. MARGARET HETZEL.

The bill for the relief of Mrs. Margaret Hetzel, widow and administratrix of A. R. Hetzel, late assistant quartermaster in the Army of the United States, was read a second time, and the Senate proceeded to consider it as in Committee of the Whole.

It enacts that the Secretary of the Treasury shall be thereby authorized to allow and pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Mrs. Margaret Hetzel, widow and administratrix of A. R. Hetzel, late assistant quartermaster in the Army of the United States, the sum of $12,988 74, being the amount claimed by him in the account rendered by him for a part of the third quarter of the year 1838, and which was disallowed at the Treasury.

Mr. BRADBURY called for the reading of the report of the Committee on Military Affairs; which was accordingly read.

It appears from the report that A. R. Hetzel died on the 20th of July, 1847, at Louisville, Kentucky, after most laborious service at the city of Vera Cruz, Mexico—leaving a wife and three children to mourn his loss. He served in the Quartermaster's Department more than twelve years previous to his death. He disbursed large sums of money. His accounts were all settled at the Treasury. In an account rendered by the deceased for part of the third quarter of 1838, there appeared this item: "Percentage on disbursements on account of the appropriation for preventing and suppressing Indian hostilities from the 4th day of July, 1836, to the 30th of September, 1838, on $519,549 60 at 2½ per cent., amounting to $12,988 74." That duty was entirely disconnected from the regular quartermaster's account which was covered by the official bond. But during this very period his disbursements on account of the Army amounted to several hundred thousand dollars, and his accounts were all duly closed at the Treasury Department. He did not retain the amount charged as percentage, but he considered that he was entitled to it, in consequence of the unusual and extraordinary responsibilities he assumed as principal quartermaster in the Cherokee nation. He established such a system of accountability that not one dollar of the funds of the Government placed in his hands—nearly $800,000—was lost. His duties were arduous in the extreme, as several commanding officers represent. The character of this officer was strictly honest and honorable. To show it, the committee extract some items from his accounts.

By the act of 3d March, 1839, claims of this character were not thereafter to be allowed. This cut off this claim. But the committee think that that law ought not to apply to a case where the extra service was previously rendered.

The report is accompanied by certificates from Major General Scott and Major General Wool, as to the good character of Mr. Hetzel and the value of his services to the Government.

Mr. HUNTER. If I understand the case it is this: This quartermaster discharged service that belonged to his office, only he had a little more duty than usual. But that was a contingency he had a right to expect when he accepted office. I believe we have long ago decided, by the passage of a law to that effect, that we will not give double pay to an officer who merely discharges the duties required by the service. It seems to me that this is contrary to law.

Mr. DAWSON. Mr. President, in the absence of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, with whom this bill originated, I beg to state, that the services of this officer were rendered prior to the passage of the law prohibiting extra pay being allowed to officers for services performed while in the discharge of their duty, and that this is the only case of the kind now remaining. The reason why two successive committees, of which I have been a member, have reported the bill unanimously—for it was reported last year by the honorable Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. DAVIS,] no longer a member of this body—is this, $800,000 was sent to the Cherokee nation to aid in the emigration of the Indians. The whole of the money was placed in the hands of Captain Hetzel. It was beyond his duty; he was under no obligation to receive it and take care of it. The money was placed in his hands by General Scott. He took care of it, and, as General Scott says, he was held responsible for the amount. He had to employ various persons to disburse the money in various sections of the Cherokee country. He discharged the duty to the entire satisfaction of the Government. This was all done prior to the passage of the act of March 3, 1839. When he returned, he went to the accounting officer and paid up every single dollar, claiming this amount of two and a half per centum for the expenditure. Under these circumstances the accounting officer said he had no power to make the allowance. Instead of holding on to the money, as officers did previous to the passage of the act of 1839, he paid every dollar into the Treasury, and laid his claim before Congress. Since the period of the application, the Military Committee has twice, to my own knowledge, unanimously authorized the reporting of this bill.

If there ever was a claim in which extra compensation ought to be allowed, this is one of them. And surely General Scott and General Wool would never have given the certificates which have been read unless the facts were as stated. Why, there are hundreds of precedents prior to the 3d of March, 1839, precisely in point. But for the act of 1839 the auditing officer would have allowed this sum. That act was passed before Mr. Hetzel's accounts were settled; but the extra services were rendered prior to the passage of the act. The act was to operate prospectively and not retroactively.

This case is sustained by precedent. It is in violation of no principle of policy settled prior to 1839. If the judgment of the Committee on Military Affairs be worth anything, this bill ought to be passed, for the committee was unanimous in its favor. I believe it is as economical and careful as any committee of the Senate, in relation to public expenditures. All who were here during the last session of Congress will recollect the speech which was made in favor of this bill by a gentleman who was then Senator from Mississippi [Mr. DAVIS.] It then passed with scarcely a dissenting voice, and went to the House of Representatives, and was there lost in consequence of the failure of the House to act on private bills. It is founded in justice and equity. There can be no objection to it except an indisposition to pass any claim, and the only reason why such indisposition can exist is a want of a thorough knowledge of the subject.

I would never have consented to the bill being reported if I did not believe it just and proper that the money should be paid. No lawyer or agent of any character would have discharged the services which Mr. Hetzel performed, so honorably and settled so punctually, without being entitled to compensation, and none who would not have asked it. He has asked, and his widow now asks for it, in conformity with the established usage of the government down to 1839. As was stated by the Senator from Mississippi last year, this is the only remaining case of the kind, and it is due to a meritorious, honorable, and worthy man. It is not upon principles of humanity that this is asked. It is a matter of justice and equity. I have nothing more to say.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I recollect perfectly well the discussion that took place at the time this subject was up at the last session, and I recollect the grounds on which this bill was passed. It then seemed to me, and it now seems to me, that it is reasonable. I had something to say when I was a member of the House of Representatives on the subject of cutting off all these extra allowances, and a bill, if I recollect rightly, was passed in 1839—it was a part of some appropriation bill—we had to get it into an appropriation bill—suppressing all these allowances. The practice before the passage of that bill was, in settling the accounts of officers, to make these allowances. Congress determined to put an end to that system forever; therefore, for the purpose of accomplishing that object, they amended one of the appropriation bills, so as to cut off these extra allowances from officers of the Army. This service of Mr. Hetzel had been rendered before the passage of that act; and if he had been treated like all other paymasters, this commission would have been allowed.

The reason why this bill passed with the unanimity with which it did when it was up before Congress was, that Congress wished to mete out to him the same allowances, by this bill, which had been made to others similarly situated. He could not get the allowances by virtue of the act of 1839, which cut him off before the settlement of his accounts, although the service had been rendered before. That is my recollection of the whole matter.

Mr. DAWSON. He paid over every dollar to the Government.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Perhaps that fact ought to be remarked. When Mr. Hetzel settled his accounts, as the Senator has remarked, he claimed the allowances usually made to paymasters; but this law which had been passed in 1839, according to the construction of the Department, prevented his receiving it, and instead of holding on to the percentage and allowing the Government to sue him, he paid over every dollar, percentage and all, and said he would resort to Congress, and see if they would not treat him precisely as all other paymasters had been treated. I think his punctuality and promptness in settling his accounts, instead of operating against him, ought to operate for him.

The bill was then reported to the Senate without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

GENERAL ROGER JONES.

The bill for the relief of Adjutant General Roger Jones was read a second time, and the Senate proceeded to consider it as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill enacts that the accounts of Adjutant General Roger Jones shall be settled by the accounting officers of the Treasury on principles of equity and justice, and in such manner as to allow him the pay and emoluments of Adjutant General from the time of the reduction of the Army in 1821, to March 7, 1835, when he was restored to his rank and commission in the staff of the Army, the pay and emoluments of captain of artillery which he received during the same period being first deducted therefrom.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

REPRESENTATIVES OF JOSEPH WATSON.

The bill for the relief of the representatives of Joseph Watson, deceased, was read a second time, and the Senate proceeded to consider it as in Committee of the Whole.

It enacts that the Solicitor of the Treasury shall be authorized and directed to cause to be executed, on the part of the United States, a full release and acquittance of the claims of the United States against Joseph Watson, as one of the sureties of Henry Ashton, late Marshal of the District of Columbia, and that the property in the city of Washington, at present held in trust as security for the payment of said claim, be reconveyed to his legal representatives free from such incumbrance.

The report of the Committee on Indian Affairs was read.

It appears from it, that the claim in question has been before Congress for many years, and reports for and against it have been made. The services of Joseph Watson, for which his representatives ask compensation, were rendered and sanctioned by the head of the territorial government of Michigan. But these services were performed without any provision of law regulating their compensation. The difficulty appears to have been to ascertain the exact amount of remuneration for them. The services seem to have extended from the year 1806 to 1812, making six years, during which Joseph Watson performed, when required to do so, the duties of superintendent and storekeeper, for which he received no remuneration. In view of the difficulty referred to, the committee being desirous to do justice between the Government and the claimant, deemed it proper to offset his claim, against a claim of the Government against him as one of the sureties of Henry Ashton, late Marshal of the District of Columbia. It appears from an extract from the docket of the Solicitor of the Treasury, annexed to the report, that at the November term in 1849, a verdict was rendered in the United States District Court in the District of Columbia, in the case of James Williams, one of the six sureties of Henry Ashton, for $8,150. It further appears, from the letter of the chief clerk in the office of the Solicitor annexed to the report, that in 1842 the representatives of Joseph Watson made an arrangement with the Secretary of the Treasury, whereby his indebtedness to the United States, as one of the sureties of Henry Ashton, was secured to the satisfaction of the Government. The debt thus secured amounted to $1,375, for which a deed of trust on real estate in this city was conveyed to the Government. It appears that of the appropriations made for the contingent expenses of the Territory of Michigan, from the year 1806 to the year 1812, there remained in the Treasury on the first of January, 1813, a balance of $1,050. No part of that appropriation appears to have been paid, on account of the Indian Department or to Joseph Watson. Taking into consideration the circumstances in which the liability on the part of Joseph Watson had its origin, and the fact admitted on all sides that the services for which compensation is at present demanded were actually rendered, but not paid for, while this balance of $1,050 for the contingent expenses for the Territory of Michigan, nearly the amount of said liability, remained in the Treasury, the committee deemed it just that one should be regarded as an offset against the other. The committee gave evidence showing the value of the service, and concluded with the recommendation that the bill should be passed.

Mr. BRADBURY. I would like to hear the bill read again. I wish to see, if we undertake by this bill to discharge one of the sureties, how far it is to operate on the others.

Mr. BRODHEAD. It will discharge them all.

Mr. RUSK. It would generally release them all; but if the honorable Senator had attended to the reading of the report he would have perceived that an arrangement was entered into between the Government and the sureties by which each became surety for his own proportion. These representatives of Joseph Watson became sureties for their proportion; and to secure it they granted to the Government a deed of trust. The bill will not go any further.

Mr. BRADBURY. The explanation is sufficient. I was unable to hear the report when read. I was unable to ascertain the facts of the case; but as I understand the Senator from Texas, the petitioner performed services which may be offset against his liability as surety.

Mr. RUSK. Mr. President, some two or three sessions ago, I investigated this case, and made this report. At the last session, on a full investigation, this bill passed the Senate by a large majority. There is a mass of testimony in the case which has been collected by the representatives of Joseph Watson, deceased. He has long since deceased. His representatives are females, and it was with considerable difficulty that they could collect this testimony. This judgment of the United States against them is levied upon, and in fact secured by the only property which they have; when, if the claim had been pursued at the right time, there would have been absolutely due by the Government of the United States to Joseph Watson's representatives a larger sum, I have not the slightest doubt. A difficulty with this case is, that it has lain over for a number of years. The investigation showed that he performed these services—that under one appointment he performed the services pertaining to one or two other appointments. The testimony goes on to show further, that in a critical time on the northwestern frontier his services were invaluable.

There is a circumstance alluded to in the report which is strong presumptive evidence that the Government at that time intended to pay him for these additional services. In the annual appropriation for that Department there remains unexpended upwards of $1,000—almost the amount asked to be released. The testimony is ample and full that he was a faithful officer; that he discharged those duties over and above those properly pertaining to his appointment, and that those duties accrued to the interests of the country. Now, under such circumstances, with a very doubtful claim against him, created by his generosity towards his friend, amounting to about $1,300, the question is, will the Government of the United States, on such a showing as this, and when, I have no doubt, if the claim had been pursued in proper time, it would have been a much larger amount, as a hard-hearted creditor enforce this judgment against his heirs, and turn them out of the last vestige of property that they have?

Mr. BRADBURY. The Senator from Texas has stated a fact on which this case may well rest. He says the evidence was satisfactory to the committee that the petitioner had a claim for services equal to the amount of the liability—a claim that was equitable and just. That is satisfactory to my mind, and I withdraw all opposition to the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

MRS. DADE.

The Senate then proceeded, as in Committee of the Whole, to consider the bill for the relief of Mrs. A. M. Dade, widow of the late Major F. L. Dade, of the United States Army. It enacts that the Secretary of the Interior be directed to place the name of Mrs. A. M. Dade, widow of Major F. L. Dade, deceased, late of the United States Army, on the pension roll from and after the 18th of December, 1848, for and during her natural life, at the same rate of pension she has heretofore received.

Mr. MORTON. That bill, as its title imports, is for the relief of the widow of the late Major Dade, of the United States Army. Major Dade fell at the commencement of the Seminole war, in Florida, in the year 1835. He fell in that battle which is known in the history of that war as "Dade's Massacre," when he and all his command, save two, were massacred by the Seminoles. This bill passed the Senate during the last Congress without any opposition. It went to the House of Representatives, and there shared the fate of all bills of that character. I hope it will be the pleasure of the Senate, without any further comments on my part, to pass the bill with the same unanimity they passed it at the last Congress.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

ALLEN G. JOHNSTON.

The bill for the relief of Allen G. Johnston was read a second time, and the Senate proceeded to consider it as in Committee of the Whole.

It enacts that the Secretary of the Treasury shall be authorized and directed to cause to be paid to Allen G. Johnston, of the State of Florida, the value of certain subsistence stores turned over by him as captain of a company of Florida mounted militia at the time he was mustered out of service, on the 6th of January, 1840, to J. B. Collins, quartermaster in the service of the United States, but not credited to him by said Collins in his return to the Treasury Department; the amount so paid not to exceed the sum of $123 63.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

RICHARD CHANEY AND OTHERS.

The Senate proceeded, as in Committee of the Whole, to consider the bill for the relief of Richard Chaney and others.

It enacts that the land officers for the district of Fairfield, in Iowa, shall be thereby authorized to examine into and adjudicate, on their own merits, subject to the revision of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, the claims under the pre-emption act of June 19, 1834, to the lands on which the towns of Fort Madison and Burlington, in Iowa, are situated, under instructions that have been or may be prescribed in relation thereto, and independent of the appropriations made of these lands for town sites, by the acts of July 2, 1836, and of March 3, 1837. If the said land officers shall decide that any of the said claims would have been good and valid under said pre-emption laws and instructions, if the lands covered by said claims shall be appropriated, they shall proceed, under the instruction of the General Land Office, to ascertain from disinterested testimony the value of the lands covered by such claims at the time the claimants were deprived of them by their appropriation for town sites, and also the value of any lot or lots, if there be such, purchased by such claimants under the acts of July 2, 1836, and March 3, 1837, as aforesaid; all which they shall certify to the Commissioner of the General Land Office. And it further enacts, that if the Commissioner of the General Land Office shall be satisfied, by sufficient evidence, of the correctness of the decisions of the land officers and the value of the lands, he shall deduct therefrom the value of said lands at $1 25 per acre, and also the value of any and all lands, if such there be, in either of the said towns purchased by any of the said claimants, under the acts of July 2, 1836, and March 3, 1837, and pay the balance to the claimants or their legal representatives, in certificates of location, at the rate of $1 25 per acre, which shall be located on any unsettled or unimproved lands within Fairfield district: provided that previous to such certificate being located the claimants, or their legal representatives, shall file with the land office a relinquishment of all right, title, and interest, in and to all the lands on which the said towns are situated; and provided, further, that no claim shall be adjudicated under the provisions of the act, which shall not be presented within six months after its passage; nor shall any certificates be located which shall not be presented within eighteen months after the passage of the act.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

RUFUS DWINELL.

The bill for the relief of Rufus Dwinell was read a second time, and the Senate proceeded to consider it as in Committee of the Whole.

It enacts that the Secretary of the Treasury be authorized and directed to cause to be paid to Rufus Dwinell the sum of $13,037 72, with interest from March 4, 1837; the sum to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. HUNTER called for the reading of the report of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads; and it was read.

It appears that in the year 1837, James Thomas, of the State of Maine, entered into a contract with the Postmaster General for carrying a daily mail between certain points therein specified, which contract was to remain in force for four years from the time of its date. Subsequently, in consequence of the embarrassed condition of the Post Office Department, the service was reduced to tri-weekly, and for several months of the year there was no service whatever, with a view to a reduction in the expenses of the Post Office Department. The contractor had made all his arrangements for a daily transportation of the mails, and for that purpose had obtained the best carriages and horses. It was necessary for him, when the change was made, to keep on the road a full force half employed, or to sell his stock at a great loss at a season when that description of property was not in demand. Under these circumstances, the contractor felt himself bound to be in readiness to adhere to the terms of his original contract. He presented his account to the Department as if the service had been rendered. The Post Office Department paid him more than they would have paid for the reduced service, amounting to $919 31 additional. Colonel Thomas, the contractor, requested that suit might be brought against him for the balance claimed to be due, and the trial took place before the circuit court of the District of Columbia, at the March term, 1841. The jury, instead of finding a verdict for the balance, found a verdict of $13,037 72, with interest from March 4, 1837, in favor of Mr. Thomas. No exception was taken on the part of the Government to the verdict. The plea on the part of the Government for having disallowed part of the amount was, that there had been a change in the service with the assent of the contractor, and that the contract might be changed. In answer to this, it was proved that Mr. Brown, an officer of high rank in the Department, had notified the contractors, Colonel Thomas among others, that so soon as the Department would be able to do so, it would make everything right. The committee did not recognize the right of either party to cancel or alter the contract without mutual consent, in which case it could only be done, as they think, by an instrument of equal solemnity with the original contract. In the present case no such formal change took place. Although, in the opinion of the committee, the verdicts of juries do not always furnish a very safe standard for measuring the liabilities of the Government, yet, under the circumstances of the present case, they cannot but believe that they can find no better guide. The jury was composed of men of intelligence and respectability, which is attested in the strongest manner by the highest authority; and the court is universally admitted to be one of great experience, of extensive legal knowledge, and of entire impartiality. The contractor was unable of himself to provide the means of carrying out his contract. The present petitioner, among others, made advances for that purpose. To save himself, Mr. Dwinell was forced to purchase the claims of other parties. He, in all probability, looked to the original contract as a source of reimbursement; and the committee consider that the faith of the Government was impliedly, if not expressly, pledged to his payment. The committee, after the most mature consideration, came to the conclusion that this sum ought to be paid to Mr. Dwinell.

Mr. HUNTER. I move to amend the bill by striking out of it the words "with interest from the 4th of March, 1837." I believe it is not the practice of the Government to pay interest on claims against it.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President, I know very well what the rule of the Government has been in relation to interest; but it seems to me that this is one of the cases within the rule which the Government itself has adopted. There are certain cases which have always met the favorable consideration of Congress, wherein interest has been allowed to the individual where payment has been delayed, not by the remissness of the person to whom the money was due, but by the failure of the Government to pay him. Now, this report is predicated, and this claim rests, upon the decision of a jury; and that decision shows that this amount was due to the person at that time. Certainly, if there is any safe basis for our action, it should be that of a jury of the country where there has been a trial, and witnesses have been examined by the Government and by the claimant for the purpose of adjudicating and determining the sum due. It seems to me, therefore, that this is one of that class of cases where the claimant is equitably entitled to interest.

Mr. WHITCOMB. Why has not this claim been presented before?

Mr. HAMLIN. There have been applications made before, and if I am asked why it has not been granted, I can give the same reason that applies to other cases: the want of due diligence on the part of Senators and Representatives. I think this is one of that class of cases where this committee have been right. It is true, I am this year a member of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and I gave my concurrence to the report. It was, however, matured at a previous session, when I was not a member of this committee. I think that the claimant is equitably entitled to interest.

Mr. HUNTER. I do not feel the force of the argument of the Senator from Maine. If interest should be allowed in this case, I do not see why it should not be allowed in every other case. It is said that interest should be allowed because the claim is due; and the same is said in relation to every other claim presented here. I do not think that the verdict of a jury gives it any particular force, or gives it a better right to interest than other claims presented here. The United States does not allow itself to be sued; and why? Because it is afraid to trust itself in the hands of juries. This is an indirect mode of accomplishing what the law does not allow, and what the policy of the Government is opposed to. Whether that policy be right or wrong, I do not pretend to say; but such has been the policy of the Government. I am not satisfied that the claim is due at all. I am not satisfied but that the change in the mail service was according to the agreement of both parties; and I do not believe it requires an instrument under seal to change the agreement. But I have not examined the matter; and, as the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads report this sum to be due, I am willing to let that go, but I cannot consent to allow interest. If we establish this precedent; if we allow interest in this case, I do not see why we can refuse it in any other case in which the Government owes a debt. It is no answer to say that Congress did not act upon the case at the time; because that would cover a vast amount of money, and a great many cases hanging over here from year to year. I hope the Senate will agree to the amendment, and not consent to allow interest.

Mr. RUSK. I made the report in this case after a very full investigation of all the papers relating to it. In my opinion, it is fully a legal claim against the Government. Certainly it is a very strong equitable claim which the individual has. As the report states, the contract was made by an individual for the transportation of the mail, without any reservation of power on the part of the Government to reduce the contract. It was for the purpose of relieving the Department from an embarrassment, which was supposed, at the time, to be temporary only, that it was changed, and with the assurance to the contractor that what was right in the premises should be done. The contractor had gone on and stocked the road. He had made all the necessary preparations, and gone to all the expense necessary to complying with the contract. He was enabled to comply with the contract by advances made to him by his friends, but was unable to do it himself. By the arrangement which was afterwards made, for the purpose of relieving the Department, this heavy loss fell, not upon the contractor, but upon those who had made these advances to enable him to comply with his contract.

There is a mass of testimony in the case. The testimony before the jury was, that the assurances mentioned in his petition, and in the report, were made from the Department itself. That they were intended to be fairly performed at the time, there is not any reason to doubt; because the Department paid him an amount larger than the reduced service, which they had made to relieve a temporary derangement of the Post Office Department. They had overpaid him the sum of nine hundred dollars. They sued him to recover that amount; and then those individuals who advanced the money came forward and make the claim. In place of paying this claim, the Department charged the contractor with having received nine hundred dollars more than he was entitled to, under the reduction of the service made by the Postmaster General, to relieve the service for the time being. All parties consented that a suit should be brought.

It is brought here, near the Department, where the testimony could all be taken, and where the United States prosecuted the claim against the individual by respectable counsel, before a highly respectable jury. The testimony is, that the jury were highly respectable men. This jury, sworn to do justice and equity between the parties, instead of giving a verdict of nine hundred dollars for the Government, gave a verdict against the Government for the amount named in the bill.

There are peculiar circumstances in this case which render it peculiarly hard to the individual who now makes this claim. He made advances to the contractor, but the contractor gave the preference to other persons who had made advances to him. In order to avail himself of the benefit of this security, whatever it might be; in order to get back the amount which he had actually advanced, this individual had to go into the market and purchase the rights of those who were before him. So that he had not only advanced money to the Government, but he has had to go into the market and take up liabilities, in order to enable him to try to get the benefit of his claim. This particular circumstance seems to me to present a very strong case; and I am free to say, if I were a party in interest, I could not consent, with my conscience and my notions of right and wrong, to refuse to pay the individual the interest as well as the principal.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I confess that after hearing the Senator from Texas, I cannot see that his argument touches the question connected with the amendment of the Senator from Virginia. Like every other claim that comes before us, if we allow it, we allow it upon the ground that it is just, and either a legal or an equitable claim against the Government. But the general rule is, that the Government does not allow interest on claims against itself. Now, what distinction has been pointed out which makes this case different from any other? It is the case of a claim ascertained by a jury, if you will. Claims may be ascertained in other modes, but they are all supposed to be just claims against the Government when passed. If the general rule is not to allow interest, what reason is there, and what reason have the opponents of the amendment presented why interest should be allowed in this case? If the rule is not right, rescind it in all cases, and pay interest in every case; but if the rule be wise and necessary, as I believe it is, the exceptions must be few and rare in which the Government can pay interest upon a claim against it. I shall feel myself impelled to vote in favor of the amendment of the Senator from Virginia, that this claim of interest ought not to be allowed. I see nothing in the argument of the Senator from Texas, to bring this as an exception to the general rule, that the Government will not pay interest on claims against it.

Mr. HAMLIN. I think I may have been misunderstood in a point which I designed to make a few moments since. What I meant to say was this: that this was a sum determined upon by a jury, who had heard the evidence in a legal trial between the parties, and that it ought to stand higher in our estimation than it would stand on that evidence which is of an ex parte character, furnished to a committee here. Besides, if it had been a judgment against an individual, the judgment would have been enforced by the party in whose favor the judgment was given. He would have been entitled to recover that amount, and would have received what would have been equivalent to that sum with interest now.

It is true that there is no general rule that may include this case. But there are particular cases, and they are very numerous, as the Senator knows, where interest is allowed; and I insist that this is one of those excepted cases, which has at least as much equity as those which are favorably considered by the Senate. This is my view of the matter; and inasmuch as the claimant here, if he could have the right to enforce this judgment, would have the right to enforce it with interest, I hope we will allow him interest. And we must consider that the claim comes to our favorable consideration by having passed the scrutiny which it must have passed through before a jury.

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. President, gentlemen seem to be divided on the question, simply not whether the principal should be paid here, but whether interest upon the claim shall be paid.

Although the total amount in this case is quite small, it is a question of very vital importance—one that has occupied a great share of public attention during the past few years, and one that may occupy it still more during the coming year. Standing here, representing the State of Florida, I have to say, that perhaps that State is more interested at this moment in the question whether this Government is bound to pay interest on adjudicated claims, than any other State in the Union. I could refer to a very able opinion on that point, recently pronounced by a Federal judge; but it may not be pertinent to this question.

This sum has already been adjudicated upon by the consent of the country; and the question now is, whether the country will go behind the adjudication—go behind the verdict of the jury, in search of what it was that influenced the minds of the jury. I think the United States are concluded. They have submitted to the suit; they are, therefore, concluded. How can they inquire why it was that the jury found this sum? They must pay it. And then the question of interest comes up. Every Senator concedes that the Government is forced to do justice by paying the principal. The principle that the Government does not pay interest is based upon the principle, that she is always ready to pay; and that the neglect to pay arises from the laches of the claimant, from a delay to prosecute the claim in time.

I go further, and say that Congress has in no case set forth the doctrine that the Government will never pay interest. It is a mere rule of the accounting officers. The rule has been adhered to: but it is an unjust one. And one of the earliest cases where this rule was enforced, arose under the Florida treaty. By an article of that treaty, those individuals who had claims under the old Spanish rule of Florida—who had claims when Florida was under the Spanish flag—it was provided that such should have their claims adjudicated by due course of law. The Government failed to provide a due course of law for their adjudication. Those claimants were kept out by no laches of their own, but clearly by the fault of the Government. And when a law was provided, it was temporary in its character, and insufficient to allow time to claimants to make their claims good. The law contemplated that the claim should be adjudicated or reported by the commissioner to the Secretary of the Treasury. He was to examine the evidence and allow or discharge the claim at his discretion. And at that time, shortly after the acquisition of Florida, in the year 1821, his discretion was to disallow interest; although interest was justly due to the parties, and they had suffered in consequence of the negligence of the Government. I apprehend that this doctrine has derived additional strength from the position which the Secretary of the Treasury then took. I apprehend, therefore, that the question is not very clearly before the Senate, whether we ought or ought not to pay interest as a general rule. If we pay interest in this case, we do not establish a precedent for the payment of interest in all cases; and even if we did so, the bill should have my support.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I am unable to agree with the Senator from Florida. I consider the rule denying interest a wise one, because the tendency always is, according to my observation in these claims, to delay them. The Senator takes a position to which I am perfectly willing to assent—that the Government is always supposed to be ready to pay, and therefore does not pay interest because the principle is that the delay flows from the laches of the claimant. I say that that principle applies here with all its force. The claimant here had the evidence of his claim, arising from the verdict of a jury as early as the year 1841. Why then was not the claim presented to Congress long before this? If he chooses to let it be delayed, is the Government bound to pay interest in the interim? Has the Government not been able to pay in the interim? Has the Government not had any money which it could have disbursed for the purpose of paying the party when he had the full evidence of the character of his claim in 1841? Upon what principle, then, can he ask interest from us from the time of the rendition of the verdict? I submit, therefore, if this principle be true—and I think it is sound—that where a party has a claim against the Government, the Government is supposed to be ready to pay it if it is a good one; and if it is not paid, the presumption is that it arises from laches on his part; if he does not present his claim for ten years after obtaining full evidence, by the verdict of a jury, of its amount, he should be debarred from obtaining interest.

Mr. RUSK. Mr. President, the principle laid down by the honorable Senator from Delaware is, that the Government refuses to pay interest upon a sort of legal presumption. Now, cannot the legal presumption be removed by a state of facts adverse to it? It has been done in numberless instances of appropriations made by Congress for debts which were due. It is not by means of his laches that this claimant does not receive this amount of money; but it is because it is refused to him by the Department. They bring suit with his consent. He waives the jurisdiction, and allows them to bring suit in this District, where the testimony can all be obtained. This is certainly the prosecution of the claim, because he comes before the jury and submits proof of the validity of his claim. Does not this rebut that presumption?

But the committee went behind the verdict of the jury. I know that many objections are raised to the verdicts of juries against the Government of the United States. I know they are liable to very many and very serious objections. The committee did not take the verdict of the jury without an investigation of the testimony upon which the verdict was given. From the testimony, they became satisfied that the verdict was a correct one, and that the debt was due by the Government of the United States. It seems to me that these facts are amply sufficient to do away with any presumption which could relieve the Government from the payment of interest.

Mr. PRATT. I hope to be excused, Mr. President, for saying one word after the argument which has been made. The particular proposition here is, whether the Government is bound to pay interest on debts admitted by the Government, or ascertained to be due by the Government, to States or individuals. I think the sound legal mind of the honorable Senator from Florida will at once see the fallacy of the distinction which he attempted to draw between this and ordinary cases. The verdict of the jury does not decide the case; it only ascertains the amount of indebtedness. Conceding that the verdict of the jury only ascertains the amount of indebtedness, it only does that which the Senate ascertains in reference to every claim which is brought before this body. When the Senate decide in any one of the claims which are brought before them, we ascertain that upon a particular day a particular service was rendered, or a particular amount of money was due by the Government to an individual. The Senate's ascertainment of the fact of the indebtedness at the particular time, is as much an ascertainment of fact, as is the verdict of a jury. You can, therefore, invoke this verdict only for the purpose of showing the indebtedness, on the part of the Government, at the time the verdict was rendered.

Conceding the indebtedness, the broad question comes up: Is the Government bound to pay interest? I am not committed to the policy of the Government heretofore. I believe that the Government, like individuals, is bound, when it owes an honest debt, and I insist upon its duty to pay interest upon it, as much as I would in the case of an individual. If the Senator assumes this broad doctrine, I can go with him; but there is no distinction between this and every other case in which the Government has paid a debt which has been due for any length of time. If the honorable Senator, therefore, will put this upon the broad ground, and the Senate will understand that we are deciding the broad principle that, whenever the Government of the United States owes a sum of money to an individual it is bound to pay interest on that sum, from the point of time when it becomes due, I will go with him. But there is no distinction between this and any other case.

Mr. BRADBURY. Mr. President, I understand that the proposition here is to pay interest from the time when the proof of the claim was made complete. In 1837, the claimant prosecuted his claim and made his proof complete. I know that some two or three years ago I had the honor of serving upon the Committee of Claims, and in sundry cases we undertook to adopt the principle that interest should be paid from the time when the proof of the claim against the Government was made complete. In regard to the payment of interest which has been spoken of, it is a question which has been settled by the accounting officers of the Treasury. I suppose it is competent for Congress to determine in what case it will, and in what case it will not pay interest. I understand the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads to say that in this case, the committee did not even rely upon the verdict of the jury, but were fully satisfied by the evidence in the case, that the verdict of the jury was correct.

Mr. HUNTER. I call for the yeas and nays on my amendment. It is an important question. The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BERRIEN. I desire simply to ask of the chairman of the committee one question. I understand that the verdict of the jury was rendered in 1841—more than ten years ago. The information which I desire is, why has not this claim been presented before? Or was it presented to the proper Department immediately after the verdict was rendered?

Mr. RUSK. My recollection of the matter is, that it was presented to the Department immediately. This report was made two years ago, and as a matter of course, some of the facts have escaped my recollection. Of one thing I am sure: the claim was presented and urged by these individuals immediately after the performance of the contract. It had been pressed more than once. Finally an understanding took place between them and the Department, that upon a claim of nine hundred dollars said to have been over paid to these individuals, suits should be instituted, and the whole matter should go before a jury. Whether application was made to Congress before the last Congress I do not know. I am inclined to think not; but I may be mistaken. My recollection is, however, that immediately after the verdict of the jury was rendered, they attempted to get their payment from the Department, but failed in that; and that they made application to Congress two years ago.

Mr. BERRIEN. My inquiry was, whether, after the verdict of the jury, application was made for the payment of this sum, and when? The United States has no inflexible rule in regard to the payment of interest. The opinion of the present Chief Justice, when he was Attorney General, is very distinct on that subject. The United States proceed generally in the payment of claims upon the principle that this Government is always ready to meet all just demands against it. Now, assuming the fact on which the chairman has relied, not resting exclusively upon the verdict of the jury—for the verdict of a jury against the United States is not always the purest criterion of the correctness of a claim—but assuming the fact which has been stated by the chairman, that the committee had examined the evidence upon which the verdict was rendered, and that it was satisfactory to them; then upon the rendering of that verdict there was a claim against the United States which is now ascertained to be just, and the withholding of the payment of that claim would, in my judgment, subject the United States to the payment of interest on it. The important inquiry, therefore, is, when was the claim, after it had thus been ascertained to be just, presented to the proper Department?

Mr. HAMLIN. If the chairman will allow me to answer the honorable Senator from Georgia, I will do so. I cannot answer as to the specific time when the claim was pressed upon the Department, and I am not certain that the papers show it; but I can answer the Senator from Georgia, that immediately after the rendition of the verdict, within, at the furthest, a very few months, the matter was presented to the Department and urged upon them. The individual who was the contractor in this case was a contractor for other routes, and did other service. This was mixed up with other accounts, and he continued to press it to the day of his death. It has come equitably into the hands of the parties who now prosecute it as advancing the funds to support him in his contract with the Government.

Mr. BERRIEN. I do not mean to make the slightest distinction between the rights of the original claimant and that of the present claimant; but I presume that the report, better than the recollection of individual Senators, will show the facts concerning the delay. I should prefer myself to take time to look into these matters. If the friends of the bill do not choose to fix upon a time when this claim can be ascertained to have been made upon the Government subsequently to the ascertainment of its correctness, that will impose upon me the obligation to vote in favor of the motion to strike out.

The question being taken on the amendment, by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 28, nays 11; as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Badger, Bayard, Berrien, Borland, Butler, Clarke, Cooper, Davis, Dawson, Dodge of Iowa, Felch, Fish, Geyer, Hunter, James, Jones of Iowa, King, Mason, Miller, Pearce, Pratt, Seward, Smith, Spruance, Sumner, Underwood, Wade, and Whitcomb—28.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bradbury, Brodhead, Dodge of Wisconsin, Downs, Gwin, Hamlin, Houston, McRae, Mallory, Morton, and Rusk—11.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The bill was then reported to the Senate as amended, the amendment made in committee was concurred in, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

EXTENSION OF A PATENT.

The bill to extend the patent heretofore granted to John Schley, of the State of Georgia, was read a second time, and the Senate proceeded to consider it as in Committee of the Whole.

It enacts that the patent granted to John Schley, on the 27th of October, 1836, for a new and useful improvement on the cotton-gin, and the application of his machine to a new and useful purpose—the packing and breaking of wool and grain, and seedless cotton, and dislodging and cleansing them from those substances which prevent them being properly dyed; also, for mixing cotton and wool together for carding purposes—be extended for the term of fourteen years after the expiration of the term for which such patent was originally issued, and be granted to the executors or administrators of John Schley, now deceased.

Mr. BADGER. I would like to inquire from some member of the Committee on Patents, whether that bill was reported unanimously by the committee?

Mr. DAWSON. It was.

Mr. NORRIS. The bill was agreed upon by the committee. No one dissented. The case, in short, is this: The original patentee died, and the heirs could not make an application seasonably at the Patent Office.

Mr. BADGER. I am satisfied.

Mr. DAVIS. I notice that this bill proposes to extend this patent for fourteen years. The law provides for the extension of patents only for seven years, and it has been the policy of Congress heretofore, I believe, not to create an inducement for people to come to Congress to get extensions by doubling the time, but to limit the time to the period fixed by law. I therefore move to strike out "fourteen," and insert "seven."

The amendment was agreed to, and the bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The Senate concurred in the amendment made in the Committee of the Whole, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

On motion, the Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, January 9, 1852.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m.

The Journal of Wednesday was read and approved.

Mr. PEASLEE asked the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a bill of which previous notice had been given.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I shall object to the introduction of this bill, and for this reason: I think I am right—and I ask the Chair if I am not—in saying, that if we proceed in regular order, under the 25th rule, to call for reports of committees, it will then be in order to call for resolutions, and, as I understand it, by the 114th rule, these bills can all be introduced.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is correct; but by unanimous consent, it is competent for the House to pass over the call of committees for reports.

Mr. STEPHENS. I move, then, that the Chair proceed to call the States for resolutions, when it will be in order for gentlemen to introduce their bills.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the Chair will take that course.

Mr. HOUSTON. I desire to make one suggestion in connection with this subject. I am as anxious as any one that these bills should be introduced and receive their proper reference; but if this course is taken, some of them will give rise to debate, and we shall consume our whole time with them.

Mr. STEPHENS. Not at all. There can be no debate.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule there can be no debate.

MEXICAN INDEMNITY.

Mr. HOUSTON. Well; I desire that the House shall go into Committee of the Whole, and take up the bill which we had under consideration when we were last in session, providing for the payment of the last installment of the Mexican indemnity.

PRIVATE CALENDAR.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. In the absence of the chairman of the Committee on Private Claims, [Mr. DANIEL,] I move that the House do now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole upon the private calendar.

Mr. MASON demanded tellers; which were ordered, and Messrs. MASON and VENABLE appointed.

The question was then taken, and the tellers reported—ayes 71, noes 58.

So the motion prevailed.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. VENABLE in the chair.)

THE VIRGINIA WOOLEN COMPANY.

The CHAIRMAN stated that the first business in order was House bill No. 30, for the relief of the Virginia Woolen Company.

The bill having been read through, and there being no objection, was laid aside to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass.

EDWARD EVERETT.

House bill No. 50, reported from the Committee on Military Affairs, for the relief of Edward Everett, late a sergeant of the United States Army, came up next in order.

The bill having been read through,

Mr. BISSELL. I desire to say a word or two in explanation of this bill. It was reported to the House by the Committee on Military Affairs, by whom all the facts connected with the subject were fully investigated. A precisely similar bill passed the Senate at its last session, was reported favorably upon by a committee of this House, and failed here only for want of time. The bill provides for the payment of the claim of Edward Everett, for services as clerk in the Quartermaster's Department during the Mexican war. Everett was a sergeant in the first regiment Illinois volunteers, in General Wool's column of the Army, and while in the discharge of his duty at San Antonio, Texas, received a pistol-shot wound in the knee, which permanently disabled him. But before proceeding further, I would inquire of the Chair whether the report of the committee in this case has been printed? If so, its reading will aid me in the explanation of the case.

The CHAIRMAN. The report has not been printed.

Mr. BISSELL. The main column of the Army moved forward into Mexico, but Everett's wound compelled him to remain at San Antonio. On the surgeon's certificate of permanent inability, Everett forwarded an application to the Commanding General, now far in Mexico, for a discharge, to which he was clearly entitled; but in consequence of some misapprehension on the part of his friends who took charge of the application, there was returned to him, not a discharge, but a furlough for the balance of his term of service. This furlough gave him the right, of course, to the use of his own time during the remaining portion of the term for which he had enlisted. He had a perfect right, then, to return home or go whithersoever he pleased—a perfect right to the avails of such labor as his crippled condition might enable him to perform. This is clear.

It so happened that Captain Ralston, the United States quartermaster at San Antonio, was at that time in pressing need of the services of an additional clerk in his department, and he engaged Everett, under an agreement to pay him the same compensation as was allowed to other clerks for similar services. Everett served in that capacity, most efficiently and satisfactorily, from October to June, when he returned home. The Quartermaster paid him, according to the stipulation, some six hundred dollars. This was all right; but, upon adjustment of the quartermaster's accounts with the Department here, the sum which he had thus paid to Everett was disallowed, on the technical ground that inasmuch as Everett was not actually discharged from service, he could, under no circumstances, receive for services rendered the Government more than a sergeant's pay. This decision of the Department being made known to Everett, he promptly, and from the most elevated motives, refunded to the quartermaster, Captain Ralston, the entire sum he had received from him, and he now applies to Congress, who alone have the power, under the circumstances, to do him justice.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I wish to inquire—for I know nothing about this bill—if this gentleman was receiving pay also for his services in the Army while upon his furlough?

Mr. BISSELL. Assuredly so. It is always the case. I hope there will be no further opposition to the bill. I know it to be a meritorious one. I know it of my own personal knowledge; besides, the proofs before the committee were ample and satisfactory. Any man who will pay any attention to the subject, will be satisfied that he is entitled to what he asks, as much so as any man was ever entitled to a cent for services rendered.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I well know it is an ungracious task to oppose any private claim in this body. Very early in the history of this Government, we adopted certain rules, and more recently we are disposed to trample those rules under foot. As early as 1804, this identical question, now urged upon us, was particularly before this body, and before the other branch of the Legislature. It was then decided, that in no instance should we allow a man double pay; that when a man enters the service of the Government, it is a contract by which he is bound to bring with him his ability to perform the duties that shall be assigned him, within the scope of his engagement. Here is a sergeant, as I understand the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. BISSELL,] entering the service and pay of the United States, being wounded, and while receiving the compensation for which he engaged to serve, and by which he bound himself to bring with him all the energies and powers which he possessed—

Mr. BISSELL, (interposing.) I still have the floor. I wish to say to the gentleman from Ohio, as well as for others, that in this case he is not paid twice. The bill by its operation deducts from his pay as a clerk, what he received as a sergeant. I hope that it is understood, and that it will obviate the objection of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. FOWLER. I wish to inquire of the honorable gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. BISSELL,] whether the individual named in this bill is drawing a pension? It was stated by a gentleman, that he was receiving a monthly pension, if I understood him. I wish to know whether he is receiving a pension, or whether he is an applicant for one.

Mr. BISSELL. I do not know personally whether he is, or is not. I know he ought to be, because he is disabled for life, having a stiff knee, from a wound received while in discharge of his duties. But that certainly constitutes no reason why he should not receive a fair compensation for services performed under the circumstances already explained. I repeat, that this bill does not propose to pay him twice. It deducts from what he was fairly entitled to as a clerk, that which he received as a sergeant. Is the gentleman's difficulty obviated?

Mr. GIDDINGS. Is the gentleman through?

Mr. BISSELL. I prefer, while I am upon the floor, to answer any objections that may arise.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I have no objection to state what I was about to remark. I have no intention to occupy the time of the House long. I am in a minority upon this floor, and the responsibility is with the majority. I shall give my vote according to the known and established rules which should, and which in former days and better times of this Republic did actually, guide our deliberations. I, then, repeat what I was about to remark, that I know nothing of this individual case. I have never seen the individual named in the bill, and never heard of the case before the bill was read. I have no other feeling or desire in regard to it, than to obey the great and important rules which should govern us in our deliberations. And I now, again, refer to the point that, when a man is in the employ of the Government, he is bound to exert such powers and ability as he possesses, for the benefit of that Government. If he is wounded, it gives him no title to increased pay at her hands, unless it be by way of a pension; and it gives him no title to increased pay if he was able to perform the duties of clerk, after he was disabled for the field. It was the duty of his officer to employ him in that department. In that employment the officer had a right to require his services; and it was his duty to render them. Now, Mr. Chairman, this is the rule we had in former times observed. The gentleman says, that in consequence of this wound, being disabled for the field, he had an increased claim upon the Government for an increase of pay, because he performed the arduous duties of a clerk—the more easy duties of a bureau in an office, rather than those of a field, and the sufferings of a soldier. I do not think the reasoning good. It is not such as has been admitted as cogent and good in former times. It gives him no increased claim upon the Government. Now, sir, this man, being in the employment of the Government, and agreeing to serve, was entitled to his compensation from the time he entered it up to the time of his discharge. I am willing to give him this; and then he is entitled to a pension from that time from the Government, and unquestionably does receive it. He is, therefore, now in receipt of his pension, according to laws in force at the time of his engagement. I would give him that pension, but I would not heap upon him the extra compensation which this bill contemplates. I repeat that it is a most ungracious and unwilling task to stand here and oppose a private claim. But we have had one continued rule upon this subject for thirty years—never departed from—and to that rule I am, for one, disposed to adhere. I am unwilling to depart from it; but, as I said before, upon the majority of this House rests the responsibility, and not upon me.

Mr. BISSELL. A single word. The gentleman from Ohio overlooks the fact altogether, that it is in proof before this committee that this young man was entitled to his discharge, and that he applied for it. He also overlooks the fact that the furlough for the balance of his time entitled him to his own services, and to the earnings of his own labor, from that time to the expiration of his term.

Mr. GIDDINGS. It was far from my intention to overlook this point, as I said before, and so says the gentleman now, that he received his furlough. For what? Because he was disabled for the field. It gave him no right to claim additional compensation from this Government whatsoever because he was permitted to return home from the field. It was only because he was incompetent to follow the army, and discharge field duties. When he did this, it was his duty to render his best services to the bureau to which his officer assigned him.

Mr. BISSELL. I ask the gentleman what avail, then, was his furlough, if he is to derive no benefit from it? Why make a mockery of the thing, and send him a furlough for the balance of his term, and then claim his services for that unexpired term?

Mr. GIDDINGS. I will reply to the gentleman with his permission.

Mr. BISSELL. Certainly.

Mr. CARTER. I rise to a question of order. Is it in order for one gentleman to give the floor to another, with his consent that he make a speech?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BISSELL] has the floor, and it is not competent for him to give the floor to another.

Mr. BISSELL. I wish merely to ask again, of what avail was his furlough? and, according to the doctrine of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GIDDINGS,] what was it but an insulting mockery to send him a furlough for the balance of his term on the ground that the severe wound he had received disqualified him for the duties of a soldier, which he had undertaken to perform? When you sent him that furlough did you tell him the Government is still entitled to his services? That furlough gave him a right to the balance of his term, the same as a discharge would have done, and he entered into a special contract with an officer of the Government there, for a specific price to act as clerk in the Department, precisely the same as if he had returned to New Orleans and engaged with a merchant there to act as clerk; and whether this be according to precedent or not, I say here, so help me God, so long as I have a seat in this Hall I will forever vote for claims like this.

Mr. CLEVELAND. It seems to me that this is not correctly understood by my worthy friend from Ohio. In the first place, as to the matter of the rules and practice of the House, when they run counter to the principles of justice, I am opposed to them. But this claim is not very well understood by the gentleman upon my right, [Mr. GIDDINGS.] When this man enlisted to serve his country, he enlisted to serve that country as a soldier; and one of the conditions necessarily implied by that enlistment was, if he received wounds in that country's service, he should be entitled to a discharge or furlough. Now am I right in this? If I am, then when he had received a wound, in the discharge of the duties that he contracted to perform for that Government, and was disabled from the further discharge of those duties, I ask whether the Government had any claim upon him either in law or equity? There is not a man in this House but who will say, no—no claim whatever. Has it come to this, that if I enlist to serve my country, and suffer from wounds received in the service of that country, they have a right to turn me over to become a shoe-black, or clerk, or anything else I may still be able to perform? This seems to be the substance of the claim of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GIDDINGS.] Now, the Government discharged him from the performance of further military duties; and having done so, they had no right to call upon him to perform another duty—which I presume the committee found was necessary for some one to do; and having done so, I ask, is there a man in this House who is not willing to pay him for that extra duty? Upon the same principle, a master mechanic might refuse to pay a useful servant for overwork. With equal propriety the gentleman from Ohio might claim, as we pensioned him, that we have a right to compel him to perform clerical duty the rest of his life, when he owed no sort of duty to the Government any more than any member of this House owes duties outside of this House. And with that view, it seems to me there cannot be ten men found in this House who would not be ready to vote for this claim. It is as righteous and just a claim as ever was presented for consideration in any deliberative body. And in addition to that, the man who employed him, and who, all will allow, was more competent to decide the matter than we can be, felt the justness of it so strongly that he paid it out of his own pocket; and this man might have kept it. But he was a noble man. When he found that the Department felt constrained to refuse it, he paid it back, and comes here and asks this House whether they will refuse to pay him. If I had one hundred votes to give, I would most cheerfully give them in favor of this man; and I believe such is the voice of a large majority of this House.

Mr. CHANDLER. I merely rise for a moment. I have no voice or inclination to address the House. This matter was submitted to my examination last year, as a member of the Committee on Military Affairs. I remember its merits. I looked at this case carefully. Having examined it with great attention, I became satisfied that the claim upon the Government was just, and that the first payment to Mr. Everett was correct, and was more satisfied of the correctness of his intentions by his willingness to repay it. My honorable friend from Ohio [Mr. GIDDINGS] who urges such arguments against it, speaks from his own feelings when he talks of the right of the Government to the services of a dismissed soldier. Because he would volunteer his services it does not follow that the Government has a right to compel the services of a man whom it has dismissed for honorable wounds. It was upon that view of the subject that I reported a bill at the last Congress similar to the bill now before the House. I became fully satisfied of the merits of the case, not only because the man had done the service to the country for which he claims payment, but because the country had no more right to his services then, than it has to come and claim one of the clerks in front of your desk, to go and do any clerical duty in the western part of the city. This man was dismissed, and was employed anew by the officer of the Government, and he was properly paid, not the full payment of a clerk, but the payment of a clerk, less the amount of his services as a dismissed soldier. Upon this ground I shall vote for it. I should have said more about it, but my honorable friend [Mr. CLEVELAND] who has just taken his seat, has so fully and fairly stated the case that further remarks are unnecessary, and I will take my seat.

Mr. EDGERTON. The simple question we should ask, as regards the payment of this claim is: Did the United States require the services performed by this Mr. Everett? It is to be presumed that the United States did require that service.

Requiring the service, it is a matter of perfect indifference to the Government whether it was performed by Edward Everett, John Jones, or any other person; and the only question we have to ask is simply, was the service required by the Government; was it performed to the satisfaction of the Government; has the Government paid any person for the performance of this service; if the service was performed—as it was of course—was it performed by Mr. Everett? If he had not performed it, some other person would have been required to do it, and the Government would have paid them for it. It is simply for the reason that the service was required and performed, and the Government has not paid for it, that I shall vote for this bill.

Mr. WILCOX. It seems that the services in this case were required. There is, then, but one point involved in the consideration of this bill, which is simply this: It appears that he was under a furlough, from the officer who had a right to give him a furlough. During the pendency of the furlough, his military identity was suspended, and he had a perfect right to employ himself as a clerk in the different departments; and I know of no bill presented to the House, or that will be presented, that is more meritorious than the one now under consideration. I know something of the hardships of camp duties, and I know something of the rights, too, of a soldier; and while this Government has been just and liberal heretofore in the passage of bills and bestowing of bounties, still I think there never has been a case presented to the consideration of this House, having more merits than the one now under consideration. This individual was disabled by the accidental discharge of a pistol. He could not discharge such duties as the regulations of the United States required to be performed at his hands. Consequently he sought employment in one of the departments, and discharged the duties there devolved upon him faithfully, promptly, and efficiently. It appears from the papers appended to the memorial that those duties were required, and that he was paid for those services the entire amount which was allowed him under the contract. The quartermaster presented his claims to the Government, but the Government having refused to allow it, he, as an honest American citizen—as a soldier, true to his Government and just to his country—paid back the money to the quartermaster, and now throws himself upon the justice of his country through the Representatives in Congress. I hesitate not a moment to believe that the Congress of the United States will pass a bill so meritorious as the one now under consideration.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Georgia. I know but little about military affairs, or military operations—in fact, nothing. But I understand there is a difference between a discharge and a furlough. That when an individual is put under a furlough, he is subject to the order and command of the Government, under the laws and Constitution of the Government. Then the question does not present itself in the shape stated by some of the honorable members—that the Government used his services, and therefore should pay him. When an individual is on furlough, his services are in requisition when required by the Government, according to the contract between the Government and the volunteer.

Mr. BISSELL moved that the bill be laid aside, and reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass; which motion was agreed to.

DAVID C. CASH AND GILES U. ELLIS.

House bill No. 51, for the relief of David C. Cash and Giles U. Ellis, reported from the Committee on Military Affairs, next came up in order for consideration.

The bill having been read,

Mr. WILCOX. I desire to submit a few remarks upon the questions involved in the passage of this bill. It seems that during the Seminole war, Mr. Ellis and Mr. Cash, the one as a private and the other as a lieutenant, received for distribution certain public property from R. R. Crum, a legally authorized quartermaster of the Government. They distributed that public property under proper regulations and orders of their commanding officer. In the reception of this property they would sign their vouchers as acting assistant quartermasters, and regularly appointed quartermasters of the Government. At the conclusion of the war, they made an application to the Government for whatever pay might be due to them, the one as a private and the other as a lieutenant upon the musterr-roll. They were denied what they considered their just dues by the Government, from the simple fact, that from an inspection of the papers which were returned from the quartermaster's department, they found a deficit in the public property; and the Government now seeks to hold them responsible for the distribution of the same. There seems to be a failure, so far as the quartermaster is concerned, to make his return to the Government, thereby throwing a seeming liability upon Cash and Ellis, who were his agents. The Government refused to pay them what was their due, from the simple fact that they signed their vouchers, as acting assistant quartermasters.

It is a well-settled legal principle in the interpretation of instruments of writing, that the intent and meaning of the parties by such writing is to govern, and nothing can be more consonant with sound reason; and while it is equally well settled that a party by parol contemporaneous evidence cannot "contradict or vary" the terms of a written instrument, yet parol evidence is admissible "to explain written instruments" in order to an ascertainment of their just meaning, namely, "by showing the situation of the party in all his relations to persons and things around him, or, as elsewhere expressed, by proof of the surrounding circumstances," or if "the terms be vague and general, or have divers meanings." * * * In all these and the like cases, parol evidence is admissible of any extrinsic circumstances, tending to show what person or persons or what things were intended by the party, or to ascertain his meaning in any other respect; and this without any infringement of the rule, which, as we have seen, only excludes parol evidence of other language declaring his meaning than that which is contained in the instrument itself." The above quotations are from Greenleaf's Evidence, vol. 1, p. 412, where will be found numerous authorities in support of the same doctrine.

Now, the only question is, What was the meaning of Giles U. Ellis and David C. Cash in signing themselves, the former as "Assistant Quartermaster at Fort Gilleland" and "Acting Quartermaster at Fort Gilleland," and the latter as "Acting Assistant Commissary" and "Acting Commissary of Subsistence?" and this meaning we are to deduce according to the rule laid down, not by the addition of other language than that expressed, but by explanation of the language actually used, by its consideration in connection with the circumstances with which the transaction is connected. Neither Ellis nor Cash were agents of the United States in the Quartermaster's or Commissary's Departments. This position is incontrovertible, for the United States did not appoint them as such, nor were they so recognized by act of Congress; and Crum, the quartermaster, had, of course, no power to appoint them agents of the United States in either of those Departments.

What, then, without any reference to contemporaneous parol evidence, were those officers? They were not acting or assistant quartermasters or commissaries by appointment of the Quartermaster's or Commissary's Departments. Nor were they such by recognition of law. R. R. Crum was the legally-recognized officer and agent of the United States for the Quartermaster's Department. Again, it will not be pretended that R. R. Crum, the quartermaster recognized by law, or any other officer of the staff, had any power either to appoint an agent or an assistant to act for the United States in the Quartermaster's or Commissary's Department, or had power to delegate his own authority to another, for "the true doctrine," as stated by Story on Agency, p. 17, "to be deduced from the decisions is, (and it is entirely coincident with the dictates of natural justice,) that the authority is exclusively personal, unless, from the express language used, or from the fair presumptions growing out of the particular transactions, or of the usage of trade, a broader power was intended to be conferred on the agent."

It is not contended that any such broad power was given to Mr. Crum, either directly or indirectly. Of course, therefore, he could substitute no one to perform his official duties and to be accountable in his stead to his principal, the United States. He might employ sub-agents, and this was all he could do. With this, however, the Government (the principal) has nothing to do. It neither enjoins, nor forbids, their employment. It is a matter purely between the officer and his agent. If he deems it necessary for the performance of his duty, he has the right to employ all necessary means for the performance of that duty, and whoever he may employ is responsible to him, unless there is privity between the Government (his principal) and himself, concerning the employment of the sub-agent.

The law on the subject is stated in Story on Agency, p. 486, to be, "that if an agent employs a sub-agent to do the whole, or any part of the business of his agency, without the knowledge or consent of the principal, express or implied, there, inasmuch as no privity exists in such a case between the principal and the sub-agent, the sole remedy of the latter is against his immediate employer, and his sole responsibility is also to him."

The principal in these cases (the Government) had no knowledge of the appointment of sub-agents, and gave no consent thereto; nor, as heretofore stated, was there any appointment to them, or any legal recognition of them in any form as the direct agents of the Government. Whatever their authority was, therefore, it was wholly and exclusively derived from Crum, the quartermaster, and could be, as has been shown, derived from no other source, and their accountability is likewise wholly and exclusively to said Crum as his sub-agents.

This conclusion is irresistible from the nature of the case itself, and without resorting, to sustain it, to the rule respecting evidence, which is laid down in the books, and referred to in the first part of this paper, to wit: That it is competent for a party to adduce parol evidence to explain his written instrument, in order to arrive at its just meaning and true intent, which is always to govern.

But if recourse is had to the legal rule referred to, it will surely serve to confirm this conclusion, and to remove every doubt as to the sub-agency, and as to the accountability of the sub-agents. Each of these parties signs himself as "assistant," "acting assistant," or "acting" quartermaster or commissary. The words "assistant," "acting assistant," and "acting," clearly imply an agency—that the parties thus signing are not acting for themselves, or in their own right, but for another. But it is nowhere stated who they are agents for, and certainly there is nothing in the writing to furnish that information. Still less is there an implication even, that they are agents of the United States.

Now the rule of evidence comes in to explain whose assistants or agents the parties are. (See authority before adverted to for admitting explanatory parol evidence, Greenleaf, vol. 1, p. 412.)

Without this explanation the writing is incomplete and unintelligible in respect of the important item as to whose agents the parties are. For the rule is, that the meaning of the writing must be ascertained from "the meaning of the words" parties "have used" in the writing itself, and the duty of the court is "merely a duty of interpretation;" "that is, to find out the true sense of the terms as the parties used them. (Greenleaf, vol. 1, p. 399.) Now the writing is incomplete, for wherein is it made to appear therefrom for whom Ellis & Cash acted? and this being unquestionably its state of incompleteness and consequent uncertainty, as Greenleaf has it in another place (vol. 1, p. 405) equally in point with the reference on page 412 of same volume:

"When the agreement in writing is expressed in short and incomplete terms, parol evidence is admissible, to explain that which is per se unintelligible, such explanation not being inconsistent with the written terms;" and on same page he adds: "To ascertain the meaning of these words, (the words used in the written instrument,) it is obvious that parol evidence of extraneous facts and circumstances, may in some cases be admitted to a very great extent, without in any wise infringing the spirit of the" general rule excluding parol evidence of the language of parties.

The admissibility of parol evidence being established in these particular cases, as well as the propriety and necessity of its application thereto, it only remains to refer to that adduced in support of the application of the memorialists, consisting, independently of the testimony of the parties interested, (Ellis & Cash,) and also of that of Crum, the officer for whom they acted, of the affidavits in Ellis's case, of six credible and competent witnesses, and in Cash's of that of the commanding officer of the detachment in which Cash also was an officer—all explaining the true meaning of the writing by supplying what was absolutely necessary to make the instrument intelligible and perspicuous, or, indeed, to give it any practical use or effect.

This testimony, it is conceived, is sufficient evidence that the present applicants were sub-agents, accountable alone to their immediate principal, R. R. Crum, and of course (and what we wish to establish by this argument) that they cannot be held liable or accountable by the United States for the public property received by them as the agents of Crum, which it is proved they were.

In conclusion, sir, permit me to say, that R. R. Crum, in his affidavit, says that these, his agents, acted in good faith, and accounted to him faithfully for all the supplies which they received from him as Quartermaster or Commissary of Subsistence—that they turned over to him all their receipts, papers, and vouchers. It is plain, then, sir, that he is the only party responsible to the Government, and that Ellis & Cash should be relieved from liability, and paid whatever may be due them on the muster-rolls for their services—the one as private and the other as lieutenant in the Seminole war.

I thought it proper upon this occasion, in sheer justice to the gentlemen concerned, to submit these remarks.

The bill was then laid aside, to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass.

JOHN W. ROBINSON.

House bill No. 52, for the relief of John W. Robinson, reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, coming up in order, was considered, and laid aside, to be reported to the House, with the recommendation that it do pass.

GARDNER HERRING.

House bill No. 53, for the relief of Gardner Herring, reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, coming up in order for consideration, was read through by the Clerk.

Mr. FOWLER. I would like to have the report accompanying this bill read.

The CHAIRMAN. The reports are not printed in any of these cases. They were sent to the printer.

Mr. FOWLER. I would like to hear the reasons for it.

Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee. The report in this case shows the petitioner was disabled in the military service during the war of 1812. It is a case that has been before this House for a number of years. It is my belief that at every session of Congress since it has been here reports have been made favorable to the claim. Bills have repeatedly passed, but failed between the two Houses, as private bills too frequently do. There has never been a report made against it. The proof in the case clearly shows his disability and his service.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Have bills passed this House?

Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee. They have.

Mr. FOWLER. Why has not this case been presented to the Pension Department?

Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee. In consequence of the fact that the party is unable to make the proof in compliance with the strict rule required by the Pension Department; yet no one can doubt the truth of every material fact.

Mr. FICKLIN. Do I understand the Chair to state that reports intended to accompany these bills have not been printed?

The CHAIRMAN. So I understand from the Clerk.

Mr. FICKLIN. That being the fact, and as it is unsafe to pass these bills without a knowledge of the facts, I move the committee rise.

[Cries of "Agreed!" "Agreed!"]

Mr. FOWLER. We ought not to pass them without the reports.

Mr. FICKLIN demanded tellers on his motion, which were not ordered; and the question being then taken the committee refused to rise.

There being no further objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

SILAS CHAMPION.

House bill No. 54, "for the relief of Silas Champion," reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions by Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee, was next taken up for consideration, which bill was then read through.

Mr. FOWLER. I would like to hear the report upon this case.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not printed.

Mr. FOWLER. I then would like to hear from the chairman a statement of the facts.

Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee. I regret the fact that these reports are not yet printed. The facts of this case as they appeared before the committee, as far as I recollect them, are: that Silas Champion volunteered in 1814 upon an emergency. He was at the battle of Plattsburg. The proof shows that the night after the battle, whilst acting as sentinel, he was exposed to a cold and incessant rain. Up to that service the proof further shows that he was a very sound, healthy, and industrious man. Upon the very next morning after this exposure, he was attacked with a fever and an inflammatory rheumatic affection. This disease continued for a number of weeks, perhaps months, from the effect of which he has never recovered. The testimony of the physicians shows that he is totally disabled in consequence of it. These are, I believe, the main facts. I regret that the report is not before the House.

Mr. FOWLER. I also regret that the report in each of these cases is not before the House, and I concur with the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. FICKLIN,] that we are acting blindfold, and ought not to proceed. Perhaps when I can see the facts in this case, I shall be ready to vote for this bill. I think it highly probable; but I wish to act with my eyes open, and with the light that may be laid before us. I move, as the bills are not printed, and we cannot go forward understandingly, that the committee rise.

Mr. MASON. There is but two or three more of these small bills for the committee to pass upon, and I hope the committee will not rise.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is not in order.

Mr. CARTER demanded tellers; which were not ordered.

The bill was then laid aside, with a recommendation to the House that it do pass.

PHILIP MILLER.

House bill No. 55, for the relief of Philip Miller, reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, next came up for consideration. It was read through by the Clerk.

Mr. FOWLER. I again call for the report. I want light before I act.

The CHAIRMAN. The report is not printed.

Mr. MARTIN. I made that report upon a full investigation of the facts of the case. This bill has been before the House, I think, every session since 1848. Favorable reports have uniformly been made in this case. At almost every session of this House a bill has been passed, but failed in the Senate for want of time. The applicant is an old man; and at the time of application was seventy-three years of age. His wounds were received in the spy service upon the frontier of Virginia. The fact of the existence of the man, and his decrepitude, are well sustained by proofs—by a member upon this floor, in whose district in the State of Kentucky he now resides. I think the claim is a meritorious one—one that ought to pass. The report is full and ample. The committee adopted the report previously made, with a statement of some additional facts.

A MEMBER. Why have we not a report?

Mr. MARTIN. I do not know. It was sent up with the bill to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. ALLISON. When we are seeking for objects upon which to bestow favor, I think we should have confidence in the committee that have investigated claims of this kind to adopt them, where they are recommended by the committee. I have no doubt that a large majority of this House would at once adopt a report made by a committee constituted as that committee is; but when it is to relieve the wants and distresses of those who have suffered in our wars, I think we should not question the propriety of the report of the committee. It is very well, sir, the gentleman who makes a report, accompanied with a bill, should explain in a few words the ground upon which it is made. While it is not in print upon our desks, members should know what they are doing. Yet this class of claims should be preferred to all others. It is the claim of the old soldier, who comes here and asks that you will give him some relief in his declining years. I hope the committee will not rise until all these claims shall be heard, and favorably passed upon. While we are ready to spend thousands of dollars for purposes of doubtful propriety, I hope we shall not chaffer about a few dollars to those who have come forward when their country needed their service, and may be their lives. I repeat, I hope we will not rise until these claims have all been heard, and favorably passed upon.

The bill was then ordered to be laid aside, to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass.

ALBRA TRIPP.

House bill No. 56, reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions for the relief of Albra Tripp, was next considered, and ordered to be laid aside, and reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass.

JOSEPH JOHNSTON.

House bill No. 57, reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions for the relief of Joseph Johnston, came up next in order for consideration. The bill was read through by the Clerk.

Mr. FOWLER. I feel extremely reluctant to object in this case. Perhaps all these cases are meritorious. I am bound to believe so; but my faith must rest upon no basis whatever, when there is nothing before this House to sustain these cases—no report having been printed and laid upon our tables. Therefore, that I may act understandingly, I ask for the facts in this case.

Mr. KUHS. It was several days since that I reported the bill to the House, and the facts in some measure have escaped my recollection. They are in general evidences of a series of very important services rendered by Joseph Johnston along the frontier of Canada, through a very inclement season of the year. The company of which he was a member were engaged in several severe skirmishes with the enemy. They conquered in every instance, and brought off triumphantly upon several occasions numerous prisoners from the British army. This case is supported by the most ample testimony not only in regard to his courage as a soldier, but also in regard to the important services he rendered to his country. The evidence is clear and conclusive that in that service he contracted a disease which, from that hour to this, has rendered him totally disabled and incapable of discharging the duties to himself and family. The case appeals more strongly than any I have yet witnessed to the justice of the country. I may say, that the testimony is voluminous and irrefragable in his behalf, and so conclusive that in every instance—which I believe amount to four in all—where this case has been brought to the consideration of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, the committee have reported in his favor. Nothing has delayed this meritorious claim but a want of time for the action of both branches of the Legislature upon it.

And here I may say, for the information of this gentleman, and other gentlemen who feel an interest in protecting the funds of the Government, and who feel, perhaps, a like interest that justice shall be awarded to those to whom justice is due, that in every case that has been reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, the case has in the first instance undergone a careful scrutiny of a member of that committee to whom it had been specially referred. Upon his report, the case has again undergone the investigation and closest scrutiny of every member of the committee before it receives their approbation, and before instructions are given to the member to report it to the House. I have seen scrutiny in courts of justice—I have seen the scrutiny of different tribunals, and I am free to say here, in the face of this House and country, that no case has passed our committee and been directed to be reported to this House which has not undergone the closest scrutiny, both as to the law and facts of the case. No case has come from the Committee on Invalid Pensions to this House but has merit and justice in it, entitling it to claims upon the country and upon Congress, which is to administer justice according to the laws and equity of the country.

Now, this petitioner has been knocking at the door of Congress—I do not know how many years. I sent to the Clerk's table to obtain the report of the committee, so as to lay the facts before the House, but it seems that report is not printed. I regret it, because I would like to bring before the House all of the facts in the case, speaking out, as they do, their own merits in language that cannot be misunderstood. I hope, therefore, the gentleman is satisfied, and I hope Congress will award to this meritorious case the justice it demands. I would be glad to give to the House the particular dates; but, under the circumstances, I cannot furnish them at this period, because it is some two weeks since I examined the case and made a report of the facts. I dismissed them from my recollection, relying upon that report for the exhibition of them to the House. I know that it is a claim based not upon any fictitious foundation, but one having in it the highest merit; one which has received the sanction of three or four committees in its favor. I take that as prima facie evidence, at least, that there is something meritorious in the claim.

The bill was then laid aside, and ordered to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass.

ROBERT MILLIGAN.

The House bill No. 58, reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, for the relief of Robert Milligan, coming up next in order, was read through by the Clerk.

Mr. EASTMAN. I had the honor to report that bill, and will state to those interested the facts of this case, as I recollect them. A pension of four dollars per month was granted this man for several years, as stated in the bill. Testimony was produced before the committee, which was of such a character that it was believed, showing that, since that bill passed, he has become totally disabled by the wounds he had received, so much so that it was impossible for him to perform any kind of manual labor; hence he has to rely solely upon his pension for his support. The committee, upon that state of facts, which were sufficiently established, have reported a bill granting him an additional four dollars per month.

The question was then taken, and the bill was ordered to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass.

SYLVANUS BLODGET.

The CHAIRMAN stated that the next bill in order, No. 59, was a bill from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, for the relief of Sylvanus Blodget.

The bill having been read through,

Mr. EASTMAN said: The reason why this man has not been entitled to a pension before is, that he was not regularly mustered into the service of the United States at the time of the war between Great Britain and the United States, in 1812. He was at the battle of Plattsburg, called from the State of Vermont, and served there as one of the militia. From exposure there he contracted a disease, which has totally disabled him from performing manual labor. This appears from numerous depositions and evidence furnished to the committee, who, after scrutinizing the whole mass of the testimony in the most careful manner, came to the unanimous conclusion, that, if there ever was a meritorious case before them, this was one.

Mr. FOWLER. Is this the first time the application has been brought here?

Mr. EASTMAN. It is the first time.

Mr. FOWLER. Why has he not brought it before?

Mr. EASTMAN. He may not have wanted it before.

Mr. FOWLER. Then I will inquire of the committee, whether they adopt the rule that, if a man thirty years afterwards becomes infirm, he is to be an applicant before this House?

Mr. EASTMAN. The rule we have adopted in relation to this question is, if the applicant can trace disease back to a cause, which commenced in the service of his country, then we report in favor of the applicant, unless there is a contradiction by competent testimony.

Mr. HEBARD. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. EASTMAN,] if he is not mistaken in saying that this is the first time the claim has been presented?

Mr. EASTMAN. I think I am not mistaken, although it has been some time since I prepared the report.

Mr. HEBARD. I think I reported a bill for relief in this case at the last session, which failed for want of time.

Mr. EASTMAN. If I am mistaken, I have confounded this with another case.

Mr. HEBARD. I am sure I am correct in this, that the bill was favorably reported upon, and only failed to receive the action of this House for want of time.

Mr. EASTMAN. It may be that I am mistaken. I know this, that it is a meritorious case.

Mr. DUNHAM. If this is a new bill, as the gentleman who reports it to the House states it to be, it is in violation of a principle of action here, to which I wish now to call the attention of the House. It is very important, if we grant a pension to this man, to know whether it shall go back to 1846. I so understand the bill. I ask that it may be read.

The bill being again read—

Mr. DUNHAM resumed. It is as I have stated. It does seem to me it is a strange thing to have this pension given by Government for current support to men for seven or eight years, and thus giving the applicant a little fortune to begin with. I call the attention of the House to that fact. If we pursue this course, and vote to him that pension, the consequences will be that we shall have brought before us all the invalid pension cases heretofore granted for arrears of pension. If they go to the Pension Office, they can get the pension from the time their application is completed. If they neglect that for a few years, instead of going to the Pension Office to have their pensions granted, they will come here for back pensions, when they could not get it there. It seems to me, if the object of Government is to give a support to those who have served their country, it is quite enough that we give a pension from the time that their cases first commenced in this House. I shall move to strike out 1846 and insert 1850. This is the time that I understand the case was favorably reported upon in the House.

Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee. When the gentleman makes that motion I shall resist it. I understand the object of giving an invalid pension to be to give the means of support and maintenance to a man who has lost the ability to support himself by manual labor, by reason of disease contracted in the military service of the country. The rules adopted by the Departments, and, indeed, by the law that governs those Departments, require that the pension shall not go further back—or in other words, the pension shall commence at the time the applicant completed his testimony and made a demand upon the Government. Whenever he has made out such a case as this Government can act upon and allow, why then his pension commences. Take the case before the committee at present. Here is a man who presents a case meritorious in its character—a case where the applicant has lost the ability to make a support for himself, by reason of wounds received in the service of his country. He has demanded of this Government a pension, that you admit he is entitled to. He does all that is necessary for him to do to make out his case. According to the argument of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. DUNHAM,] he is willing to allow him a pension from January, 1850, for and during his natural life. Then you make him a loser by your own laches and neglect to perform the duty that devolves upon you. He demanded this pension in 1846, and made out such a case as you are willing to allow to-day. He did everything that was necessary for him to do towards completing his case. He proved every material fact that was necessary for him to prove. And because you have neglected to perform your duty to him—because you failed to take up the case he made out and give him what you are willing to admit was then his due, you will decide, I suppose, that he shall starve from 1846 up to this hour, and shall not receive what would have been due him—what he would have received every year since that time if this Government had performed the duties it owed him at that time. Then the Committee on Invalid Pensions have adopted this as an inflexible rule, controlling its action upon this question, that whenever the party has made out just such a case as we can allow at all, we will allow the pension from the day that he completed and perfected the proof in his case. If it be but yesterday, it shall commence then. If it be five or ten years ago, his pension shall commence when he perfected and made out such a case as we shall feel bound to allow at all, in order that our neglect to perform the duties we owe him—in order that our laches shall not run against him. That is the principle we have adopted; and the bill before the committee is founded upon that principle. I shall, therefore, when that amendment is offered resist it, for the reason that it is unjust to the petitioner to adopt any amendments upon that principle. If the principle be true, it will be the policy of this Government not to decide for or against a case of merit, but to delay, delay, until you have literally starved out the wounded soldier who has lost the ability to support himself. And, indeed, that principle has been already too nearly adopted by this Government. We are to delay in meeting the demands that have been made upon us by those cases which have merit in them. I trust the Government will abandon a policy so unreasonable and unjust.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I wish to make an inquiry of my colleague. There was a report made in this case, which has gone to the printer, and we have not the facts of the case before us. The bill proposes to give a full disability pension for life. The inquiry I wish to make is, what are the facts upon which this pension is to be granted, and why it is that it cannot be granted at the Pension Office? Now, if he first received this disability while in service, and in the line of his duty, which prevents him from obtaining a livelihood by manual labor, then he can get his pension at the Pension Office. What is the defect in the proof of this case? Why is it? He would get it granted there.

Mr. HARRIS. I will answer it with pleasure. As a general answer to his question, I will state, that whenever a case has been presented to the committee, and upon investigation they determine that it is such a case as can be allowed under the rules of the Department, we turn the petitioner over to the Department, because it is not a case which requires any special legislation. But in this particular case, the pension could not be allowed by the Department, for the reason that he had never been technically and formally mustered into the service of the United States. He was called out, as I stated in another case of the same character a few moments since, upon an emergency, when the army of the enemy was making a descent upon our forces stationed at Plattsburg. When a flag was sent through the country, and the information reached the State of Vermont that the little force we had at Plattsburg was likely to be overrun by the enemy rapidly descending upon them, volunteers from that State rushed to the scene of action; there was a large detachment that marched from all parts of that State, under the emergency of the moment. They were in that battle, and greatly exposed for a few weeks—for they performed efficient service to the country. Many of them lost their lives; others their limbs; others their health. While they were never technically and formally a part of the American army, they performed important and efficient service in the American army as soldiers. Their cases cannot be allowed by the Department, because they were not mustered into the service of the United States; yet they were in that service. They performed important duties, and made heavy sacrifices. For those services they present cases for the consideration of this House, as meritorious as if they had served years in the regular army. For that reason these cases cannot be allowed by the Department—for that and other reasons, they ought to be allowed by this House.

Mr. OLDS. It will be recollected by the members of the last Congress, that this question in regard to the time at which these pensions should take effect, was discussed nearly a whole day in this House when we were in Committee of the Whole upon the private calendar. This very case was one of the cases acted upon. It being objection day, if any objection was made, the bill was compelled to go over, but the friends of this bill, as well as the friends of other bills, under similar circumstances, permitted a gentleman from New York [Mr. CONGER] to make an amendment similar to the one proposed by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. DUNHAM,] that these pensions should take effect from the 1st of January, 1850. But when the bills were reported back to the House, then a contest was waged upon that very question. After a few days discussion the House determined that these pensions should commence at the time the papers of the applicant were perfected before Congress. The case now under consideration, was one of the cases then acted upon, and the amendment then made on the motion of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CONGER,] striking out 1846 and inserting 1850, was rejected; and the original features of the bill were reinstated. The argument then urged is the same that is now urged. Why is it, if these men were entitled to a pension, and have perfected their papers, that the action of Congress is delayed year after year? In this very case a bill has twice passed this House, the 30th and 31st Congress granting to this very man a pension, and yet he has no pension; and why? Because there was no time for action upon this bill in the other branch of your National Legislature. Now is it his fault, the bill having passed this House, that he is not receiving his pension? Why, then, would you cut him off the four or five years he is entitled to a pension, merely because there has not been time for his bill to pass both branches of the National Legislature. I am sure my friend from Indiana, [Mr. DUNHAM,] acting upon the principles of justice, will see the propriety of dating this case back to the time the papers were perfected, and will withdraw any objection of that kind, and let the bill pass.

Mr. MARTIN. There is one fact I wish to bring to the notice of the committee—that the rule adopted by the Committee on Invalid Pensions in regard to perfecting testimony, is the same rule that is practised upon in the Pension Office. Whenever the testimony is perfected, and presented in the Pension Office, from that time the pension dates. That is the same rule adopted by this committee, and is considered a very equitable one, although there are instances where the rule is apparently very hard. But upon a full hearing of the subject before the committee, we have come to the unanimous conclusion to adopt that mode, being determined to keep within the same lines. This is one of these cases. How came this man not to fall within the lines? He went to Plattsburg upon a proclamation issued by General Macomb, who was military commander there. Your humble servant was among the number who were there, under the call of that proclamation. We were never mustered into the service of the United States, and the men who remained there were severely exposed. This man produces irrefragable testimony that his health was destroyed in consequence of such exposure during that short campaign. These are the facts why he cannot apply to the Pension Office for a pension. I know the facts personally, for I was among the number who answered the proclamation. Our very excellent Governor of the State of Vermont at that time refused to order the military over, but we went in there by any mode of conveyance we could get upon that side of the lake. I hope and trust that this bill will not lie over, and that the poor old man, whose bosom must soon be covered by the clouds of the valley, shall be remunerated eight dollars a month, from the time his testimony is perfected.

Mr. EASTMAN. I desire that the report of the committee made in this case on the 19th of July, 1848, shall be read.

The report was then read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom were referred the petition and papers of Sylvanus Blodgett, report:

That it appears from the statement of the petitioner on oath, sustained by satisfactory evidence, that he was a private in the company of volunteer militia from the town of Jericho, in the county of Chittenden, State of Vermont, commanded by Captain Peter L. Allen, of said town; that on hearing that the British forces were advancing upon Plattsburg, in the State of New York, early in September, 1814, the said militia company volunteered to defend their country against the invading foe, marched to Lake Champlain, which they crossed, and were actually engaged in the battle of Plattsburg; that the petitioner, while in the line of his duty as a private in said company in the defence of Plattsburg, by reason of fatigue and exposures, lying out on the ground in cold rainy nights without covering, took a severe cold and was subsequently carried home sick, with severe pain in his head, back and hips, and also a very sore throat and mouth; that he was then confined by severe sickness, by rheumatism in his hips, back, and right knee and ankle, about six weeks, and also severe inflammation in his eyes, which rendered them very weak and sore, gradually growing worse ever since, and has been able but a small portion of the time to perform manual labor; that for nearly twenty years past he has been too blind to do much labor; that ever since his return from Plattsburg he had been more or less afflicted with rheumatism, and at times very severely; that he has lost the use of one of his eyes, and can see but dimly with the other; that before he went to Plattsburg he was in robust health, but since his return his general health has been very poor; that he is fully satisfied that his afflictions came upon him by going to Plattsburg, as aforesaid; that he is poor and now about sixty-five years old, and is dependent entirely on a son, who is in low circumstances, for a house to shelter himself and family. Therefore, in consideration of his services and consequent afflictions, the petitioner prays that Congress will grant him common soldier's pay during the remainder of his life.

The facts of petitioner's service and faithful performance of his duty as a private, as stated, are sworn to by his captain and colonel, and the fact of his being a healthy, robust, and athletic man previous to said service, is sworn to by his captain and several of his neighbors, who were well acquainted with him previous to and since his return from said service; and also his being brought home sick, and remaining sick for several weeks, and fully corroborating him in his statements as to his continued bad health, inflammation of the eyes, and subsequent blindness and poverty.

There is also the testimony of two physicians, who certify that the petitioner is in the condition set forth by him, and that it is their opinion that the cause of his said complaints was in consequence of his exposures at the battle of Plattsburg.

Your committee, being fully satisfied that the petitioner is entitled to the relief, report a bill accordingly.

Mr. DUNHAM. I do not intend to detain the committee long. When I made my motion I understood the gentleman on my left [Mr. EASTMAN] to say that this was the first application of the petitioner. In that he is undoubtedly mistaken, for I remember this as an old case. I maintain, however, that the principle is a wrong one. It does seem to me that the same principle which requires us to pay back pensions—the back principal—would require us to pay interest also; for if we have improperly retained the money, we ought to pay interest upon it. But that is not the intention of the Government. The intention of the Government is to furnish a support to the individual who has been disabled in the public service from earning a livelihood by his own exertions, and it seems to me that that is all we ought to do. Suppose a case is brought before this Congress; we think that the claim is not sufficient and reject it. It comes before another House and they reject the claim, and so it goes on for eight or ten years. Finally, a House comes up that is favorable to the bill and passes it, reverses the decision of the eight or ten Congresses before, and gives a back pension. It is for the House to say whether that principle is correct. I do not think it is.

Mr. AVERETT. I rise to make an inquiry as to a fact. Is it a fact that there have been heretofore adverse reports and adverse proceedings of the House upon this case?

Mr. DUNHAM. I cannot answer that question, because the committee's reports are not before the House. We are legislating here without any of the facts of the case before us. The reports are not here and we can tell nothing about the cases. But I understand this case to have been here for several years. I understand the gentleman to have sent to the table the first report made, and that was in 1848, and I presume, therefore, that the case failed to receive the favorable action of Congress.

There is another suggestion which I desire to make. If there is a good claim against the Government, in this case, why is it here? Because the case does not come within the purview of the law, and consequently there is no valid claim against the Government. The claimant comes here to ask from us, not a matter of right but a gratuity. His case comes not within the general law under which the Department is acting. I ask, then, with what propriety can it be said that because this case has been before Congress for five years, we are therefore bound, not to furnish the claimant with a current support, but to set him up in life with sufficient capital to begin with? I say that the principle is wrong. Before I take my seat, I will change my amendment and move that "1846" be stricken out and "1848" be inserted in lieu thereof.

Mr. FOWLER. I wish to say that I objected to this case in the outset, for want of the facts. I understand now that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. EASTMAN] has introduced the substantial facts of the case, by presenting a former report. That report being authenticated, is satisfactory to me, and I state, by way of explanation of my objection in former cases to-day, that it arose solely from the want of light. That was the ground on which I originally objected to this case. I am now satisfied, because we have got a report.

Mr. HEBARD. I believe that the objection to this case is not with reference to the merits of the case, but merely with reference to the point of time at which the pension shall commence. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. DUNHAM] has modified his amendment, and it is not a matter of very great consequence now, except as regards the establishment of a principle. It seems to me that when the gentleman yields the first point, as his amendment indicates, he yields the whole. The gentleman says this is a gratuity. That is very true; but it is a gratuity founded upon the merits of the particular case. I am aware that the principle has been established heretofore in granting invalid pensions, that we shall not go back to the time of service for the date of the commencement of the pension, but that we shall follow the rule adopted by the Pension Department, and allow the pension from the time when the case was made out. Now I understand this case to have been made out to the Pension Department in 1846. That department did not refuse to grant the pension because the case had no merits, but because they were acting under certain rules and regulations, and there were technical objections to their granting the pension. The committee, therefore, acting upon the rule that the pension should commence at the time when the case was made out, have fixed the period at 1846.

It seems to me that we should be acting by a very artificial rule, if, in endeavoring to do justice here, we should deny the first element of justice in the case. If this man was ever entitled to a pension under any law, or according to any principle of or analogy to law, it was when he had made out his case. I hope the House will not undertake to act under any artificial rule or technicality, but will deal out a measure of justice by granting to this very meritorious man, who has made out a very meritorious claim, his pension from the time the committee have recommended.

Mr. MILLSON. There are before the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and before the committee of which I am a member, a great many applications for pensions, and it is very important that the House should use some circumspection in establishing the principle by which they are hereafter to be governed.

I understand that the present application is to place an individual on the pension list, who is not entitled to be there by any existing law. I do not see, therefore, that the objection made in the Pension Office, is of the character described by the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. HEBARD]—a mere technical objection. The claim was rejected, it appears, by the Commissioner of Pensions, not because of any technical objections, but because there was no existing law which authorized this individual to be placed upon the pension list at all.

Mr. HEBARD, (interrupting.) With the permission of the gentleman, I will state that when I spoke of technical objections, I meant that the claim was not disallowed for want of merit.

Mr. MILLSON. Now, for aught I know, there may be petitions before this House, asking that the pension system may be extended to the State volunteers, as well as to the officers and soldiers of the regular Army, and it may be very well for this House to determine whether they will extend the pension system as far as that or not. But it seems to me to be somewhat dangerous to legislate upon general principles, and to apply these general principles only to particular cases. If it be right to place an individual upon the pension list who has been engaged in the service of his State, then, there ought to be a general law embracing those cases; and that is the decision to which the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, to which I belong, has invariably come. There are now before us very many applications from different persons, asking that the benefit of the pension law may be extended to them. The widows of revolutionary soldiers are entitled to receive pensions if they married before the 1st of January, 1800. We have before us now, and there have heretofore been, a great number of petitions asking that those widows who were married since the 1st of January, 1800, may receive pensions from the United States. Those petitions have been invariably rejected, upon the ground, that if the Government chooses to extend the pension laws, it ought to be done by a general law applying to all cases—those cases to be adjusted at the Department, and not by Congress. But the committee have been unwilling to extend relief in a particular case when it would apply to a larger number of instances.

I am expressing no opinion, at this time, as to the propriety of extending our pension system as far as is asked, but I think it is somewhat dangerous to legislate upon these particular applications when we may be committed to such an extension of the system as would be objectionable to the majority of this House. It is not, therefore, because I have come to any definite conclusion in regard to the subject under discussion, but because we are now at the commencement of our session, and because the principles declared to-day, may, if they do not control, at least embarrass our future action, and because we are legislating without the aid of those reports which are intended to give information to the members, that I suggest there should be some little delay at least, before we come to a conclusion which may lead to consequences somewhat formidable. I therefore move that the committee rise.

The question being taken, there was found to be no quorum voting.

Mr. HAMILTON demanded tellers; which were ordered, and Messrs. HAMILTON and MURPHY appointed.

The question being then taken, it was decided in the negative—ayes 43, noes 74.

So the committee refused to rise.

Mr. BISSELL. This application was made some time since—no matter how long ago—and we are about now, for the first time, to take action upon it and decide it. There can be no doubt that we have the power to act arbitrarily in this matter, and do just as we please in reference to it, but I do hold that in this case, as in all others, we ought to have some little regard to consistency. If we decide that this petitioner is entitled to a pension, we decide so upon the case that he made out and presented to us some time ago, but which we have not acted upon till now. There is no additional proof presented to us at this time which was not before us when the application was first made. If he is entitled to a pension now, he was then; and if he was not entitled to it then, he is not now. If we vote him a pension at all, therefore, that pension ought to date back to the time when he made out his case and presented his application. He made out his case and presented it long ago, and now when we are about to act upon it, what consistency or propriety is there in saying that he shall have a pension from this time? Remember that we must decide this case as it was presented to us at first. It has undergone no change—no modification. I will read to the committee a section of the act of 1822, which, I am this moment informed by a friend, covers this case. It is as follows:

"The right any person now has, or hereafter may acquire, to receive a pension in virtue of any law of the United States, shall be construed to commence at the time of completing his testimony, pursuant to the act hereby revived and continued in force."

That is not only law, but it is reason and common sense; and it is clear that this claim ought either to be rejected altogether, or allowed from the time when the application was made and the case perfected.

Mr. SKELTON. I have but a few words to say upon this subject. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BISSELL] says, that if this petitioner is entitled to a pension at all, he is entitled to one from the time when he first made his application. Now, there is a principle involved in this granting of pensions, which the gentleman seems to have overlooked. We grant pensions in some cases upon principles of justice, and in other cases upon principles of humanity. If the petitioner claims his pension upon principles of justice, he is evidently entitled to it for the whole time; but if he claims it on principles of justice and humanity, it is fully competent for us to decide on the extent of his claim. If we acknowledge the principle indicated by the gentleman from Illinois, we must give the pension back to the time when the services were rendered. Now, that is a principle which is acknowledged by no one here.

Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee, (interrupting.) I desire to say one word of explanation. The principle of allowing pensions from the time when the testimony in the case was completed, does not necessarily carry back the allowance to the time when the services were rendered. It proceeds upon this principle: that if the applicant has neglected his rights and slumbered on them, he must take the consequence of having so done; but if, on the other hand, he has made out his case and Congress has neglected to act upon it, then we are bound to allow him his pension from the time when the application was made. In other words, the principle upon which we proceed is, that our neglect shall not prejudice his rights, while his own neglect shall prejudice that right.

Mr. SKELTON. The gentleman bases his proposition on the principles of right and justice; while I contend that these pensions are given upon principles of humanity, out of gratitude, on our part, for services rendered to the country, and that those persons claiming pensions have no right to come to us on principles of justice.

I shall vote for this amendment, because I am opposed to this payment of back pensions, as I believe it to be prejudicial to the interests of the country, and a principle that ought not to be allowed in our legislation.

The question was then taken on Mr. DUNHAM's amendment, and it was not agreed to.

The next question being, "Shall the committee report the bill to the House with a recommendation that it do pass?" it was taken and agreed to.

AMOS KNAPP.

The next bill in order was House bill No. 60, reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, for the relief of Amos Knapp.

There being no objection to the bill, it was ordered to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass.

ARTEMAS CONANT.

The next bill that came up was House bill No. 61, for the payment of arrears of pensions to the guardians of Artemas Conant, reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

No objection being made, the bill was ordered to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass.

The calendar having now been gone through with,

Mr. GOODENOW moved that the committee rise; which motion was agreed to.

The committee rose accordingly, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the Chairman reported that the Committee of the Whole House had had under consideration sundry bills, from number 30 to number 61, inclusive, on the private calendar, and had instructed him to report them all to the House without amendment, and with the recommendation that they do pass.

The bills were then severally reported to the House by their titles.

The SPEAKER said the question on their engrossment would be taken in gross, unless gentlemen desired that it should be taken upon them separately.

Mr. DUNHAM asked that a separate vote be taken upon number 61 for the payment of arrears of pension to the guardian of Artemas Conant.

Mr. STANTON, of Ohio, asked that a separate vote be taken upon number 60 for the relief of Amos Knapp.

The other bills were then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and having been engrossed, were severally read the third time and passed, as follows, viz:

A bill for the relief of the Virginia Woolen Company;

A bill for the relief of Edward Everett, late a sergeant of the United States army;

A bill for the relief of David C. Cash and Giles U. Ellis;

A bill for the relief of John W. Robinson;

A bill for the relief of Gardner Herring;

A bill for the relief of Silas Champion;

A bill for the relief of Philip Miller;

A bill for the relief of Albra Tripp;

A bill for the relief of Joseph Johnston;

A bill for the relief of Robert Milligan; and

A bill for the relief of Sylvanus Blodgett.

AMOS KNAPP AGAIN.

The question then recurred upon the engrossment of number 60, being "A bill for the relief of Amos Knapp."

Mr. STANTON, of Ohio. There has been no statement in regard to this bill as to what are its merits. I ask that it be read.

The bill was accordingly read.

Mr. MOLONY. For the information of the House in relation to this bill, I will state, that the papers accompanying the report, and which were before the committee, show the fact of the discharge of Knapp from the service of the United States during the war of 1812. Knapp's declarations, made under oath, prove to the committee not only the fact of his service for the United States, but his disability incurred in that service; and that the disability has continued from the time it was incurred down to the time of his presenting his case to Congress. He states, furthermore, in that declaration, that he was not only disabled from taking care of himself by disability, but that he is embarrassed in his pecuniary condition—that he is very poor. The declarations of Knapp are sustained, in the first place, by the certificates of nine citizens of Rochester, (the residence of Knapp,) indorsing his statements in relation to his disability, his poverty, and his being engaged in the service of the United States. The character of those nine citizens for high standing and for veracity is indorsed by the member of this House from Rochester, [Mr. SCHERMERHORN.] The fact of Knapp's disability being incurred in the service of the United States is attested by two fellow soldiers who enlisted and served in the war with him—the depositions of those soldiers being taken before a judge of the county court for the county in which Rochester is situated, (Monroe,) and the official character and signature of that judge is attested by the member of this House to whom I have just alluded. The disability of Knapp is attested by two physicians, whose high standing and professional character is indorsed by the same member of this House. These are the material facts which sustain the claim of Knapp, and which were, in the opinion of the committee, sufficient to warrant them in giving a favorable report.

Mr. STANTON, of Ohio. I desire to ask the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. MOLONY,] now, what are the reasons for granting this claim? I understand there is a general law authorizing the Commissioner of Pensions to grant pensions to persons wounded in the military service of the country. I wish to know why this case does not come within the provisions of the general law; and why is it that a special act is necessary?

Mr. MOLONY. The reasons are these: Knapp enlisted in the service of the United States. While in that service he received bodily disability. It also appears that he is now very poor, and needs his rights at the hands of the Government. These are the reasons which have influenced the committee in giving their report.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and having been engrossed, it was read a third time and passed.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. GENTRY. I rise to a privileged question. In consequence of the request of some gentlemen on the other side of the House, who say they are fatigued, [laughter,] I move that when the House adjourn, it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. LETCHER demanded the yeas and nays; and on a division they were not ordered.

The House then agreed to the motion—ayes 99, noes 56.

ARTEMAS MOLONY, AGAIN.

The question now being, "Shall bill No. 61 be engrossed and read a third time?"

Mr. DUNHAM called for the reading of the bill.

The bill was read.

Mr. DUNHAM. I think this is a very singular bill, to say the least of it; and it is due to this House, if nothing more, that the gentleman who reported it, should give an explanation of it. It provides for paying a pension to a guardian from 1830 to 1846, in violation of the principles upon which this Government has heretofore acted.

Mr. MOLONY. For the information of the gentleman last up, and of the House, I will give the facts upon which this report was made. I agree with the gentleman that upon the face of it, it has the appearance of contradicting the rules by which this House has been governed heretofore in granting pensions. It also has upon the face of it an appearance of contradicting the rules that govern the Committee on Invalid Pensions, as has been stated by the chairman of that committee. But it will only become necessary to lay open to the House, and to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. DUNHAM,] the facts as they are, and the prima facie evidence will be rebutted. The facts are, that this said Artemas Conant, in the year 1815, was put upon the pension roll at the rate of $5 per month, for services in the war of 1812. It appears that he continued to draw his pension regularly until 1830; that from 1830 to 1846 his pension was suspended, and for this reason: That the certificate of the physician required by law, and the rules of the Department, to wit—to the fact of the continuation of his disabilities—was not, from 1830 to 1846, rendered to the Department. Hence, according to the rules of the Department, if not according to specific law, the Department refused to give him his pension. In 1846, and from that time to the present, application was successively made to the Department. Accompanying that application was a certificate of a physician, required by statute, of the continuation of the disability upon which the pension was originally granted. The question naturally arises in the minds of gentlemen now here, why this suspension of a pension to 1846, and why did not a certificate of a physician accompany the application? For the reason, as appears in the evidence fully, that said Conant was violently insane—so violent that he would not, and did not, submit to the necessary examination by a physician for the certificate to be rendered. In 1846 his insanity became partially relieved, so much so that he was made to understand the necessity of an examination by a physician, and of a certificate, in order to procure his pension. He submitted to that examination. From that time a certificate has been given, and he has drawn his pension.

Mr. DUNHAM. I wish to inquire if he is still living?

Mr. MOLONY. He was a short time since.

Mr. DUNHAM. Then I move, so far as I am concerned, simply to amend this bill by inserting after the word "guardian," the words "for the use of said Conant."

The question was taken on the amendment, and it was agreed to.

The question was then taken upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time, and it was agreed to. The bill having been engrossed, it was then read the third time and passed.

Mr. GOODENOW. I ask leave of the House to report a bill from the Committee on Naval Affairs. When that committee was called the other day, I did not hear it at all. I am anxious to report a bill, that it may be put upon the calendar.

Mr. ORR. The committees will be called in a day or two again. I move the House adjourn.

Mr. VENABLE. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his motion, for the reason that there is a communication upon the table which, I think, is in answer to the call which emanated from the Committee on Territories. I hope the House will not adjourn until that communication be opened and read. The public feel an interest in it. I take an interest in it, and I think the House does.

Mr. ORR. I will withdraw it for that purpose.

Mr. MILLER. I ask the consent of the House to introduce a bill, of which previous notice has been given.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I move that the House proceed to the consideration of the business upon the Speaker's table.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. The motion is not in order.

The SPEAKER. It is not in order if objection is made.

Mr. STEPHENS. It is always in order after one hour. We have exhausted the private calendar.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I object. It is not in order.

The SPEAKER. It is not in order if objected to.

Mr. FOWLER. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I withdraw my objection to the motion of the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS.]

Mr. FOWLER. I withdraw my motion to adjourn.

UTAH TERRITORY.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, then laid before the House the following communication from the President of the United States, viz:

To the House of Representatives:

In answer to the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 15th ultimo, requesting information in regard to the Territory of Utah, I transmit a report from the Secretary of State, to whom the resolution was referred.

MILLARD FILLMORE.

WASHINGTON, January 9, 1852.

[For which documents see Appendix.]

Mr. POLK. On account of the voluminous character of the documents accompanying the communication from the Executive, I move that their reading be dispensed with, and that they be printed.

Mr. KING, of New York. Let us have it.

Mr. CLINGMAN. If the gentleman will allow me, I will move to amend that motion.

Mr. BERNHISEL. I move—

Mr. CLINGMAN. I wish to ask the gentleman from Utah—

Mr. POLK. I have not yielded the floor. If the gentleman wishes to propound a question I will yield.

Mr. CLINGMAN. My question is simply to request the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. POLK] so to modify his motion that, in addition to the motion to print, there may be one of reference to the Committee on Territories, who have called for this information.

Mr. POLK. I move that the communication from the President of the United States be printed, and referred to the Committee on Territories. I consider it a matter of great importance. We have had rumors from that country, and the National Legislature should take some charge of them if they are true.

Mr. BERNHISEL. I move that the communication of the President of the United States, and accompanying report, be read and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary—as it involves some grave legal questions—and that it be printed.

Mr. Speaker, before the reception and reference of the report addressed to the President of the United States by the three disappointed and returning officers of the United States for the Territory of Utah, containing, as I am informed and believe it does, grave and grossly-exaggerated, not to say false and perverted statements, impugning the conduct and character not only of the Governor, but the whole people of a new and distant Territory whom I have the honor, as a Delegate on this floor, to represent. From my own knowledge in part, and from others, I know and am informed, and venture to assert, that if time and opportunity should be given for that purpose, the committee to whom the reference shall be made will be furnished with ample evidence of the grossly exaggerated, shamefully perverted, and apparently misrepresented facts, statements, and detailed occurrences contained in the report. Unable to communicate at this season of the year with the Governor and people of that distant and dependent Territory, loyal as I know them to be to the Government and Constitution of the United States, assailed and aspersed as they are in that report in their official, moral, and religious character, and charged with crimes and misdemeanors of such enormity and character as to challenge credulity and stagger belief—

Mr. HEBARD. I rise to a question of order. It is whether it is proper to refer to the sentiments of that report when it has not been read, and we know nothing about it?

The SPEAKER. It is in order upon a motion to print to refer to the body of the report.

Mr. BERNHISEL. I ask for the reading of the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can perhaps facilitate his object by taking the question on the motion that the communication be read.

Cries—"Mr. Speaker!" "Mr. Speaker!" all over the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Utah has the floor if discussion arises.

Mr. BERNHISEL. At an early day I shall ask for a commission to be appointed by the Speaker of this House, or by the President of the United States, to proceed to the Territory of Utah, under authority and with instructions to take testimony to be laid before Congress and the committee touching the matters contained in the report referred to; and in the mean time I bespeak a suspension not only of Executive action based on this report, but of the opinion of the members of this House and the people of this country in relation to the Governor and people of Utah, and the libelous report preferred against them, and on file in the Department of State. After the reference, I shall ask leave to offer a resolution, that the committee to whom it is referred shall have power to send for persons and papers, and to send a commission to Utah to take testimony to be laid before Congress in this case.

I renew my motion that the communication be read, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. POLK. I desire to inquire of the Chair if the motion I made is not first in order?

The SPEAKER. It is so considered by the Chair.

Mr. STUART. I only wish to say a word or two before this question is submitted to the House. I will simply remark, that this is a communication derived from the Executive through the action of the Committee on Territories. A resolution was introduced by the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. CLINGMAN,] under instructions from that committee, of which I have the honor to be a member, and which was adopted at a former day. This communication is a response to it, and I know of no reason why it should be referred to any other committee.

Mr. BERNHISEL. I do hope the House will refer this question to the Committee on the Judiciary, as it involves grave legal questions.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I have individually no preference in relation to this matter, but I feel it to be my duty, as I do not see the chairman of our committee—the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. RICHARDSON]—in his seat, to say that he regarded it as a part of the duties of the committee, and the whole committee were of the opinion that we should have this information. It is the duty of our committee to recommend appropriations for, and also what laws are necessary to be passed for the good government of the Territories. It will be found, therefore, that the resolution which the committee instructed me to offer is very comprehensive. It calls for all information in relation to the present condition of that Territory, to enable us to determine whether the existing laws are sufficient for its good government—to protect our citizens there; also to ascertain what has become of the public money heretofore appropriated, and whether these charges of misapplication are true, and various other matters I do not now propose to go into. It cannot act until it has this information. For one, sir, with the impressions upon my mind, I will not be disposed to recommend any appropriation for that Territory to this House, nor will I vote for any appropriation to the Territory of Utah until I ascertain what truth there is in these allegations. It was therefore that the committee made the call; and in the absence of the chairman, who understands the question better than I do, perhaps better than any member of the committee, I thought it courteous and proper that the information called for by the committee should go to them. Individually I would prefer that the Judiciary Committee should take charge of the matter. It would relieve us from the labor of the investigation. I make this statement in behalf of the chairman of the Committee on Territories, who is absent. I now call for the previous question.

Mr. GIDDINGS. Will the gentleman from North Carolina withdraw his motion for a moment? I will renew it.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I have no objection.

Mr. GIDDINGS. There is much force in the argument of the gentleman from North Carolina.

I am also a member of the committee to which he belongs, and I have not, nor has that gentleman any personal desire to take jurisdiction of this matter. These people are a distant people. They are represented upon this floor by a representative who is certainly a young member here, and who desires these charges should go to the Committee on the Judiciary. I, as a member of the Committee on the Territories, am perfectly willing and desirous they should go to that committee. I do not know but it is certainly as proper as that it should go to the Committee on the Territories. It is for an infraction of the laws. The people of the Territory are charged with violating the laws of the United States, and it appears to me these questions are appropriate ones for the Committee on the Judiciary. I have thus spoken solely because the gentleman from Utah [Mr. BERNHISEL] is a young member here. He feels anxious these charges should go before that committee, and to gratify him and that distant people, I hope it will go to the Committee on the Judiciary. I will now move the previous question.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I wish to say a word.

The call for the previous question was withdrawn.

Mr. C. I have no preferences in the matter. I do not care what the House does. If it judges this to be more appropriate for the Judiciary Committee, let it go there; but our committee took a different view of it. The chairman is not here. I regard it as falling properly within the duties of that committee. I am not aware of any reason why that committee would not just be as likely to do justice to the gentleman, whom I never saw or heard of until he became a member of this House. I presume no member of the committee has any prejudice against Utah. I have none upon the subject; but if there was, I do not see why that should change our action here. I doubt whether they knew these charges would be preferred at the time that gentleman left home. He may have some reason for referring it to the Judiciary Committee, but he has not assigned any. If the House think it proper, let it go there. I renew now the call for the previous question, because I regard debate as unnecessary.

Mr. LOCKHART. I ask for the reading of the 95th rule.

The rule was read by the Clerk, as follows:

"It shall be the duty of the Committee on the Territories to examine into the legislative, civil, and criminal proceedings of the Territories, and to devise and report to the House such means as, in their opinion, may be necessary to secure the rights and privileges of residents and non-residents."

Mr. CLINGMAN withdraw the call for the previous question at the request of—

Mr. McLANAHAN, who said the question whether this matter be submitted to one or the other of these committees is one of serious importance. It seems to me the reading of that rule ought to be sufficient to convince the House that the proper reference of the question is to the Committee on Territories. As a matter of courtesy, the disposition of some members of that committee seems to be to refer it to the Committee on the Judiciary. It is a question that originates under the organic law of that Territory, and it is the peculiar duty of the Committee on Territories to see that the organic law, coming through their hands in its original form, should be fully, fairly, and honestly carried out. Doubtless, sir, questions of constitutional law may arise; but it is not to be presumed, because such questions are involved in this case, that therefore no other committee of the House is capable of attending to them except the Committee on the Judiciary. If the House think proper to impose the duties upon that committee, I trust we will discharge them with fidelity; but, under the rules of the House, as well as considering the committee from which this investigation has originated—the committee who had the resolution passed, and to whose inquiry this is a response, I think, as a matter of courtesy as well as of parliamentary duty, it belongs to the Committee on Territories. The Committee on the Judiciary do not claim it as a right; they cannot claim it as a right, whether arising out of courtesy or under the rules of the House; but for the reasons I have suggested, I think the House would act with great propriety in referring it to the committee in which the resolution of inquiry originated.

Mr. BERNHISEL. I will withdraw my motion to refer it to the Committee on the Judiciary.

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

PUBLISHED AT WASHINGTON, BY JOHN C. RIVES.—TERMS $3 FOR THIS SESSION.

32D CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 13, 1852.

NEW SERIES....No. 16.

Mr. McLANAHAN. I call for the previous question.

Mr. BERNHISEL. I renew my motion to have the document read and printed.

The SPEAKER. During the pendency of the call for the previous question, the gentleman cannot submit the motion to have the document read.

Mr. HOUSTON. It has never been read. If the House will agree to pass this subject over until morning, the communication will appear in the morning papers, and then we can all tell whether this matter ought to go to one committee or the other, and it will supersede the necessity of reading an immense amount of matter.

[Cries of "Question!" "Question!"]

Mr. CLINGMAN demanded the previous question.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman has a right to ask that a document shall be read at any time. I think the rule so states, that the question shall be put to the House as to the reading, and when a paper is before the House that has not been read, I understand that the rules authorize any member to have it read at once.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Is this in order upon the call for the previous question?

The SPEAKER. It is true, under the rules any gentleman of the committee, or any other member, has a right to have all papers accompanying the President's message read as a matter of course, which must be done independent of the call for the previous question.

Mr. HALL asked for the reading of the 57th rule.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee, moved that the House adjourn; which was not agreed to.

The 57th rule was then read.

Mr. HENN. I wish to ask whether the motion now before the House is debatable?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered, which was upon referring the communication to the Committee on Territories, and ordering it to be printed.

The question was then taken, and it was agreed to.

Mr. BERNHISEL. I beg leave to offer the following resolution, and send it to the Clerk to be read.

[Cries of "I object!" "I object!"]

The SPEAKER. The resolution may be read for information.

The resolution was then read, as follows:

Resolved, That the committee to whom has been referred the report of the three returned officers of the United States for the Territory of Utah, addressed to the President of the United States and communicated to this House, have power to send for persons and papers, and to send a Commissioner (to be designated by the Speaker of this House) to Utah, duly instructed and commissioned to take depositions in writing touching the matters contained in said report as are of public concern, and to return and report the same to said committee; and that the Delegate in Congress from that Territory have authority from this House to retain counsel to conduct the proceedings in this case before said committee.

Mr. HALL objected, and the resolution was not received.

Mr. KURTZ had leave to withdraw from the files of the House the petition and papers of Henry Miller, praying for a pension; and on his motion, the same were referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the War Department, transmitting, in compliance with the acts of April 21, 1808, and March 2, 1809, statements of what contracts have been made under the authority of this Department during the year 1851.

Also, a communication from said Department, under the act of 1809, transmitting a statement of the expenditures from the appropriation for the contingent expenses for the military establishment; which communications were severally referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, laid before the House a communication from the Navy Department, transmitting, in compliance with the act of 26th August, 1842, a statement showing the clerks employed in that Department during the year 1851; which, on motion of Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee, was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

LAWS OF NEW MEXICO.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House copies of the acts, resolutions, and memorials of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of New Mexico, beginning in June, 1851; which was referred to the Committee on Territories, and ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER begs leave to present the laws of the Territorial Council of Minnesota. I ask leave to remind the House, that there was a letter presented in connection with this subject, and laid upon the table.

Mr. SIBLEY moved that the copy of the communication, with a copy of the acts, be referred to the Committee on the Territories; and it was so ordered.

Mr. HENN asked leave to withdraw certain papers; which was objected to.

Mr. STUART. I wish to inquire if the acts sent from New Mexico are now printed?

The SPEAKER. According to my best recollection, the laws of New Mexico were ordered to be printed.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I will move to reconsider the vote taken a few minutes since; and I desire to say a word upon it. I would be glad that any one would show me when the Territories send copies of their laws here, why we should order them to be printed. I would be glad to have any one give me a good reason why we should print a mass of legislative matter, with a great deal of which we have nothing to do, and which is entirely and wholly an unnecessary expense. If the Committee on Territories shall think that they want any portion of these laws printed for the purpose of action by this Congress, then they can apply to this House and have them printed. But to print the entire body of these laws, seems to me too absurd an idea to consider.

Mr. SIBLEY. I wish merely to state to my friend from Arkansas, [Mr. JOHNSON,] that by the order of the House all these communications come to the Committee on Territories, and it is from them that any action of the House emanates. There is no necessity for printing an additional number of laws that may come here. Those from Minnesota are already printed; and those from New Mexico are in manuscript.

The SPEAKER. There is no order to print the laws from Minnesota. There is one to print those of New Mexico.

Mr. JOHNSON. I understand that there is a separate order to print the laws of New Mexico. I move to reconsider the vote, so that the printing shall not be ordered. The code as it now stands, with slight change, was printed years ago. Now, under the organization of these Territories, Congress has jurisdiction of all the laws which have passed there. We have the veto power if we choose to exercise it. There is not one act out of a hundred which Congress would be disposed to take hold of or consider at all. Under these circumstances, why shall we order the whole of these acts to be printed? The committee can tell, in nine cases out of ten, by reading the title of an act through, whether it is necessary to look into it at all.

Mr. STUART. I wish to make a suggestion to the gentleman. If he will let the question to reconsider stand over until the chairman of the Territories can have a moment to look at it, there will be no difficulty about it.

Mr. KING, of New York. When was this motion made to print?

The SPEAKER. Only about ten minutes ago.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I have but very little more to say upon this matter. The very gentleman who made the motion says upon reflection he will consent to a reconsideration.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia, (interrupting.) I will not consent. Will the gentleman give way for explanation?

Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly, for purposes of explanation.

Mr. BAYLY. I do not want to explain. I wish to reply to the gentleman.

Mr. JOHNSON. I well know what the gentleman wants. I know him full well, and I know that he is an economist of the first water. I like the gentleman exceedingly for his most excellent and kindly deportment in this House, and I would be glad to vote with him, if he can show me what there is in these laws which require that we should print them, and which the committee cannot read in manuscript. The laws now proposed to be printed relate to the local legislation of that Territory, and every trifling and insignificant act. The printing of them will be wholly and entirely an expense without a consideration. The acts are of every character, class, and variety—everything, from a premium for a wolf-scap out. Why does that gentleman wish to get at these laws? It has some relation to the fugitive slave law, I take it. Why, such an object can be attained by the Committee on Territories making ordinary examinations of these laws in manuscript, and if proper for our consideration they can present them by their titles to this House with a request that they shall be printed, accompanied with such resolutions or recommendations of action as they may think proper.

Mr. BAYLY, (again interrupting.) Will the gentleman give way for a moment?

Mr. JOHNSON. I have no doubt the Speaker will assign the floor to the gentleman as soon as I am through, and it will give me great pleasure if he will do so.

I would be glad to know why the gentleman supports a motion to print the laws that have been enacted by these Territorial Legislatures—which they have not seen fit to print for themselves, or at least have not seen fit to send here in the printed form? I am certain that in times past, when these laws have been referred to the Committee on Territories, there has never been issued—at least where there has been any debate or consideration upon the subject—an order of this House to print the entire laws of the Territories. These laws are too local and inconsiderable in their character for it to be necessary for us to print them. For one I am opposed to it, and I hope the House will reconsider and vote down the motion.

Mr. BAYLY. I care little about this matter, but the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. JOHNSON] has asked me what particular laws of these Territories I want printed. I do not know one word about any one law that either of these Territories have passed, and for the very reason that I know nothing about it, I want these laws printed that I may see what they are.

Mr. HALL. I understand that nearly all of these laws have been printed by this House, and are now bound up in one of our Executive documents of four or five years ago. The Legislature have reenacted the Kearny code.

Mr. BAYLY. There is a species of economy that I have never been the advocate of, though my friend from Arkansas has seen fit to pronounce a eulogy upon me as an economist, in which, of course, he referred to me in my public capacity, and not in my private capacity. Well, in one sense I am an economist. But I am not for that sort of economy by which we may save a few hundred dollars and keep ourselves in darkness in reference to matters of important public concern.

Now, the Congress of the United States has already reserved to itself a veto over the legislation of the Territory. To enable us to act understandingly in this capacity which we have reserved to ourselves, it is proper that these laws should be printed, so that we can know what they are.

It is for the very reason that I do not know what a solitary one of these laws is, that I desire to have them printed. The expense of printing is a small matter.

The gentleman from Arkansas says that they have sent these laws here in manuscript—that they have not printed them themselves. Well, that supplies a very good reason why we should do it.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I believe I did not say that. You misunderstood me.

Mr. BAYLY. Then what was it that you said?

Mr. JOHNSON. I did not say that they had not printed them at all. I said that if they had printed them, they had chosen to send us the manuscript only.

Mr. BAYLY. That does not alter the case at all. The only copy of these laws which we have is in manuscript. Now every member of the House has a right to see those laws, because every member has a right to move to disapprove of them, and there is but one copy of them in the city. Can there be a better reason assigned for printing them? Suppose the copy of those laws is referred to the Committee on Territories; there are nine members of the committee, and each one of them is to read these laws in the manuscript. Why, it would take nearly the whole session for the members of the committee, with their other engagements, to read them—to say nothing about the members of this House. I want to see these laws, and they ought to be printed.

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HALL] tells me that these laws are nothing but a transcript of the Kearny code. I do not know anything about that.

Mr. FOWLER. You want to see that code, I suppose?

Mr. BAYLY. Yes, I want to see that code, as the gentleman from Massachusetts suggests; and I undertake to say here, in respect to the legislation of this Territory of Utah, that if the American Congress does not keep its eyes open, and does not look to what they are doing there, we shall one of these days have an extent of trouble with that people that nobody here now dreams of. Let any one read the history of that people.

Mr. MEADE. Will my colleague allow me to say one single word, as an additional reason for the printing of these laws?

Mr. BAYLY. Certainly. I yield the floor to my colleague.

Mr. MEADE. I will inform my colleague and the House, that I understand that code to have been written by a private soldier in the Army of the United States.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. Well, what then?

Mr. MEADE. I want the code printed, because I understand that it reflects great credit upon the private soldier who drew it up.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. It has been printed, and is now amongst the public documents.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I should be glad to ask the gentleman from Virginia, whether that soldier had anything more to do with the code than the copying of it? Whether he really drew it up, and whether he enacted it? Because if he did, it would certainly add much to the credit he may deserve.

Mr. MEADE. I will explain to the gentleman from Arkansas, that I understand the code was made at the time that the Territory was without laws, and in the occupancy of General Kearny. One of his privates was called upon by him to write a code of laws, and he not only wrote it, but drew it up. And that private is now a member of this House.

Mr. JOHNSON. Will the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BAYLY] yield me the floor for a moment?

Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee. Permit me to move an adjournment.

Mr. BAYLY. Oh no, let me finish what I have got to say.

Mr. JOHNSON. Does the gentleman yield the floor?

Mr. BAYLY. Reluctantly, I do.

Mr. JOHNSON. It has been ascertained that these laws were copied—and I say it with no disrespect to those who copied them—from an odd volume of the old laws of the Territory or State of Missouri. Now we are asked to reprint, for the benefit and use of this House, all those old things that are to be found in print everywhere!

Mr. BAYLY. The opposition to the printing of these laws only creates an additional necessity for doing it, because gentlemen—and certainly gentlemen such as my friend from Arkansas—never make useless opposition to anything. I want to see these laws, and it is proper that they should be printed. But, to resume what I was saying with respect to this Territory of Utah. Unless this Congress keeps its eyes open with respect to the movements of that people, we are going to have an amount of trouble with them that nobody now conceives of.

Mr. HALL. You are not in order in referring to that subject now.

Mr. BAYLY. If gentlemen will not interrupt me, I shall soon finish what I have to say. It is very rarely that I have ever been found out of order in this House, since I have been here.

I will not, however, pursue the remarks which I intended to make in reference to the Utah Territory, because I find the hour is so late that gentlemen are indisposed to hear debate of any kind. [Loud cries of "Go on!"]

Mr. BAYLY. I do not wish to pursue that topic now. But I say, it is false economy, it is a grand mistake to undertake to save money by refusing to print matter in which this House ought to feel an interest, and, if it does not, in which the country feels a deep interest.

I want to see the laws that have been passed in New Mexico and Utah. I want to understand what is going on in those Territories. There has enough transpired already, in one of them, to awaken the vigilance of the American people. As I have already said, the House has a veto upon their legislation; and to enable us to act understandingly, we ought to have their laws before us. I care not whether they are written by a private in the Army, or by a general, or by anybody else. I want to see them, and I want to see them all the more, if they were written by a military man, for I have no confidence in military legislation—none whatever.

Mr. STUART. If the gentleman will allow me, I will occupy the floor but a moment.

Mr. JOHNSON. If the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. STUART] will allow me, I desire to say in reply to the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. BAYLY] that I now hold in my hand the document which is proposed to be printed. The gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. HALL] who was in his seat a minute ago, told me that, with the exception of some half a dozen pages, the whole of this voluminous document is now in print, and that, as the Kearny code, it was nearly all copied from the laws of Missouri, and those half dozen pages contain little else but blank paper. So this very slight portion of it is all that remains unprinted. Yet the whole document is to be reprinted, and for what purpose? Now, I ask my friend from Virginia—for I will use that word, so often very improperly used in this House—if he ever in his life read a copy of the laws of any one Territory when they were printed? If these laws were printed, I do not believe they will be read by a single member. The Committee on Territories, whose business it is to examine into these matters, will of course do it. Now, I desire to ask the gentleman from Virginia if he ever in his life read one single copy of the laws of any Territory, when presented in this manner for our consideration? I hope the gentleman will give me a categorical answer.

Mr. BAYLY. I will answer the gentleman.

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes or no?

Mr. BAYLY. I do not choose that the gentleman shall dictate to me my answer; I prefer to give it in my own way.

Mr. JOHNSON. I will not insist upon the gentleman's answering it categorically.

Mr. STUART. I think I can dispose of this question, if gentlemen will allow me, so that neither of them will have any right to complain.

Mr. JOHNSON. Well; I will not keep my friend from Michigan [Mr. STUART] standing much longer. [Laughter.] I will allow him to have his way.

Mr. BAYLY. Will the gentleman allow me for one moment?

Mr. STUART. Will the gentleman allow me first to make my suggestion?

Mr. BAYLY. Certainly.

Mr. STUART. I would suggest that if this House adjourn pending this motion, the paper will still be printed. I understand the Speaker may control this matter to some extent, and he may order it to be printed or not. I assure the House that the Committee on the Territories will not proceed rashly in this matter, the chairman being absent. I hope the House will now adjourn.

Mr. BAYLY. I undertake to say that, if the House adjourn with this motion to reconsider the motion to print still pending, no printing will be done until that motion is disposed of.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will remark that he shall feel himself called upon to order a suspension of printing until this motion is disposed of.

Mr. STUART. Under the assurance of the Chair, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and
The House adjourned till Monday next.

RAILROAD COMPANIES.

Mr. FELCH submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for granting a right of way through the public lands to all railroad companies authorized by the laws of the respective States to construct said roads, when the same pass through such lands.

MARINE CORPS.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution submitted by Mr. CLEMENS, on the 6th instant; which was read, as follows, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of adopting a separate code of regulations for the government of the Marine Corps of the United States.

Be it further resolved, That said committee be also instructed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the President of the United States to appoint, annually, two cadets to the Military Academy at West Point, to be educated with a view to appointment in the Marine Corps.

STATE OF THE SURVEYS.

The Senate then proceeded to the consideration of the following resolution, submitted by Mr. SHIELDS yesterday:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be directed to employ a draftsman to mark and lay down on the maps now in the room of the Committee on Public Lands the state of the surveys, and also show what has been disposed of by sale or otherwise. The rate of compensation for the service shall be the same as that of a clerk not exceeding $1,800 per annum.

Mr. SHIELDS. Lest there should be some misunderstanding with regard to this resolution, I will state what is its object. It is a resolution which I was instructed by the Committee on Public Lands to report to the Senate. Draftsmen have been employed by the House of Representatives for several years, who have prepared maps showing the state of the public lands in the different States of the Union. That labor has been performed at a very great expense, and has been exceedingly difficult and troublesome. Those who have performed the work have gone to the General Land Office and examined the plats and the surveys, and have brought these maps up nearly to the present time. In our committee room we have the maps ready for the work, and the work is nearly performed under the operation of some former resolution. The object of this resolution, then, is not to go into anything like the expense which has been incurred in the House of Representatives. I should object to that. But the labor has been done in the House, and is on the maps of the House, and all we want is to transfer that work to the maps which are now in our room. I understand the work can be done without much loss of time, and at a very trifling expense. It can be done, perhaps, in three months. The expense, as will be seen by a reference to the resolution, is not to exceed the hire of a clerk for the time he is employed; and we shall secure thereby the benefit of all the information which has been collected in the House of Representatives for several years. The expense has been incurred and the labor performed for the House, and the question is, whether we will take advantage of it.

The resolution was adopted.

NAVY-YARD AT SAN FRANCISCO.

Mr. GWIN. I should be gratified if the Senate would now proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 15, which is a bill to establish a navy-yard and dépôt on the bay of San Francisco, in California. This is a bill on which it appears necessary that there should be immediate action. The bill requires the President of the United States to cause an examination and survey to be made of the bay of San Francisco, by a board of experienced officers, with a view of selecting such a site for a navy-yard and dépôt, on that bay, as will be most suitable for such an establishment. Now, if that board is not appointed immediately, it will be impossible for them to make a survey and report upon it before the next session of Congress, and, of course, impossible to take any active measures before that time for the construction of a navy-yard. It has been found that in the site formerly designed for a navy-yard, there is not sufficient water, and that some other location will have to be chosen.

There is another reason why this bill should be passed as early as possible. At the last session of Congress an act was passed authorizing the building of a sectional floating dry-dock, and the same objection exists in regard to the location of this dock, as in the location of the navy-yard, namely a want of sufficient water. There was a site selected for this dock, and an experiment made by which it was ascertained that the location was unsuitable. The dock is now built, and in a few days it will be ready to be shipped. But unless another location be selected, it will be of little or no use. There will be no expense incurred in consequence of the passage of this bill except from the appointment of these commissioners, and the selection of a site for this dock and navy-yard. This bill was reported unanimously by the Committee on Naval Affairs, and I hope that there will be no objection to taking it up.

The PRESIDENT. The motion is to postpone all the previous orders in order to take up this bill.

The question being taken, the consideration of the previous order was postponed, and the motion to take up the bill was agreed to.

The bill was then read and considered by the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

The original bill consists of two sections, reported by the Committee on Naval Affairs, with two additional sections as amendments. The first section authorizes the President of the United States to cause an examination and survey of the bay of San Francisco to be made by a board of commissioners, to be appointed by him for that purpose, with the view of selecting a location for a navy-yard and dry-dock. The second section provides that when such site shall be so selected, the President shall appoint and assign such officers, and make such arrangements, as may be necessary for the establishment of such navy-yard, upon the most approved plan.

The amendment reported by the committee, and contained in sections three and four, provides that in the selection of such site, regard shall be had to its adaptation for the construction of a basin and railway, and the location of the sectional floating dry-dock now in course of construction; and that the President be authorized to allow additional compensation, not exceeding double the amount of their present pay, to the officers whom he may appoint, and to allow them the actual amount of their expenses consequent upon the performance of their duty.

Mr. GWIN. The Senator from Virginia has suggested to me an objection to the bill, which he will state to the Senate. In order that I may make progress, I am willing that the section to which he objects should be stricken out.

The PRESIDENT. The first question will be on the adoption of the amendments.

Mr. BRODHEAD. I would suggest that this bill should be laid over until Monday. It is a very important bill. We have erected a number of dry docks recently, and I think this is a matter which should be carefully examined.

Mr. GWIN. I will not object to that, for I wish the bill to be fully considered.

Mr. BRODHEAD. Then I move to postpone the further consideration of the bill till Monday next.

The question was taken, and the motion to postpone was agreed to.

THE COMPROMISE MEASURES.

The Senate resumed the consideration of Mr. Foote's resolution as amended on the motion of Mr. BADGER, declaring the series of compromise measures of the last session a definitive settlement of all questions growing out of the subject of slavery.

[Mr. Downs spoke at length on the subject; and in favor of the compromise measures. For a report of his speech see Appendix.]

Mr. DAVIS then rose and said: I believe we have reached an hour when, perhaps, it would be as well to adjourn, and I make that motion.

Mr. McRAE. I would ask the Senator to suspend his motion for a moment, in order that I may ask him a question.

Mr. DAVIS. I comply with the Senator's request.

Mr. McRAE. Does the Senator desire, by making the motion to adjourn, to obtain the floor?

Mr. DAVIS. I desire to submit a few remarks on the resolution.

Mr. McRAE. I desired myself, at as early a period as I could do so, to give expression to my views on the subject which is before the Senate; therefore it was that I asked the Senator whether he desired the floor. I yield to him.

The Senate then adjourned.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, January 12, 1852.

with the stipulations of the 4th article of the treaty of Washington of August 9, 1842; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa, presented the memorial of Benjamin S. Roberts, an officer of the United States Army, praying indemnity for losses sustained during the war with Mexico; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. GWIN presented the memorial of officers of the United States Army stationed in California, praying a continuance of the increased pay granted by an act of Congress; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SHIELDS presented the petition of citizens of Illinois, praying a grant of the right of way through the public lands for a railroad from Shawneetown to the Mississippi river, opposite St. Louis, Missouri; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. STOCKTON presented two petitions of citizens of Trenton, New Jersey, against the introduction of corporal punishment in the Navy; which were asked to lie on the table.

Mr. DOUGLAS presented the memorial of Robert H. Caffee and others, lately attached to the Commission for running and marking the boundary line between the United States and Mexico, praying to be allowed their pay and traveling expenses from the time they ceased to be employed on that service until their return to their homes; which was referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. SEWARD presented the petition of Wesley Smith, alderman, and five hundred residents of the eleventh ward of the city of New York, calling the attention of Congress to the question of intervention of Russia in the struggle of Hungary for freedom. It was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and is as follows:

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America:

We, the undersigned, citizens of the eleventh ward in the city of New York, do respectfully represent, that we do consider that the petition of Louis Kossuth, on behalf of the people of Hungary, is in accordance with those principles of justice and right which we find implanted in our minds, and to which all humanity owes allegiance. And as we consider that to shrink from the performance of a duty imposed by those principles, as cowardly in a great nation, we ask of your honorable bodies that you, in behalf of the United States, of whom we are a part, do proclaim your acquiescence in the three petitions offered by said Louis Kossuth in a speech made at the banquet given by the municipal authorities of New York, or in so many of those petitions as our Constitution and laws permit your acquiescence in.

LOUISVILLE AND PORTLAND CANAL.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have a petition, very numerously signed by the people of Tennessee, and particularly of the city of Nashville. It prays Congress to make an appropriation for the purpose of rendering the navigation of the Louisville and Portland canal free. It shows the amount of tolls received upon that canal from the time of its construction. The sum received in 1850 was $115,000; and in 1851 the amount, it is believed, was $150,000. I will not detain the Senate by showing how the amount received has increased from $12,750 up to $150,000. I have already given notice that I intend to bring in a bill upon this subject, which I shall offer within a few days. I do not know any committee to which it will be proper to refer the memorial at present, and therefore I hope it will be received and laid upon the table.

It was accordingly laid on the table.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have also received, upon the same subject, the proceedings of the General Council of the city of Louisville, in which they represent the necessity of making the navigation of that canal free, and of an appropriation for its enlargement; and embracing a series of resolutions upon the whole subject; and for the reason already assigned, I will give it the same destination.

It was accordingly laid on the table.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion by Mr. CLARKE, it was Ordered, That the petition of Nancy Bowen, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

On motion by Mr. HUNTER, it was Ordered, That the memorial of Elizabeth V. Lomax, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

On motion by Mr. SEWARD, it was Ordered, That the petition of George G. Bishop and Peter U. Morgan, administrator of John Arnold, deceased, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

REPORTS FROM STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. WADE, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the petition of William A. Duer, administrator of William A. Duer, deceased, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. FELCH, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill to revise and continue in force for a limited time the provisions of an act relative to suspended entries of public land, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill to establish an additional land office in Michigan, reported it without amendment.

Mr. SEWARD, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred a communication from Aaron H. Palmer, submitted a report, accompanied by the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be discharged from the further consideration of the communication of Aaron H. Palmer, relating to the colonial dependencies of Japan, and a plan for opening that empire to the commerce of the United States.

On motion by Mr. SEWARD, it was Ordered, That the report be printed.

Mr. HAMLIN, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred a memorial of citizens of Portland, Maine, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill making an appropriation for the erection of a Marine hospital at Portland, Maine.

The bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

Ordered, That the report be printed.

On motion by Mr. SHIELDS, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Public Lands be discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of James B. Cushing and others.

CASE OF CAPTAIN THOMAS SNODGRASS.

Mr. SEBASTIAN, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported a bill, accompanied by a report, for the relief of Captain Thomas Snodgrass.

The bill provides that the sum of $230 be appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to reimburse to Captain Thomas Snodgrass the expenses incurred by him for a team, and balance for forage and subsistence furnished to his company of volunteers while employed as a guard, or escort, for a party of emigrating Cherokees in the year 1838.

Mr. S. I will say, in explanation of the report, that this bill was before the Committee on Indian Affairs at a previous session; that at that time this claim received a faithful investigation, and from the evidence adduced, it was clear that it was just, beyond all question. The committee therefore, without hesitation recommended the passage of that bill at the last session, and in the report they now present, they merely refer to a report which was formerly made. The amount recommended is the same as that embraced in the former Senate bill.

Mr. CLEMENS. I wish to ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to act upon this bill now. It has been reported upon before, and was unanimously recommended by the committee.

There being no objection, the bill was considered by the Senates in Committee of the Whole, and no amendment being offered, it was reported back to the Senate, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

LOCATING MILITARY LAND WARRANTS.

Mr. FELCH. I am instructed by the Committee on Public Lands to ask to be discharged from the further consideration of a number of petitions referred to them, asking additional compensation to the several land officers for locating military bounty land warrants in the several States.

Mr. WALKER. I would inquire if the committee have any special reasons for asking to be discharged from the consideration of these petitions, and whether the committee which makes this report wish to be understood as being averse to giving further compensation?

Mr. FELCH. I should have stated, but I supposed every Senator knew, that we have reported in favor of giving additional compensation; and therefore it was that we ask to be discharged from the further consideration of these memorials.

Mr. WALKER. If I understand what the Senator refers to, it is an amendment to the bill providing for the assignability of land warrants; but if that bill should not become a law, the provision to which the Senator refers will go down of course.

Mr. FELCH. We cannot be accountable for what may be the action of the Senate on the subject; but whatever it may be, it is competent for any member to present the subject again.

The motion was agreed to, and it was Ordered, That the Committee on Public Lands be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of the late and present land officers of Dixon, Illinois, praying additional compensation on account of services connected with bounty lands, and from the several memorials and petitions on the same subject referred to the committee.

Mr. UNDERWOOD subsequently moved to postpone all prior orders for the purpose of taking up and disposing of the bill referred to, to make bounty land warrants assignable. He said he learned from many Senators, that they were in the receipt of large numbers of letters in relation to that measure. He had received many himself, and he was desirous that the subject should be disposed of. As it was discussed and passed at the last session, he apprehended no debate upon it now, and hence he made his motion, believing that it would consume but very little time.

After a brief conversation, the honorable Senator agreed to postpone his motion until to-morrow.

COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. SHIELDS. I wish to ask a favor of the Senate this morning, and that is, that I may be discharged from further service as a member of the Committee on Public Lands. I am chairman of two other committees of the Senate; and as the committee is now constituted, there are three members from three adjoining States. I think, therefore, that it is but just to the Southwest, or some other portion of the country, that they should have a representative.

The question being taken, it was agreed to; and on motion of Mr. SHIELDS, it was Ordered, That the President pro tempore of the Senate fill the vacancy thus occasioned in the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. BORLAND was appointed.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. FISH, agreeably to previous notice, asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill to increase the salary of the district judge of the United States for the southern district of Florida; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

NOTICE OF BILL.

Mr. FELCH gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill for the relief of William A. Richmond.

INDEX TO THE LAWS.

Mr. PEARCE submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That of the synoptical index of the laws prepared and printed pursuant to a resolution of the Senate, there be distributed in the same manner as the copies of Little & Brown's edition of the laws were distributed under the act of 8th August, 1846, (except to the Library of Congress,) six hundred and seventy copies; and to each member of the Senate and House of Representatives who has not already received the same, one copy; and that ten copies be placed in the Library of Congress.

Resolved, That each member of the Senate be furnished with the 9th volume of Little & Brown's edition of the laws, and that the preceding volumes be furnished to those members who have not already received them.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were read a first and second time by their titles:

An act for the relief of the Virginia Woolen Company;

An act for the relief of Edward Everett; and

An act for the relief of David C. Cash and Giles U. Ellis.

Ordered, That they be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The following bills were read a first and second time by their titles:

An act for the relief of John W. Robinson;
An act for the relief of Gardner Herring;
An act for the relief of Albra Trippi;
An act for the relief of Silas Champion, of the State of New York;

An act for the relief of Philip Miller;
An act for the relief of Joseph Johnston;
An act for the relief of Robert Milligan;
An act for the relief of Sylvanus Blodgett;
An act for the relief of Amos Knapp; and
An act for the payment of arrears of pension to the guardian of Artemus Conant.

Ordered, That they be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

FIRE AT THE CAPITOL.

A message was received from the House of Representatives by Mr. FORNEY, their Clerk:

Mr. PRESIDENT: The House of Representatives concur in the amendment of the Senate to the bill making appropriation to meet the expenses incurred in consequence of the late fire at the Capitol.

Mr. BADGER subsequently reported the bill duly enrolled.

PRINTING OF THE SEVENTH CENSUS.

Mr. BRIGHT. I desire to make a motion. I believe it will be necessary to move to suspend the present order of business, for the purpose of taking up the joint resolution to provide for the printing of the returns of the Seventh Census. I move, therefore, to suspend all the previous orders, both special and general, with the view of taking up that resolution.

Mr. DAVIS. Is not the unfinished business of Saturday the order of the day?

The PRESIDENT. It is the first special order; but the Senator from Indiana [Mr. BRIGHT] moves to postpone all the orders of the day, both special and general, to take up this joint resolution.

Mr. DAVIS. I have no particular objection to that. I think that as my friend from Connecticut [Mr. SMITH] has been kept in a state of painful suspense for some time, with all these papers before him, it is but fair that he should have an opportunity of expressing his sentiments. I hope, however, if this measure is taken up this morning, it will be with the understanding that the unfinished business shall follow it.

The PRESIDENT. It will follow as a matter of course, being the unfinished business.

The question was then taken on the motion to postpone the previous orders, and it was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT. This is a joint resolution, and is now before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole. The resolution is as follows:

Be it resolved, &c., That the Joint Committee on Printing be directed to contract with Donelson & Armstrong for printing the Census returns, upon such terms as the committee may deem reasonable.

Mr. SMITH. I desire to submit an amendment to the resolution. It is to strike out all after the enacting words and insert:

It shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior, in conformity with the provisions of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year 1849," approved on the 18th day of May in the said year, to contract for the composition and press-work of ———— copies of the returns of the Seventh Census, as the same are classified and arranged by the said Secretary; and in like manner to contract for so much paper and of such quality as he shall deem proper for the said work; and in like manner to contract for the binding said returns as printed in such style as he may judge expedient: Provided, The parties to each of said contracts shall give such guaranty, and said paper and work shall be subject to such inspection as said Secretary shall require to insure the faithful performance of the same.

Mr. S. Mr. President, I regret that I should have the ill fortune of being a member of the Committee on Printing, the duties of which are perhaps more irksome and unpleasant than those of any other committee in this honorable body. But the Senate having been pleased to assign me to a position as a member of that committee, it has become my duty to turn my attention to the subject that is now before the Senate—a subject of very considerable importance in its practical results, and still more important in reference to the principle or rule of conduct in regard to this subject which is involved in the resolution now before us.

At the outset, Mr. President, of my remarks upon this subject, I desire it may be understood that I have no other purpose in addressing the Senate upon the present occasion than to promote such a disposition of the subject as shall conform to the public interest. I desire also to disclaim entertaining any sentiment of antipathy, either political or personal, for the highly-respectable gentlemen whose names are introduced in this resolution. If I were about to confer a favor upon any one of the proprietors of the various printing establishments in this city, I know of no reason why I should not do that favor as readily and as cheerfully to the gentlemen who are named in that resolution as to any other firm or parties whatever, who are concerned in this department of industry. But, Mr. President, it is proposed in this resolution to dispose of an important work, which involves the expenditure of a very large sum of money, upon the principle of favoritism; a principle to which I utterly object, and which I conceive to be inadmissible on the present occasion. What is the character of the resolution that is now submitted to the consideration of the Senate? It is proposed by my honorable friend from Indiana [Mr. BRIGHT] that the two Houses of Congress shall make a peremptory order on the Committee on Printing, to make a contract with a certain firm in this city denominated Donelson & Armstrong, for the execution of this work, upon such terms as this committee shall judge to be reasonable. We are not, sir, to inquire whether Messrs. Donelson & Armstrong are competent to perform this work. We are not to inquire whether they have the requisite machinery and the requisite material, or the requisite capital to enable them to perform the work in a manner that shall comport with the public interest. We are not to inquire whether they are as competent, or more competent than the proprietors of other printing establishments in the country. We are not to inquire whether they would be willing to do this important work on terms as favorable to the public as those on which other individuals might be willing to do it. But we are to make a contract with them at all events. There is to be no qualification except what is involved in that clause of the resolution which provides that it is to be done "upon such terms as the committee may deem reasonable." Nothing can be further from my thoughts than to cast any imputation upon my honorable friend from Indiana who has submitted this proposition to the consideration of the Senate; and I certainly would not express, as I do not entertain, the slightest want of confidence in the rectitude of my honorable friends who constitute a majority of the Committee on Printing. But, I ask, what is the character of this resolution? It is, that a committee of this body, or rather of the two Houses of Congress, organized, and properly organized I admit, upon political considerations, a majority of which, in the proportion of four to two, sympathize in feeling and opinion, and properly so, with the majority of the two Houses of Congress, shall make a contract, not with any of the citizens of the country who are prepared to do this work on terms most favorable to the public, but with the proprietors of a political organ—a highly-respectable organ I admit—to do this work on such terms as the majority of the committee shall deem to be reasonable. Now, what does that mean, Mr. President? It is proposed that a majority of the two Houses of Congress should confer this work upon the proprietors of this political establishment, as a matter of favoritism, and as a job, to be done, to be sure, "upon such terms as the committee may judge reasonable."

Now, sir, we are not among those who would, for one moment, harbor the thought that the honorable chairman of the Committee on Printing, [Mr. BORLAND], or my other honorable friend, [Mr. HAMLIN], would enter into any stipulation, under this resolution, and make any arrangement with Donelson & Armstrong, or any other individuals on earth, which they believed to be unjust, or inconsistent with the public interest. But the very character of this transaction—the fact that this work is not to be open to the public generally, the fact that the drawing up of this contract, and the settlement of its terms, is to be committed—to whom?—not to the Executive, not to the Secretary of the Interior, not to any officer connected with the executive department of the Government, but is to be put into the hands of a committee, organized, and properly organized, and composed of highly respectable gentlemen, I admit—saying nothing of the minority—who are to make a contract with the proprietors of a political organ in this city, who sympathize with a majority of the committee, on such terms as the committee may deem reasonable. I am not at all surprised that my honorable friend, the chairman of the Committee on Printing, of whose rectitude, and whose fidelity to his duties as a member of this committee, I shall ever speak with the highest respect, has manifested the utmost repugnance to having this duty devolved upon him.

I contend, then, that the very character and essence of this resolution involves the idea that a contract is to be made which is to confer pecuniary advantages upon a particular party; and I do not hesitate to say—I care not what efforts may be made by honorable members constituting a majority of this committee—that it will involve the expenditure of a very large sum of money over and above what should be required for the execution of the work which is now under consideration.

But, Mr. President, there are some objections, which should be urged in detail, to the measure now before the Senate, and to which I wish to invite the particular attention of the members of this body. In the first place, I have to remark that in the present state or condition of this subject, the resolution, in the form in which it is presented to the Senate by my honorable friend from Indiana, is utterly impracticable, or in other words, it is impossible for the Committee on Printing to determine what terms would be “just and reasonable,” or what terms they should require of Donelson & Armstrong, for the reason, that Congress has not yet made any order specifying the number of copies of these returns which they intend to have printed. My friend from Indiana does not propose to settle, by his resolution, what number of copies are to be ordered by the two Houses of Congress; and yet it would seem to me that this is a question to which he should have addressed himself at once when he proposed to print the Census returns. Are we to enter into a contract for the printing of these returns without knowing how many copies are to be ordered by the two Houses of Congress? How can the Committee on Printing determine what terms are just and reasonable unless they know what is to be the number of copies and the magnitude and extent of the work? If my honorable friend from Indiana will reflect on this subject for a single moment, he will see that it is utterly impossible for us to form any opinion in regard to what shall be the terms. And why is it so? Because the cost of composition for one hundred copies, or even one copy, is exactly the same that it would be for ten thousand copies. If you order five hundred copies, you are then to pay per copy a comparatively high price, because the expense of composition is only spread over five hundred copies. But if you order the printing of five thousand copies, the cost of composition is divided among the five thousand copies, and the price becomes comparatively low per copy; and if you print ten thousand, then the expense of composition is distributed over a greater number of copies, and the cost per copy becomes still lower than if five thousand copies are printed. I say again, then, that the first thing to be done, before we make any contract for this printing, is to determine what number of copies we are to print. If my friend from Indiana will refer to the act of Congress which was passed in regard to the Sixth Census, he will find that the law which provided for the printing, fixed also the number of copies to be printed. It provides:

“That when the aforesaid enumeration shall be completed and returned to the office of the Secretary of State, by the marshals of the several States, he shall direct the printers to Congress to print for the use of Congress ten thousand copies of the aforesaid returns received from the marshals.”

Now, then, Mr. President, I object entirely to the passage of that resolution, even in the form in which it has been presented by my friend from Indiana, until the Senate is prepared to decide as to the number of copies of these returns which shall be printed; for there is no possibility of the Committee on Printing deciding what terms would be just and reasonable until they know what number of copies they are to order.

But, Mr. President, what is more than that, the price per copy will not only depend upon the number of copies to be printed, and also on account of the distribution of the cost of composition over the entire number of copies, but there comes in another element which is material to be taken into consideration, and it is, that if it be a large number of copies, the parties who undertake the printing can afford to make a proportionate reduction, not only in consequence of the distribution of the cost of composition over a large number of copies, but they can afford to make deductions in consideration of the magnitude of the work itself—I mean the magnitude of the number of copies ordered. If it be a large job—if there be ten thousand, or fifteen thousand, or twenty thousand copies ordered—the magnitude in reference to the number becomes an important element to be taken into consideration, in order to enable us to decide judiciously and properly what terms are “just and reasonable.” And, sir, besides all this, not only will the committee be involved in inextricable difficulty, unless the number of copies is fixed, but I desire also to inquire how Donelson & Armstrong can themselves decide whether they will accept such terms as the committee may see fit to prescribe or dictate, unless they know what is to be the number of copies printed?

Thus there is another difficulty in the way of the resolution of my friend from Indiana. It would seem to be equally necessary that both the committee and the proposed contractors should know the magnitude or extent of the work to be done; and, Mr. President, what do we know about it? The work is not completed; no report of this work has been submitted to the two Houses of Congress. What the work is to be the Senate does not know, neither is there any human being in the country who does know, or can know at present. We know—or rather we have every reason to believe—that it is to be a work of very great magnitude. From the number of persons employed on the work at the present time, and from the length of time in which they have been engaged, and are still likely to be engaged, we may conclude that it is to be a document of an unusual size. I have understood that in making up the census returns of 1840, there were only seventeen clerks employed in all. That, we know, was a large work; and I believe it was laid before Congress and published as early in the session as this time, in 1841 or 1842. But instead of seventeen clerks employed, I understand that they have now in the Census Office a hundred and sixty-one clerks and messengers. I do not know how many messengers there are, or how many clerks; but I understand the roll of the present employees runs up to a hundred and sixty-one, and I suppose the services of all these clerks are rendered necessary by the great number of interrogatories and the vast amount and variety of statistics brought into the returns of the marshals by the act of Congress on this subject. What is to be the magnitude of this work I have no means of knowing; and how can the committee, without that knowledge, decide what terms would be “just and reasonable?” Sir, if Messrs. Donelson & Armstrong, in consequence of the vast magnitude of the work, have to get a vast deal of new machinery, and presses, and a vast quantity of type, which would be of very little use to them after the work is completed, and upon which, when they come to make a disposition of the machinery and presses and type, and other materials, they must sustain a great loss, then the committee ought to accord one set of terms. If, on the other hand, it is comparatively a small work, coming within the capacity of their present machinery, they could afford to do it on another set of terms. And how can we judge of the ability of Donelson & Armstrong to do the work, unless something is known of what this work is to be?

But again, who ever heard of the two Houses of Congress ordering a document of this importance to be published before it had been communicated to them? I have never heard of such a thing.

Mr. BORLAND. Will the Senator from Connecticut allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SMITH. Certainly.

Mr. BORLAND. Did I understand the Senator to say that the Census Board had a hundred and sixty-one persons employed in the preparation of the returns of the census?

Mr. SMITH. I understand that there are one hundred and sixty-one clerks and messengers employed.

Mr. BORLAND. I asked the question simply for information.

Mr. SMITH. I suppose the employment of these persons is rendered necessary by the extent and complexity of the interrogatories that were propounded by order of the two Houses of Congress? But the Blue Book will tell the story, and my honorable friend can refer to it.

The provisions of the Census act, as I insist, shows conclusively that Congress could not have contemplated the printing of these returns until they had been made out and submitted to the two Houses of Congress. This act provides that “the Secretary of the Interior shall see that all ‘due diligence is employed by the marshals and ‘assistant marshals to make the returns of their ‘respective doings complete at the times herein ‘prescribed. And further: as the returns are so ‘made, to cause the same to be so classified and ‘arranged in the best and most convenient manner ‘for use, and to lay the same before Congress at ‘the next session thereof.”

Why lay them before Congress? Not for the purpose of founding any legislation upon them. Formerly the census returns were laid before Congress to enable Congress to apportion the members of the House of Representatives among the various States of the Union. But that labor has been taken off our hands. These returns were to be made out and laid before Congress, not for the purpose of becoming the foundation of legislation, but solely to enable Congress to make a suitable and proper order in regard to their printing. I can conceive of no reason for communicating the census returns to the two Houses of Congress, except simply that we might have them before us in order to form an opinion in regard to their character and in regard to their value: to see whether they are properly arranged—whether we have reason to believe they are accurate, and then, in reference to the magnitude of the work, to decide how it shall be printed, and what number of copies shall be printed.

But the honorable Senator from Indiana, before these returns came in from the Secretary of the Interior, who was to complete and submit them to the two Houses of Congress, proposes that we should take a leap in the dark; that without knowing anything as to the magnitude of the work, or as to its accuracy; or whether it comes before us in a form in which it ought to be printed; without knowing anything in regard to the number of copies—he proposes what? Ah! a job is wanted for the proprietors of the Union office in this city. Such seem to be the indications of the case, and therefore we are to take time by the forelock, and seize hold of the first page that happens to be completed; or perhaps the committee are to go up to the Census Office, (for my honorable friend does not propose to make an order on the Secretary of the Interior to hand over any portion of these returns,) and, for aught I know, to break into the office, and capture a portion of this document and hand it over to the proprietors of the Union. From all the circumstances of this case, we may be led to infer that that office is pretty hard pushed for supplies. Why cannot the Senator wait till the document comes here? The Secretary of the Interior is not ordered to hand the document over to them; he is only ordered by the law to lay it before Congress. Surely the worthy and highly-respectable gentlemen, who are the proprietors of the Union, are not in a state of starvation. Why, then, should there be such monstrous haste to get hold of some portion of the public Treasury to sustain the organ of the Democratic party, for which, as I have said, I have a very great respect? It is an excellent organ—it supports the principles and doctrines and views of a very patriotic party; though, as I believe, a party which is monstrously mistaken with regard to some very important questions of public policy. Still I admit that it is necessary and proper that they should have an organ; and I am perfectly willing and desirous that it should prosper. I do not know but that I may be persuaded, by and by, to come into this measure myself, and hand over to them the job of printing the Census returns; for I believe I am a very accommodating gentleman. I am disposed to oblige my Democratic friends, and particularly my honorable friend from Indiana, the author of this resolution. I have received a great many favors from him since I have been a member of this body, and if he should put it on the footing of reciprocation of favors, I might go a great way to oblige him, and do something for this Union office, which seems now to be so severely pressed that it cannot wait for this document, but must catch hold of its head or tail, and print it before we know anything about it. I do not know that this will not be done; but I will wait until I see a majority of the two Houses of Congress in favor of this proposition, before I shall be prepared to believe it. Sir, I maintain that it would be in the highest degree indiscreet for Congress to commit itself in the dark to the printing of such an important document as this without knowing what it is to be. We ought to have the document first, and ought to refer it to the appropriate committee to give it a thorough examination. I do not know what they are making up in the Department of the Interior. I have a very great regard for the honorable head of that Department, and great confidence in his rectitude and patriotism; but I may not have the same confidence in all heads of bureaus. It is very possible that these returns may be made up in a way, and may be in a form which would not meet with the approbation of the two Houses of Congress; and what is more than that, they may be erroneous. That is not by any means an unexampled circumstance in the history of the country. In the case of the Census of 1840, after the returns came in, it was discovered that there was probably a very serious error in the taking of the census in an adjoining county to this District—the county of Montgomery, in the State of Maryland—and Congress passed a law authorizing the census of that county to be taken over again. It was taken over again, and an error of several hundred—I do not now recollect how large the number was, but I know that an error of several hundred was discovered on retaking the census of the county of Montgomery, in Maryland.

I maintain, then, that a document of so much importance as this, and so deeply affecting the interest and honor of the country, ought to come into the hands of the two houses of Congress, and undergo a careful examination, before we commit ourselves in regard to printing it; whereas this is a proposition to hand this entire document over to the head of the Census bureau. I do not know how competent he may be. I believe he is a very worthy young man of some twenty-five or thirty years of age. For aught I know he is doing his duty very well; but I am not prepared to say that he shall settle this question of the census printing finally and forever. I am not prepared to say that even the very able and excellent Secretary of the Interior shall do so. We ought to have it before us. We ought to scrutinize it. We ought to see whether it is correct or not; whether it is made out in proper form, and whether it is made out in conformity to the law, before we commit ourselves to this printing. Why this hot haste? Cannot my honorable friend from Indiana wait for six months? For within that period, I venture to say these returns will be completed. Cannot he wait till the close of the present session of Congress? For a bill can be passed at any time for printing these returns. Or, if these returns should not be completed during the present session of Congress, cannot the Senator from Indiana wait till the opening of the next session of Congress? I most strenuously resist this extraordinary manner of doing business. When an important document is to be made out—a document that is to go down to posterity—a document that is to contain facts and statements, to say nothing about population, in regard to our great industrial and agricultural interest, which I trust and hope, and am inclined to believe, will be made out correctly. I insist that it would be in the highest degree rash, not to say presumptuous, for us, without knowing what it is, to commence the printing of some portion of it; and what portion, in the name of Heaven, the beginning, middle, or end, no human being knows.

But, sir, I have another point to make; and that is, that this resolution, if passed, would, in my opinion, be an encroachment on the functions and duties of the Executive, and would, in fact, be a usurpation of Executive power. It is, no doubt, competent for Congress to order the printing to be done, and to fix the number of copies. We may, perhaps, say that certain parties shall execute the work, or that it shall be let to the lowest bidder. Congress may doubtless prescribe the condition and terms; but, having said, for example, that it shall be executed by Donelson & Armstrong, can Congress take upon themselves the making of a contract? And can they, by the agency of one of their committees, draw it up and put it in form? If we can do so, who is to attend to the execution of the contract? Who is to determine whether Donelson & Armstrong have or have not conformed to the terms of the contract? To whom is the work to be delivered? Who is to pay for it? Will my honorable friend tell me whether it is to be paid for out of the contingent fund or not? Is it printing for the Senate? Is it printing for the House of Representatives? Or is it printing to enable us to perform our legislative duties? My honorable friend, for reasons that will be directly apparent, will hardly contend that this is Congressional printing. I ask, then, who is to attend to the execution of the contract, and from what fund is it to be paid? There is no doubt that Congress can provide for such printing as is necessary for the performance of the duties of both Houses, or either House. But is this Congressional printing? My honorable friend said, the other day, that it was not; and therefore we are not obliged to give it to A. Boyd Hamilton. I must acknowledge, Mr. President, that on very mature consideration, I have come to the conclusion that it is not Congressional printing, and not within the contract of A. Boyd Hamilton. It is not printing for either of the two Houses of Congress; it is not printing to enable us to discharge our legislative duties; but it is printing for the Government and for the country. I admit that either of the two Houses of Congress has a right, by a committee or otherwise, to make a contract for such printing as may be essential to enable them to discharge their respective legislative duties. But can Congress, through one of the committees of either House, arrogate to itself the power of making contracts for other printing than such as is required to enable it to discharge its legislative functions? Will my honorable friend from Indiana [Mr. BRIGHT] contend that we should take into our own hands the business of making contracts for the printing that is required for the various departments of this Government? Has Congress the right or power to embark in the business of making contracts generally? If, through the agency of the Committee on Printing, we can make a contract for printing that does not appertain to our legislative duties, I desire to inquire of my honorable friend whether, through the agency of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, we can make a contract for the transportation of the mail? Why not raise a joint committee, on the principle of this resolution, and make a contract for the transportation of the mail? Why not raise a joint committee on Naval Affairs, and make a contract for the construction of a frigate or ship of the line? Why not arrogate to ourselves all the executive duties and powers of this Government? Mr. President, you know very well that the public printer—that is, the printer employed by the two Houses of Congress—is considered an officer of the two Houses. He is an officer of the Senate, and an officer of the House of Representatives. And why? Because he is employed in doing certain work for us that is necessary to enable us to discharge our duties. Now, if we adopt this resolution, will Messrs. Donelson & Armstrong be officers of the two Houses of Congress? Appointed for what? Not to print for the Senate or the House, but to print for the Government and for the people of this country.

My honorable friend from Arkansas, [Mr. BORLAND,] when he was on the floor the other day, objected most strenuously to the devolving of this duty of contracting upon the Committee on Printing, insisting that it should be given to the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives, because, as he truly said, the resolution called upon that committee to discharge executive duties. Ah! executive duties! Then why are we providing for the discharge of executive duties by a joint committee of the two Houses of Congress? We have a Joint Committee on the Library; and as a library is an important establishment to enable us properly to perform our legislative duties, we charge it with the duty of purchasing a library for us. But shall we charge it with the duty of purchasing a library for the Attorney General, for the Secretary of the Treasury, for the Department of the Interior, or for the Post Office Department? I maintain, sir, that this is entirely out of the range of our legislative duties. It is an executive duty, which must be discharged, if properly discharged, by the executive department of the Government, and cannot be discharged by a committee of the two Houses of Congress.

I now come to the last objection which I shall urge to the passage of this resolution. It has been the policy of Congress, for some years past, to open the public printing to competition, and thus prevent its being conferred on the political presses in this city as a matter of favoritism; and the question for the consideration of this honorable body now is, whether the connection which formerly existed shall be renewed. The proposition submitted by my honorable friend from Indiana is precisely this, that we shall confer the printing of the census returns upon one of the political presses in this city. Here I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the first introduction of our policy—and I believe a highly salutary policy—on this subject into the legislation of the country. It will be found in a provision introduced into the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill, which passed the two Houses of Congress, and was approved May 18, 1842; published in the tenth volume of the Acts of Congress, page 189. It is as follows:

"For incidental and contingent expenses of the Department of State, including the publication and distribution of the laws, $25,000: Provided, That the job printing, stationery, and binding of each of the Executive Departments shall, until otherwise directed by law, be furnished by contract, proposals of which shall regularly be advertised in the public prints, and the character and description of printing specified in each advertisement, as far as that can be done, it being made a condition in all cases, unless otherwise specified in the advertisement, that the work shall be done in the city of Washington, and the contract shall in each case be given to the lowest bidder, whose bid shall be accompanied with the proper testimonials of the ability of the bidder to fulfill his contract."

Here, for the first time, was introduced into the legislation of the country the provision that all the departmental printing should be advertised and put out to the lowest bidder, and that remains the law of the land to the present hour. But Congress continued, notwithstanding the passage of that law, to confer the printing for the two Houses of Congress upon the political press in this city; and in this respect I admit that there has been no difference between the two parties. The Twenty-seventh Congress passed the law of 1842, to which I have referred. Then came the Twenty-eighth Congress. The Senate was one way, and the House of Representatives the other. The printing of the Senate was conferred upon the publishers of a political press in this city, entertaining views in accordance with the majority of the Senate; and the House made a disposition of their printing in accordance with their views. This state of things continued until the first session of the Twenty-ninth Congress, when, the two Houses having become convinced that the business of conferring the public printing upon considerations of political favoritism was unsound and injurious to the public, passed the joint resolution of the 3d of August, 1846, requiring the printing of Congress to be let out to the lowest bidder.

My friend from Indiana, [Mr. BRIGHT,] and other gentlemen, who advocate the resolution under consideration, are obliged to take the ground that this printing does not come within the joint resolution of 1846, or in other words, that it is not Congressional printing. Under what, then, does it come? It comes within the provision of the law of 1842. It is departmental printing, which is already provided for. You have nothing to do with it unless to order the number of copies to be printed. You may say how it is to be printed and of what quality the paper shall be. But the very moment that you order the number of copies, fix the style of the work, and the quality of paper, and determine what the work shall be, then comes in the law of 1842 and imposes it upon the Secretary of the Interior to let it out to the lowest bidder. Why, then, does my honorable friend propose to interfere with this law? Why has he introduced this resolution? He says it is not Congressional printing. Why not let the law operate? Ah! but "the Union" office wants a little patronage. Is that a public reason upon which the Senate are to act? Are we about to upset this law of 1842, take this job out of the scope of the operation of that law, and hand it over to whom—and by whom? By a highly-respectable committee I admit, but one organized upon political considerations. We are to turn it over to a political organ. And this is to be done by the Senate of the United States! Pretty elevated legislation it is to be sure. We have our law that departmental printing shall go to the lowest bidder; and this is not Congressional printing says my honorable friend. Besides the document is not here, and we do not know what is done, whether the beginning, middle, or end. I presume we are to capture a part of it. My friend from Arkansas, [Mr. BORLAND,]—for whom I have great respect, and who we know has had some experience in the military service of the country, and very creditable experience too—is to march at the head of the Committee on Printing and invade the Census Bureau, capture something, and hand it over to the proprietors of the Union printing office. I do not know but that it will be done; but I shall wait a good while before I believe it.

But, says my honorable friend from Indiana, the contract system is an utter failure, and it ought to be blown up sky-high. I join issue with my friend on that subject. I will admit that the contract system for the two Houses of Congress has proved, to some extent, a failure; but I utterly deny that the contract system for the departmental printing has failed at all. On the contrary, I can demonstrate that it has succeeded, and has promoted the public interest in a very high degree. I know, Mr. President, that the contract system for the departmental printing is exceedingly distasteful to some portions of the political press in this city. The Democratic and some portions of the Whig press do not like it.

Mr. HALE. How is it with the Free-Soil portion?

Mr. SMITH. I do not know how it is with the Free-Soilers. I cannot say, as I am not in very intimate communication with them. I will leave that to my honorable friend from New Hampshire, who is entirely competent to represent that portion of the publishing interest in this city.

But I defy gentlemen to show an instance where there has been any failure. My honorable friend from Michigan, [Mr. CASS,] who, I am sorry to see, is not in his seat, indicted the contract system for the departmental printing on the ground that the "Blue Book" had not been furnished us. He said that the law required that it should be laid on our tables; he did not say when, exactly, but he was for blowing up the whole concern because we had not the "Blue Book." It is a pretty large concern, [exhibiting a copy,] and is growing rapidly. I have sometimes thought that I would take the "Blue Book" of the present day, and that which was published when I came into Congress, and take the difference between the two in pounds avoirdupois. I think the difference may be calculated in pounds; at all events, I know that it is very large, and it is an indication of what strides our Government is taking in extravagance, not to say in downright corruption. But my friend from Michigan wants to blow up this system of departmental printing by contract because he has not the Blue Book. If it had so turned out that the Blue Book had not been published just when it was ordered to be published, viz: the first Monday in January, taking into view our monstrous labors during the six weeks of the session—you know, Mr. President, what they have been, the manner in which we have devoted ourselves to other subjects, and the profound anxiety under which we have labored for the promotion of the public interest, particularly under the head of settling over again that matter of the compromise—one would suppose that the Senator from Michigan ought not to make such grave complaints, if the delivery of the book had happened to be some two or three days behind the time.

But, sir, I have taken the liberty to inquire into this matter, and I have here a memorandum of the delivery of this most interesting concern called the Blue Book, which is contracted out to the lowest bidder. It is a pretty good book; the paper, the type, the binding, are all good. If I get the census returns printed as well, I shall be content. The law says that it shall be laid on our tables on the first Monday in January; and I believe that was the very day on which the Senator from Michigan made his speech by way of assault on this departmental public printing. Now, I find that one hundred and seventy-five copies were delivered on the 29th of December, one hundred and twenty on the 31st, and two hundred and five on January 3, which was Saturday; and the law said they should be here on our tables on the Monday following. That is the case which was brought forward by my friend from Michigan, to prove that we ought to blow up the system of letting out the departmental printing to the lowest bidder; and my friend from Indiana was obliged to take the ground that the printing of the census returns was departmental printing, to get it out of the hands of A. Boyd Hamilton, the printer of the two Houses of Congress.

I have already stated that the proprietors of the political and of the job presses of this city are very willing to get rid of the contract system, and that they would like to have the public printing given out as a matter of favoritism; but I deny that it has proved a failure. On the contrary, I believe it has saved a very large sum of money to the public Treasury. I have here another document printed under the system for departmental printing. It is a history of the condition and prospects of the Indian tribes, by R. H. Schoolcraft, LL. D., illustrated by S. Eastman, United States Army. A more beautiful specimen of typography, of paper, and of execution I never saw. I am ready to take up this census matter and deal with it liberally and fairly, and I would propose the printing of it in a style of magnificence corresponding substantially with this work. There has been, then, no failure of the contract system in its application to departmental printing. But I admit that there has been some failure in it as it regards the Congressional printing; and I shall explain to the Senate how it is.

But before I go any further I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the amendment which I have offered, and I will explain to the Senate its precise character. It proposes to separate the composition and press work from the supplying of the paper, and both from the binding, and to make a separate and distinct contract for each, and all to be done under the provisions of the law of May 18, 1842. Perhaps by way of amendment to the resolution it would not be strictly necessary for me to propose anything more than a specification of the number of copies, with a provision that the work should be executed under the supervision and direction of the Secretary of the Interior. It would then become departmental printing, and would necessarily be executed under the law of May 18, 1842. But if I were simply to propose an amendment of that character, it would leave the composition and press work to be paid for in connection with the supplying of the paper; for the party to do the composition and press work would supply the paper for the work. But for reasons which I shall indicate directly, I think it is highly important that the composition and press work should be separated from the supplying of the paper, and that both should be separated from the binding. My amendment, therefore, contemplates, on the one hand, the adoption substantially of the principle of the law of May 18, 1842. But some modification of that law is deemed necessary, so that the composition and press work shall be separated from the supply of paper, and moreover, that the party who enters into this contract shall give due security for the performance of the contract, the law of 1842 containing no provision of that character. Having thus explained briefly the character of my amendment; having shown the Senate that this is departmental printing, and having proposed that it shall be brought within the scope of the provisions of the law to which I have alluded, I now proceed to the consideration, as briefly as I can, of the subject of Congressional printing, for the two are necessarily connected to some extent with each other.

I have already insisted, and, I trust, have shown, that there has been no failure of this system under the head of departmental printing; but I have also said that there is a failure, and a very serious failure, in its application to Congressional printing. And why has that been so? The joint resolution directing the printing for the two Houses of Congress to be let out to the lowest bidder, was adopted at the first session of the Twenty-ninth Congress. At the second session of that Congress a contract was made, in conformity with the provisions of that law, with Wendell & Van Benthusen, to execute the largest portion of the work. A small portion of it was assigned to another firm of the name of Tipten & Streeper; but much the largest portion of it—nearly the whole, in fact—was assigned to Wendell & Van Benthusen. I admit that they utterly failed in the performance of their contract. They failed in the typography. According to the stipulations, they were to be paid so much for every thousand ems. The type and the size of the page were specified, but I have understood, and suppose the fact was so, that they got fonts of type cast to spread the letters out, so as to get many more ems than would be had if the type was put in the usual form. That was undoubtedly a violation of the contract. It was also violated in the quality of the paper. There was an utter failure to conform to the terms of the contract in that respect, and there was a more injurious failure, so far as the public business was concerned, in not furnishing the printed matter within such a period of time as was indispensably necessary to render the documents valuable to Congress for the transaction of the public business.

Coming down to the last Congress, we find that the contractors were William M. Belt, who took the second, fourth, and fifth classes; John H. Trenholm, who took the third class; and John T. Towers, who took the first class, which was the printing of bills and resolutions. In regard to Mr. Towers, it ought to be stated that, so far as I know and believe, there was a most perfect performance of the contract on his part. I think the chairman of the Committee on Printing will agree with me in regard to that. But so far as regards Trenholm and Belt, there was a failure not less gross and aggravated than that during the preceding Congress. I do not know that they had type of a peculiar character cast to help out the line and spread the matter over as much surface as possible. I suppose they had not. But, nevertheless, there was an utter failure in the quality of the paper and in the binding, as the chairman of the committee very well knows. Trenholm and Belt were contractors for the binding I believe; and I understand that they farmed it out and made considerable profit upon it, to the amount of several thousand dollars. There was the same failure with regard to the promptitude of the execution of the work, which was necessarily indispensable to the public interest. Every word which the chairman of the committee stated on that subject was true. I shall ever bear testimony to the rectitude and fidelity with which he and the other member of the committee [Mr. HAMLIN] discharged duties, in regard to it, which were very painful.

But I will add something which the chairman forgot to state, and that is, that after the documents had accumulated in our document room, and after he and the Senator from Maine [Mr. HAMLIN] had decided that they would not receive them—and I believe that I concurred with them, too—at my suggestion the other members of the committee saw fit to appoint me a sub-committee to look into the matter; and I believe they gave me instructions not to receive the documents; or rather, I was appointed to receive them if they conformed to the contract. I went into the document room and looked at them. I knew that the contract, if performed according to its spirit and letter, would involve the contractor in an enormous loss. And I confess that I had in my proceedings under that head some reference to the condition of the surety of the contract. I refer to Mr. Ritchie. I felt for him a sentiment of commiseration. I thought he had a ruinous contract. Members wanted the documents; and I took the responsibility of deciding that they should come in. I thought they were worth all that we had agreed to pay for them, although they did not accord with the contract. They were received; but I did not suppose that the two Houses of Congress would entertain the purpose of passing a bill to make up any loss that he would sustain under that contract which was violated so grossly; and least of all did I believe that they would pass a bill, as the House of Representatives did, and as I was afraid the Senate might possibly do, which would give him the enormous fortune, according to the statement of the Senator from Arkansas, of $200,000 under this broken contract. I never had the slightest idea that they would give him a fortune of $100,000; least of all did I believe that it would go up to such a figure as that named by the Senator from Arkansas.

In this way I admit that this method of disposing of the public printing to the lowest bidder under the joint resolution of 1846 has proved a failure. But the system of disposing of the departmental printing—and this is printing of that character—in that way, has not failed. But why has the contract system with regard to the printing of the two Houses of Congress failed? It is partly the fault of the two Houses of Congress, but perhaps much more the fault of the contractors themselves. When the Thirtieth Congress, either by design or neglect, tolerated Wendell & Van Benthuyzen in the violation of their contract—so grossly as they violated it—they laid the axe at the root of the tree; they laid the foundation for the complete subversion of the whole system. What followed? In the case of Trenholm & Belt, they underbid even the prices of Wendell & Van Benthuyzen, who claimed to have sustained under their contract, broken as it was, a loss of about twenty thousand dollars. What did they do? In consequence of the toleration that had been extended, in the violation of their contract, to Wendell & Van Benthuyzen, they did exactly the same thing. Then comes A. Boyd Hamilton. It is no part of my business or duty, or even of my right, as I am situated, to prejudge his case; but I know perfectly well what is to follow. We are not to have the documents in proper season. Those that are laid on our tables may be, perhaps, printed according to the terms of the contract, or very nearly so; but in regard to the long numbers, we have every reason to anticipate the same violation of contract by him, which we have tolerated in Wendell & Van Benthuyzen, and which, in the case of the last Congress, we were about to compensate by an enormous fortune—and would have done so had it not been for my friend from Maryland, [Mr. PEARCE,] who stepped in and performed the very unpleasant task of objecting to it, at the last moment of the last session of Congress. He thus successfully resisted a measure which I can only characterize as a most enormous outrage; though not so intended by honorable Senators here who favored that measure, for I impeach the rectitude of no man. Then it is absolutely necessary that we should have some change in this system. But I desire to say to my honorable friend from Indiana that I am not for giving up the contract system, though we can change it; and we ought to attend to the modification of it immediately. Perhaps I may feel it my duty, at the very next meeting of the Senate, to introduce a resolution on this subject, charging the Committee on Printing with the duty of considering what modification should be made in this system. And I am willing to make the resolution larger—to inquire whether we should not repeal or set it aside entirely: for I wish no limited inquiry on this subject. But I will now indicate what are my ideas in regard to the change that should take place. I do it with the more freedom, because it will serve to illustrate my views in introducing to the consideration of the Senate the amendment which I have offered to this resolution.

I think we should separate the supply of paper from the composition and press work. That is the first step to be taken. Why should not the United States furnish its own paper? What has been the difficulty with the execution of former contracts? And what are to be the difficulties of the present session of Congress? They arise from the manner in which we are cheated in paper; and I do not believe I use too harsh a term in connection with this subject. Let us furnish our own paper. I want to know why we should be cheated in paper? Why is it that adventurers can come into this city—men who are not connected with any establishment here—and underbid all the local printers? It is because the bidding is not merely on the composition and press work. The party takes his pay on the composition and press work. If the orders are for short numbers, composition and press work is to be high; if for long numbers composition and press work will be comparatively low. The bidding being on the press work and composition with a stipulation in regard to the quality of the paper, the parties who really intend to get the contract, and at the same time cheat us out of the due performance of it, come in and bid on composition and press work at a very low rate: whereas, the proprietors of the Union, the proprietors of the Intelligencer, the proprietors of the Republic, and the proprietors of the various job establishments in this city, such as Towers', bid for the composition and press work with the idea of performing the contract. But your adventurer comes here and bids on composition and press work at a low figure—below everybody else—and then calculates to make up the difference by supplying a kind of paper utterly inferior. Thus these adventurers get the means of taking contracts. Now if we separate the supply of paper from the composition and press work, they will have no margin: they will have to bid for the thing itself. As things now are managed they do not bid on the composition and press work alone; but combine it with the idea that they will cheat in the paper. All we have got to do, is to furnish ourselves with the paper. I am perfectly willing to say to the honorable Senator from Indiana, that if he will join with me in separating the supply of paper from the composition and press work, I do not care what he does with the composition and press work. I think that strictly, it ought to be let out to the lowest bidder; but I do not care two straws, if it is distributed around among the various printing establishments of the city; and if you are hard pressed for the want of a little support for a political organ, why I will indulge you with a large slice; and you can take it all for aught I care. The large fortune that has been made by one concern in this city, has been principally realized in the profit on paper. I do not mean to accuse those gentlemen of cheating in the paper; for I have no idea that they did so. And if this plan be carried out, and a contract be made with Donelson & Armstrong to do this great job—they to furnish their own paper—if they do not make a large fortune, I am greatly mistaken. One hundred thousand dollars transferred from the public Treasury to their private coffers, would be the very lowest figure which the amount of profits would probably reach. If they do the work, I am perfectly willing they should have a reasonable profit. I am willing they should have a profit of $5,000 or $10,000; and I would not find much fault if it were to be $20,000; but when you come to this business of handing over to men—I care not who they are, whether they belong to the Union office, the National Intelligencer office, or the Republic office—large fortunes, I object to it in toto. It is of evil example.

Mr. President, no man knows better than yourself, that the idea has got to be somewhat rife in the country, that men can come to Washington, spend one or two winters here, and carry large estates out of the city, obtained, too, from the Government. I have seen men about our public hotels smoking cigars, and enjoying themselves in a variety of ways, who come here and remain during a few sessions of Congress, and return home with large estates, obtained in prosecuting claims before the Departments, before Congress, and before Commissioners here. When any man makes an enormous amount of profit here, on anything, no matter what it is, it brings a horde of people upon us: it is ruinous in every shape and form; and is doing infinite evil and infinite mischief to the country. I am utterly opposed to this system. I have been in the habit of earning what little bread I have eaten by the sweat of my brow; and all of us who are here in the two Houses of Congress, I believe, earn pretty well the pittance we receive in the form of compensation. When I am at home, like other honorable members of this body, I devote myself to the duties of my profession, and endeavor, with other citizens of the country, to earn an honest livelihood. But I am totally opposed to this system of getting estates by filching from the Government—coming here with enormous claims for a quarter or a half million of dollars, and dividing the plunder with influential and able men, who are supposed to have an influence with this Secretary, or that board of Commissioners. I say that is corrupt; it is of evil example; and therefore I resist this scheme. It is not designed, I know, to be a scheme of plunder, but I venture to say it will result in plunder.

How is this contract to be enforced against Donelson & Armstrong? Suppose we enter into stipulations with them, and they do not choose exactly to perform them: suppose they do not furnish as good paper as the contract requires them to furnish: suppose they do not execute the work in the time stipulated—how is the contract to be enforced? Is it to be believed that a political majority of the two Houses of Congress getting up a contract to support a political organ, will enforce that contract to the ruin of the proprietors of that organ? I say they never will do it; and I will not claim that the party with which I act stands on any higher ground in this respect than the Democratic party. I have lived long enough to understand that there is but little difference between parties in regard to men, although there is some difference in regard to questions of public policy. We may have different views with regard to the questions whether we should encourage our own domestic industry; whether we should have a system of harbor and river improvements. And if I am a Whig this day, it is simply because I believe that certain measures of public policy are indispensable to the public welfare; and it is not because I believe the Whig party, in general or in detail, is any more pure or any more honest than the Democratic party. I might illustrate this, and show how the two parties act when they give out jobs of this character to political organs.

I referred a while ago to gentlemen for whom I have the highest respect—the proprietors of the National Intelligencer. More pure, more honest or excellent gentlemen do not live on the face of the earth. But in the Twenty-seventh Congress, having a large Whig majority in the two Houses, we made an order that the public printer should do the printing at the rates of 1819, with twenty per cent. off. We elected Gales & Seaton printers for the House of Representatives, and Thomas Allen printer for the Senate. We went along very well, until the last day of the Congress, (the 3d of March,)—and I would remind Senators that if any mischief is to be done, it is sure to be done on the 3d of March. There was then slipped into the appropriation bill a provision repealing those rates, and paying the public printers the rates of 1819 in full. This is the history of the matter so far as the political party with which I am connected is concerned. I am inclined to think that I am about as impartial on this subject as any other member of this honorable body; and I sometimes think I am the only man entirely competent to do justice to both parties in this matter. [Laughter.]

I would refer to the case of Thomas Ritchie, who violated his contract in the most outrageous manner. He was a printer, and made his contract with his eyes open; and yet the House of Representatives passed a bill last year, giving him the rates of 1819, with fifty per cent. off. The honorable chairman of the Committee on Printing, for whom I have a sincere respect, has told us that that would have put two hundred thousand dollars into Mr. Ritchie's pocket. So that I think the two parties stand exactly even. It is a neck and neck-race between "Eclipse" and "Henry."

In the Twenty-seventh Congress, we Whigs had a majority. We made an order that the public printers should receive the rates of 1819, with twenty per cent. off. When they accepted the office of public printers under these rates, a contract was made thereby; and I have always believed that we had no right to vote that money. Although I was then a member of the House of Representatives, I was not present at the time. I do not know what might have been done if I had happened to be there. But it so happened, that very urgent professional engagements called me to my home some two or three days before the close of the Congress. Possibly I might have voted for it; I might have been persuaded to vote for it. And this is the way in which these things are usually done.

If we make this contract, Donelson and Armstrong will have money, and a good deal of it, out of the Treasury. Mr. Donelson is a gentleman who has occupied very conspicuous positions in our diplomatic relations; and long before I knew him personally, I was taught, by a perusal of his correspondence with the Government, to cherish sentiments of very high respect for him, as a man of talents and a man of high integrity. If you give these gentlemen this contract, I believe that they will manage it in the same manner that other contracts have been managed. They will intend to do the business with integrity and with fidelity. But, suppose there shall be a defalcation in the paper; if you brought them right up to the mark, it might be ruinous to them. I want to know if a political committee, or a political majority in the two Houses of Congress, will enforce the contract against them in such a case? No, they never will do it.

I have said that this is departmental printing. If the amendment shall pass, we separate the paper from the composition and press-work. There is one fact which I must state here. There is a stipulation in our contract for the Congressional printing, requiring that it shall be done on paper weighing fifty pounds to the ream. My worthy friend, the chairman of the Committee on Printing, has obtained information which he will excuse me for mentioning: he has heard of cheating among the manufacturers of paper. In modern times they have discovered a mode of introducing some mineral substance into paper to make it weigh some twenty-five per cent. more than the proper materials would weigh. I have no idea that Donelson and Armstrong would buy such paper. But suppose you stipulate with them as you have stipulated with A. Boyd Hamilton, that the printing shall be done on paper weighing fifty pounds to the ream; I have no idea that gentlemen as respectable and honest as I believe Donelson and Armstrong to be would, knowingly, purchase such inferior paper: suppose, however, that it was their misfortune to have such paper, and they actually print the Census returns upon it; suppose when you get the Census returns you should find the weight of the book to be made up of lead or some material improperly intermixed with the paper,—are you going to exact anything from these gentlemen? Are they to be made to stand up to their contract? Would not the condition of the Union office then come into view? and would it not be said, We must not suffer our organ to be broken up? You never can enforce such a contract made with the proprietors of a political organ, by a political committee, appointed by a political majority in the two Houses of Congress—certainly to subserve the public interest, not to support the organ. I would not suggest such an idea as that, because it would involve an imputation on the motives of honorable Senators, in which I never indulge.

I am in favor, then, of separating the supply of paper from the composition and press-work, in the printing of the two Houses of Congress, for then printers can stand face to face, and bid on the composition and press-work, the prices of which are well known to everybody. The market prices of composition and press-work are just as well known as the price of cotton in Texas. The difficulty heretofore has been that the contractors have had a vast margin under the head of cheating in paper. If that margin is taken away, it is all that is wanted. If that is done I do not care what you do as to composition and press-work. I would be very well satisfied to distribute that work amongst the various printing establishments in the city; and I am not certain that I would not say that I would allow no one to compete for composition and press-work unless he were a resident of the city of Washington, and had his establishment here: for I wish to keep these adventurers out of this matter. I feel a sincere respect and sympathy for the press here, and am willing myself to do something towards sustaining it. I think that, strictly, the composition and press work ought to be given to the lowest bidder, but if you choose to distribute it among the printing offices here, I will not object; or if you choose to elect a printer to do it, still I have no objection. But I do object to this old corrupt system of enabling men by being elected printers to Congress to make large fortunes mainly by defalcations in paper. It is corrupt in its tendency. It is of evil example. It serves to disseminate in the country the idea that a man can, by undue means, make a fortune out of the Government of the United States. Indeed, our Government has made progress, and I am sorry to say it, in corruption, during the past few years, which should awaken and alarm all good citizens of the country.

When I came into Congress the received opinion among members was, that the expenditures of the Government should, in no event, exceed about twenty-one millions of dollars per annum; and I remember very well that the expenditures by General Jackson's and Mr. Van Buren's administrations, of about twenty-one millions of dollars per annum, during what is usually denominated the Harrison campaign, was held up in contrast with the expenditure of the administration under John Quincy Adams, as being perfectly enormous and in the highest degree corrupt. But what now is the state of things? These expenditures have been carried from twenty millions up to about fifty millions of dollars; and it is a painful duty for me to discharge when I say, what I verily believe, that corruption and extravagance in the Government have increased just about in the same proportion as the increase of our expenditures—more than one hundred per cent. It is high time that public attention should be called to this matter.

I have already occupied more of the time of the Senate than I intended to occupy; and I am sensible that I have given my views, such as they are, to the Senate in a very imperfect form; but I intended to have gone into the subject of the enormous expenditures under the head of printing—and here I wish to speak of one evil that flows from giving the public printing out to political favorites by a majority of the two Houses of Congress. The tendency of it is, in my opinion, to enhance the amount of expenditures enormously under one party or another. I say that if a majority of the two Houses of Congress arrogate to themselves the power of giving out the printing upon considerations of political favoritism, it influences, in a very considerable degree, the number of copies that are to be printed. When you embark in the matter of political favoritism, avowedly, or if not avowedly, really; when you make a contract under this feeling, is there not a strong temptation held out to the majority to augment unduly the quantity of matter ordered to be printed? I do not say that any such purpose is entertained here in regard to this printing. I do not say that any honorable member of this body would intentionally do any such thing; but I do say that such is the tendency. I believe that this principle of political favoritism has operated heretofore in the procuring of an undue increase of the amount of printing ordered by the two Houses of Congress. Perhaps honorable Senators and honorable members of the House of Representatives have hardly been aware of the presence of the motive in their own minds; perhaps it would not be so with a majority of the members; a considerable number may be in favor of printing a large number of any particular document without reference to any consideration of that character; yet a few, with a view to favor the public printer, a political favorite, might be induced to think that on the whole they would favor the proposition, although, otherwise, they would be opposed to it.

I have before me some statistics in regard to the Congressional printing, which I obtained from the office of the Register of the Treasury. I will not occupy the time of the Senate by going into any details. I wish to give some statistics, and then conclude this branch of my remarks. The aggregate amount paid for the printing of the two Houses during the Twenty-second Congress, the first Congress under General Jackson's administration, was $142,635 65; for the Twenty-third Congress, $353,429 18, being a great deal more than double the cost of printing for the preceding Congress; for the Twenty-fourth Congress the amount was $154,221 17; for the Twenty-fifth Congress, $218,047 59; for the Twenty-sixth Congress, $190,824 59; for the Twenty-seventh Congress, $293,457 38—that was a Whig Congress, and it seems to have gone pretty deep into the Treasury under the head of printing; for the Twenty-eighth Congress the amount paid for printing was $356,431 65; for the Twenty-ninth Congress, $259,596 75.

That closed the old system of choosing political favorites to be printers to both Houses. Now we come to the new system. For the Thirtieth Congress, the printing cost $182,887 12. I have a statement here of what has been paid out of the Treasury for the printing of the last Congress. It is $125,783 36; but I understand that there is a considerable amount of work yet to be done. Therefore we cannot yet tell what will be the aggregate expenditures for the printing of the Thirty-first Congress. Thus, since General Jackson came into power, the enormous sum of $2,277,364 40 has been expended in printing for the two Houses of Congress. I do not hesitate to say that every penny of this over half a million of dollars was completely thrown away. We have printed almost everything of which the human mind could conceive, until we were converting Congress into one vast book concern, as our honored friend, the former Senator from Missouri, (Mr. Benton) used to express it.

Now, then, I will admit that we are brought to a period when we ought to consider what we are to do in regard to Congressional printing. I have thrown out these views in a manner which I confess is somewhat embarrassed and imperfect, resulting in a great degree from a weakness of my lungs at the present time, laboring, as I do, under a cold. Yet I do think that there is in this subject matter that is entirely worthy of attention, and I want my Northwestern friends particularly to consider it. We ask nothing for our State; we are not petitioners here for the assistance of Congress in any form, for improvements of our harbors and rivers, or for appropriations of public lands in aid of railroads. They are asked and demanded, and required in the Northwestern section of our Union, and I stand ready to accord them, and will do so most cheerfully. But to enable us to do it, I demand, and shall insist, on a proper economy in all the Departments of the Government. Where shall we begin? I think some reformation is necessary, and I think the very first thing we should do is to reform ourselves, reform Congress, reform the extravagant and wild expenditure which we have had here. And how are we to do it? Not by making the public printing a matter of favoritism, but by dispensing it, as I conceive, under the provisions of existing laws, though I should like to have such modifications made as I have suggested in these remarks.

What have we before us, Mr. President? and what are the results at which we have arrived? This is not Congressional printing; it is departmental printing. Then I say the number of copies should be specified; and in regard to that, there is a blank to be filled in my amendment. I wish to say a few words on that subject in this place. In 1839, when Congress passed a law for taking the Sixth Census, they made a provision for printing the returns; and they then ordered ten thousand copies of the returns to be printed. Now, what number of copies shall we order at this time? I have great difficulty as to making any order about it, until I know what is the magnitude of the work. If it is to be a very large work, as I believe it will be, I am for a small number of copies. I doubt exceedingly whether we ought to exceed ten thousand. I know we have more States now than we had in 1840. We have added five additional States since that time; we have a vastly larger extent of territory, and a much larger population. Therefore I will not complain if honorable Senators should propose to print twelve thousand copies. In the Twenty-sixth Congress I believe ten thousand copies of the returns of the Sixth Census were ordered to be printed, and in the Twenty-seventh Congress we ordered a compendium to be made, and twenty thousand copies of it to be printed.

I am opposed to any compendium of this census. Blair & Rives obtained a very large and lucrative job in printing the original returns of the Sixth Census; and I hope it was not the purpose of the Whig Twenty-seventh Congress to give a job in the form of a compendium to the Madisonian newspaper then printed in this city. That compendium cost a large sum, and I believe it never was of the least practical utility. I do not believe it necessary to print a vast number of such a document as this to circulate all over the country. It will be of no use. Congress must have a proper supply—the Congressional Library, the Departments, the State governments, the leading seminaries of learning, and the literary institutions of the country, should be well supplied. As for putting this census into the hands of a vast multitude of people in this country, it is, in my judgment, utterly absurd and ridiculous. It is of very little use, except to Congress, to enable it to make an apportionment of the members of the House of Representatives among the respective States, and to furnish statistics of the population and of the business of the country. But who are the men who are competent to deal with the contents of the census in this regard? Only stationers—very learned men, and there are a very few of them in this country. I am perfectly free to admit that I should myself be utterly incompetent for such an undertaking of this sort, although there may be members of this body who may be competent. I would therefore have no compendium—I would print a limited number of copies of this work. My own belief is, that ten thousand or twelve thousand copies will be an abundant supply for the entire country. You ought to have some copies to send to Europe, to interchange with foreign Governments, and perhaps some to send to some of the leading seminaries of learning in Europe.

After we have supplied Congress, the General Government, the State governments, and the various seminaries of learning, and sent copies to the Foreign Ambassadors, I think we shall have gone quite as far as the public interests require. I am, therefore, for filling up the blank in this amendment, as at present advised, with ten thousand copies; but I will not even object to twenty thousand copies, if honorable members desire that number; but I should be utterly opposed to printing a compendium such as was ordered by the Twenty-seventh Congress, because I believe there is no real practical utility in such a work.

Having demonstrated, as I trust I have, conclusively, that this is departmental printing; having shown that the law of 1842 is now in full force; having shown that that law has worked well, and that all contracts under that law have been performed; having shown that the public treasure has been economized in a very considerable degree by the operation of that law; having shown, as I trust I have, that the public interests in every regard, require that that law should be maintained, and that the law which provides for the printing of the two Houses of Congress should be amended, I ask, upon what principle is it that any one member can rise in his place and demand the passage of the original resolution submitted by my honorable friend from Indiana, and upon what principle can any one object to the amendment which I have proposed, separating the supply of paper from the composition and the press-work and from the binding, and requiring the Secretary of the Interior, with proper securities and under proper supervision, to let out all three matters to the lowest bidder, which I am entirely sure can be done, and will secure this printing more effectually than in any other form which can be proposed?

I was near overlooking one single point. If a majority of the Senate (which I can hardly believe) shall reject my proposed amendment, then I have prepared another amendment, upon which I shall ask my honorable friend from Indiana to reflect, and which I think will meet with his concurrence—that is, to give the composition and press-work to Donelson & Armstrong upon such terms as the committee may think reasonable; but at the same time to require the Secretary of the Interior to contract with the lowest bidder for the paper, and also for the binding of the work. If the proposition I now make shall be rejected, I shall then consider it as settled—so far as a majority of the Senate are concerned—that they are determined to put this work, to some extent at least, in the hands of Donelson & Armstrong, and I shall then feel it to be my duty to make an endeavor to improve the proposition in other modes. In this way, if it shall be the pleasure of the body to patronize the establishment of Donelson & Armstrong, (and I admit that it is a highly respectable one,) it will have a very ample patronage, and a very large and lucrative job to do the composition and press-work. It will be a job which I will venture to say will furnish them with all the supplies which will be required under present emergencies. I have no feeling on the subject. I am simply doing a public duty, and I leave the subject in the hands of the Senate, with the assurance that for one, I intend to acquiesce cheerfully in whatever may be the decision of a majority of this honorable body.

Mr. BRIGHT. I am very anxious that a vote should be taken on the resolution this evening. I have heretofore said more on the subject than I expected to say at the time I introduced the resolution, and yet there is much in the speech of the honorable Senator who has just taken his seat that deserves a reply. Much of it, however, does not meet the question before the Senate. At the time I offered this resolution, my sole object was to secure the performance of a work which I thought would be of great service to the public. I can assure the honorable Senator that I had no such motives in view as he would seem to impute to me. It is true that I named in the resolution which I offered the individuals who were to perform the service. And why? For the reason that, upon inquiry, I ascertained that they were in possession of the materials; that they were so situated that they could go forward with the work immediately, provided they could get a fair price for it. I beg leave to remark, that ever since I have been a member of this body, until this session, I have advocated the contract system, and I only abandoned it when I found that the men we employed abandoned us, and abandoned their contracts. I have come to the conclusion that it is immaterial what kind of contract we make, or how guarded it may be, we cannot get the work laid on our tables in the manner we contract for it. I was even disposed to tolerate that in view of the repeated decisions of the Senate, so long as it applied to work of an ordinary character. But I was unwilling to see this class of service; I was unwilling to see returns so valuable as I considered these returns to be, printed on the kind of paper and in the manner in which our public printing has been hitherto done. Hence I proposed, in the resolution, that the committee should have a discretionary power; not that they should be absolutely compelled to contract with these parties, but that they should contract with them provided they would make a contract for work upon reasonable terms, done in the manner the committee would require.

Under this resolution, the committee will have enlarged powers. They will have a right to say that they will pay so much for paper, so much for composition, and so much for press-work; and I hope that, if the resolution shall pass, the contract for the paper, and the contract for the composition and press-work will be separate. I believe that, in this way, we shall get the work better done. They have the power to say on what kind of paper the work shall be done, and how much they will give for the composition, and how much for the press-work.

The printing provided for in this resolution is not covered by any general law. That, the committee have already decided and reported to this body. This printing is not disposed of; and the question is, What disposition will the Senate make of it? The gentleman says we are in hot haste; that we are too early; that an effort is made by this resolution to reward a partisan press. The honorable Senator certainly forgets that at the last session of Congress he himself proposed in the Committee on Printing to give this very work to the Republic. Hot haste! It was not too early at the last session of Congress to agitate the question.

Mr. SMITH. As the honorable Senator never has attended any of the meetings of the Committee on Printing, I presume he makes the statement that I was in favor of giving the printing of the census returns to the Republic on the authority of others. All I have to say is, that the gentleman is entirely misinformed.

Mr. BRIGHT. If I am not correct I hope the chairman of the Committee on Printing will correct me.

Mr. BORLAND. I presume the statement of the Senator from Indiana was made on information received from me. He is mistaken, however, in supposing that I said the Senator from Connecticut proposed to give this printing to the Republic. I did say that the Senator from Connecticut was in favor of the proposition made by the Superintendent of the Census to leave the printing to him, and have it executed at that time. Whether he would have had it done at the Republic office or elsewhere I do not know. But the Superintendent of the Census did express a wish—and that subject came before the committee—to be permitted to have the printing executed as he might think proper at that time. The committee decided that an arrangement of that sort could not be entered into, because the census bill itself, after providing for the execution of the preliminary printing, required that the report of a plan for publishing the census should be made to Congress at the present session, and that the printing of the census returns should be done as this Congress should direct. Therefore they did not feel authorized to enter into any arrangement, or give their assent to anything of that kind. I then understood the Senator from Connecticut, and I now understand him, to have been in favor of the arrangement proposed by the Superintendent of the Census.

Mr. SMITH. I wish to say a word on this subject. It is very unusual, I believe, to bring into the Senate conversations in the rooms of the committees of this body.

Mr. BRIGHT. I refer for my information to a debate that came up on a collateral question at the last session. I have not the debates before me, but I think that I can turn to them and show that the honorable Senator from Connecticut expressed a preference at that time for giving to the gentleman who has charge of the Census Bureau the privilege of making a contract for this printing. The inference follows as a matter of course that it would have taken the direction which I indicated.

Mr. SMITH. I do not know what the gentleman may find recorded in the debates of the Senate, as having been said by me, but I know that I never entertained any such view as that. I must also say, in very broad terms, that my friend from Arkansas [Mr. BORLAND] is entirely mistaken. I do not know but that I may have used language from which he properly inferred what he seems to have inferred; but I have never entertained any such views, but have been from the beginning totally opposed to breaking up the contract system. And if I felt at liberty to state to the Senate the appeals which have been made to me by some of my own political friends in this city, proprietors of political presses, or at least of one of them, in regard to this very thing, and in furtherance of the views of the honorable Senator from Indiana—

Mr. BRIGHT. I gave way for an explanation. I hope the honorable Senator from Connecticut will not extend his remarks.

Mr. SMITH. I was not going to extend my remarks further; but I wished to say that if I felt at liberty to bring the matters to which I have alluded before the Senate, nobody would have any doubt with regard to the position which I now occupy, and ever have occupied, on this subject.

Mr. CLARKE. If the honorable Senator from Indiana will give way, I will move an adjournment.

Mr. BRIGHT. I desire to conclude what little I have to say on this subject this evening. I think I see a disposition on the part of the Senate to vote on the resolution this evening.

Mr. DAWSON, Mr. CLARKE, and others. You cannot get a vote to-night.

Mr. BADGER. I hope the Senator will give way. It is now late.

Mr. BRIGHT. I yield.

On motion, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, January 12, 1852.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m.

The Journal of Friday last was read and approved.

Mr. CLINGMAN. There is, I understand, upon the Speaker's table a bill which has been returned from the Senate with an important amendment. It is the bill making appropriation for the repair of the Capitol. It ought to be acted upon; and if there be any objection, I shall move a suspension of the rules, with a view of taking it up, and in order that we may act upon the amendment of the Senate.

THE LAWS OF NEW MEXICO.

The SPEAKER. The first business in order is the proposition to reconsider the vote by which the laws of the Territory of New Mexico were ordered to be printed. That being a privileged motion, it must be first disposed of before a motion to suspend the rules can be entertained.

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. I was not, Mr. Speaker, in my place when this debate took place, and when the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. JOHNSON] made his motion to reconsider the order to print the laws of New Mexico; and I hope if he be not prevented by any important matter of principle from so doing, that he will withdraw his opposition. I am desirous that any suspicion, which may be harbored in the mind of any gentleman upon this floor, in reference to the laws of New Mexico—that they contain anything hostile or anything inconsistent with the existence of the most kindly respect towards the Government and people of the United States—may be discharged by the fullest investigation. The gentleman from Arkansas, [Mr. JOHNSON,] and other gentlemen, are, I believe, mistaken in supposing that these laws have ever been printed. Heretofore the laws of the Kearny code, as it is called, were reënacted in such words as these: "And all that portion of the Kearny code and laws of Mexico, not inconsistent with the Constitution of the United States, and the laws passed by this Legislature, are hereby reënacted." That is all that the gentleman can find upon this subject. They never have been printed, to my knowledge; and I hope the gentleman will withdraw his motion to reconsider, and allow the laws to be printed.

[A message in writing was here received from the President of the United States, by the hands of his Private Secretary, MILLARD P. FILLMORE.]

Mr. RICHARDSON. This is the first instance, I believe—certainly the first I have been able to find—when the laws of a Territory have been sent here without being printed. It has been the invariable practice of Congress and of this House, from the foundation of the Government to the present time, to send those laws to the Committee on Territories. I know of no very good reason why they have been sent there. I do not recollect any instance in which they have reported upon them. They have been invariably sent there in printed form; and it may be, if we depart from the custom of Congress on this subject, we may see the necessity arise for such action. I think it is necessary that these laws should be printed and sent to that committee, whose duty it is to examine them, and see what they are. I have no doubt, sir, that while you and myself were members of that committee, at a former Congress, that some members of the committee at all times examined the laws passed by the Territories—though few in number—sent to them. Those Territories are now increased; they are remote and distant from us, and their legislation becomes a matter of deep importance to us in some instances. I do not know, and I do not believe, that there is anything improper in the legislation of New Mexico. I do not know such to be the fact in any of the Territories. It is necessary, however, that these things should be brought before the country. Every gentleman should have the opportunity of examining them, if he is disposed to do so; and it may become important hereafter, in relation to another Territory, to which we have given laws, and to which we are bound to give government. I think it is necessary, then, that this motion to reconsider should not prevail; and that those laws should be printed, that they may come before the committee; and that gentlemen here and elsewhere may have an opportunity of examining them, to ascertain what they are. It is true, sir, that in the Territory from which they come, a large portion of the citizens there have but recently been brought into the United States. We have a guardianship to some extent over them; and if we do not expect to find anything wrong or improper in those laws, still it is necessary that we should examine them.

Mr. CLARK. I wish to inquire if this is not resolution day, and whether the regular order of business is not to call the States in order?

The SPEAKER. It is: but this is a privileged question, and must be first disposed of.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I wish merely to answer the question of the gentleman from New Mexico, [Mr. WEIGHTMAN,] and then submit two or three remarks in regard to this matter. I made the motion to reconsider at the last session of this House. I would withdraw that motion to gratify the gentleman, but I believe that the motive which he has chiefly in view is entirely a mistaken one. I have no idea myself, nor do I believe any one else has, that there is anything wrong in the legislation of that Territory. If I thought so, I would be willing to incur any amount of expense that might be necessary to enable this House to correct any wrong legislation there. So far from my motion having any effect in the shape of a reflection upon the legislation of that Territory, it is rather an exhibition of the confidence of this House in its legislation. For these reasons—with all willingness in the world to gratify that gentleman, [Mr. WEIGHTMAN,]—I shall decline to withdraw the motion to reconsider. But to look at the matter of printing itself, I submit to the House, if they will examine the matter, they will find that these laws, when printed, will form a respectable sized volume. Now, I would be glad if any gentleman will inform me how many copies of it will have to be printed. I presume there will be enough printed for every member of this House, and enough extras for the committees to act upon, and still a surplus beyond what will be so required. I am aware of the fact that the Government of the United States has to pay all the expenses of the government of every Territory, and that in paying those expenses, the printing these laws comes in as a part. But they will have to be printed at home.

If we pay a double expense of having them printed again here, there will be but this limited number printed, which will not be sufficient to answer the purposes of home consumption.

Then the only object there can be in incurring this unnecessary expense in printing is this, that we may have perfectly in our power to run through a long list of laws passed by a Territory, the substance of which we can ascertain, in nine cases out of ten, or in twenty-nine cases out of thirty, just by a casual glance at the titles of the laws. Now, this matter has been referred to the Committee on Territories; and I suggest whether it would not be wise for them to run through those laws by their titles, and report back to the House such, which will not be ten at the outside, as they desire to have printed. The House will grant the request at once.

Then where is the necessity for printing all these laws, of such varied character? Almost every member is familiar with the laws of his own State, and with the varied character of the enactments thereof; hence he must see how perfectly futile, idle, and useless it will be to print all these laws of the Territory of New Mexico, with the view to any practical good? If they were never to be printed elsewhere, I would say print; but they are to be printed at home, and it is not necessary to print them here.

Mr. RICHARDSON. If the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. JOHNSON] will allow me to interrupt him, I will say that the labors of the Committee on Territories are going to be pretty arduous. We have gone far enough to see that. It will take the committee some time to determine what they want printed, if anything. The expense of printing is not very great, and the amount that will be printed will be the usual quantity ordered by the House, for the use of the House. It may become very important, hereafter, that these laws should be printed.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. The gentleman refers to the amount of labor devolving upon the Committee on Territories. How long will it take to turn over fifty, sixty, or a hundred pages of manuscript, when there will never, probably, be more than one title upon a page, and look out those acts which the committee wish printed, and report them to the House, without taking the trouble of any deeper investigation?

[Here a message was received from the Senate by the hand of ASBURY DICKINS, Esq., their Secretary, accompanied by several bills, which had passed that body.]

Mr. JOHNSON, (resuming.) The object of printing these laws, then, is merely, as I have stated, for the purpose of enabling the committee to examine them. The amount of labor which they have to encounter, is, as it seems to me, a matter of moonshine, for the honorable chairman of that committee himself says that it is not probable that they will want many of them printed. It is very probable, he says, that they will want none. I never heard of one that was printed by the order of this House from any cause of necessity growing out of their consideration here. It is not necessary to the power of supervision of this Congress over those laws. It is not necessary that we should adopt or that we should approve them. They stand as the laws of this land, unless they are taken up by the House, considered, and rejected. So that we do not have to approve them by any action, and it is only by positive acts that they ever stand rejected. Under these circumstances, it seems to me that every guarantee that is necessary, is left to us for security without printing them at all, if the committee will merely take the pains to run through them. I will say in conclusion, that so far as I have anything to do with it, I am done with it. I am perfectly willing that these laws shall be printed, if it be the desire of the House; and if I had been satisfied that there was a decided majority in favor of it, I would never have made the motion at all.

Mr. CARTTER. The question made by the chairman of the Committee on Territories is, whether we will order the printing, and thus bring before this body the territorial laws of New Mexico. I understand the objection made by him to be based upon pecuniary considerations, chiefly. It is a sufficient answer to that objection, as it appears to me, that pecuniary considerations amount to nothing, comparatively, when contrasted with our position as a National Legislature to the Territories. It ought not to amount to any consideration. What is our position here? Under the organic law of that Territory we sustain the same relation to it that the President of the United States does to the legislation of this body. It is our duty to examine and approve or disapprove of their legislation. And the proposition is made here to deprive this body of the means of determining its own judgment of approval or disapproval. In the case of New Mexico, I presume that their legislation is squared to the Constitution of the United States—that it is subordinate to the organic law of the Territory.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. Before the gentleman goes any further, I will correct him upon one point. No proposition is made to deprive the House of the power of examination into it—not at all. You cannot define it in that manner.

Mr. CARTTER. I define my own ideas in my own language, and when I wish to use a dictionary, I hope the gentleman will permit me to select my own. The proposition is to cut off the printing of these laws, and to shut them up in the archives of a court; and if it is not one to shut them out from the criticism and personal examination of this House, I do not understand the force of a measure. Now, sir, I do not know but they are all right, and, as I have remarked before, in pursuance of and in subordination to the Constitution of the United States and the organic law of the Territory. Whether right or wrong, is immaterial to my position—I do know that this House is the responsible body to know whether they are right or wrong; and I know that the suppression, or the denial of the privilege of reading them—for it amounts to that—is a denial of the privilege of judgment.

Now, to a single remark of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. RICHARDSON,] that the Territories are multiplying; that they are measuring greater distances from us; that their relations to us are becoming more interesting, and that these relations are becoming more complicated with the machinery of this Government. And precisely as you multiply their number, increase their distance, and augment the complication of their relations, precisely in that ratio rises the responsibility of this body, and the necessity of a thorough examination of what they do, with a view of preserving the organic law of that Territory. I have no doubt of the ability of the gentleman in relation to monetary affairs; but he will agree with me, that this is but a two-and-sixpenny question of printing. I have no doubt that he has examined all these laws and knows they are all right; but he will not ask us to indorse his opinion. I go for light. I go for displaying them before the American people, that they may know what their infant brethren are about—that we may know it—that we may stand guard over these Territories under the Constitution, and under their organic law; and that if there is anything wrong, it may not be permitted to steal into a precedent, to become an authority, without our knowing it. Let us not shift the responsibility upon the committee in this respect, although that committee is an able one and will perform its duty. I go for printing.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The cost of printing this document will be about $100. The expense of our deliberation is about $800 per hour. Upon the score of economy, I just submit the question, whether it is cheapest to have this printed, or to debate it an hour? If I had the chance, I would move the previous question.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I think the true course in this matter would have been to refer the question to the Committee on Territories. That committee could have examined these laws and all the papers accompanying them, and when they make their report back to the House it could be with a recommendation to print the whole document, or such part of it as they thought might be necessary. It is certainly not customary, I think, to print when first a subject is referred to one of the standing committees. I will not consume the time of the House; but I think our true course and best policy would be to reconsider the vote ordering this document to be printed, and refer the question to the Committee on Territories, let them examine the laws, and report back to the House whether it is necessary to print all or any part of them. I ask for the previous question.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I move to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table; which motion was agreed to.

So the motion was laid upon the table.

THE FOUNDATION OF THE ADDITIONS TO THE CAPITOL.

The SPEAKER. The Chair begs leave to state, that at the adjournment on last Monday there was pending a resolution introduced by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. McNAIR,] upon the adoption of which the previous question had been called. Is there a second?

Mr. McMULLIN. Let the resolution be read. The resolution was read by the Clerk, as follows:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the firmness and stability of the foundation of the extension of the Capitol now laid, and whether the strength of the stone be sufficient to uphold the superstructure about to be erected thereon.

The call for the previous question was then seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

The question now being upon the adoption of the resolution, it was put, and there were, upon a division—ayes 107, noes 28.

So the resolution was adopted.

REPAIRS AND RENEWAL OF THE LIBRARY.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I renew the motion to suspend the rules, with the view of taking up the bill from the Senate making appropriation to meet the expenses incurred in consequence of the late fire at the Capitol, which comes back to us with an amendment.

The question being put, the motion was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I think it may be necessary, as the bill provides for an appropriation of money, that I should move to suspend the rule requiring this bill to go to the Committee of the Whole, which I do. I make the motion with a view of having the House pass the bill at once. I understand this appropriation of $10,000 which the Senate recommends for the purchase of books—

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman suspend his remarks until the amendment of the Senate is read?

Mr. CLINGMAN yielded.

The amendment of the Senate was read by the Clerk, as follows:

To add as an additional section, the following, viz:

And be it further enacted, That the sum of $10,000 be and the same is hereby appropriated for the purchase of books for the Library of Congress, to be expended under the direction of the Joint Committee on the Library.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I was about to say that I am informed that, with this sum of $10,000, and the standing appropriation of $5,000, they will be able to get those books we are most in need of. Such books can be procured in the course of two or three weeks in the principal cities. In that time, by passing another bill which has come in from the Senate, and I presume is upon our table, making an appropriation of $1,200 to fit up a couple of rooms by throwing them together, so as to furnish a temporary library room, we can have those books within our reach which we are most in need of. I hope there will be no objection, but that all will concur in that amendment. I have no disposition to speak upon it, but wish that it may pass.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I will inquire of the chairman of the Library Committee on the part of the House, if that committee have examined and approved of this amendment for an appropriation?

Mr. CHANDLER. If I am permitted I will answer the gentleman. We have not examined the amendment, because it was not before the committee at its last meeting. The committee have had a meeting, and have been over with care the list of books. They have selected a large number of daily account amongst the members, but which will cost considerable. The passage of that amendment will facilitate the acquisition of these books, which it will indeed be necessary to procure. They may be procured in a week or ten days. Some less than a week if we had the money.

The question being put, the motion was agreed to.

So the rule requiring this bill to be first considered in Committee of the Whole was suspended.

The question then recurring upon the amendment of the Senate, it was put, and the amendment was concurred in.

HUNGARIAN EXILES.

Mr. STANLY. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to offer a resolution, which I wish to refer to the Committee of the Whole, if objection be made to it.

Mr. FICKLIN. I will inquire what is the regular order of business?

The SPEAKER. The call upon States for resolutions.

Mr. FICKLIN. I call, then, for the orders.

Mr. STANLY. I had the floor before that motion was made, and was recognized by the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has a right to move to suspend the rules.

Mr. FICKLIN. I ask that the resolution be read. I have no disposition to object.

The resolution was read, as follows:

A Joint Resolution requesting the President of the United States to inquire into the condition of certain Hungarian exiles now in New York, and providing means for the relief of their suffering should it be found to exist.

Whereas information has reached Congress, that there is great suffering among the exiles from Hungary now in the city of New York, many of whom are believed to be in danger of dying by starvation and the inclemency of the season: therefore,

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President be authorized and requested to inquire into the truth of said information; and if it appear to be true, that he be authorized to take such steps as he thinks proper to relieve their suffering, until homes can be provided for them, and for that purpose the sum of — thousand dollars is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. STANLY called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. KING, of New York. I desire to ask the gentleman from North Carolina one question.

Mr. STANLY. I will answer no questions from that quarter.

Mr. KING. I will ask the gentleman if he voted for the resolution to receive Kossuth?

Mr. STANLY. These are real exiles, and no humbug.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Is it in order to move an amendment?

The SPEAKER. It is not in order.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I give notice, then— [Cries of "Order!" "Order!"]

The question being put upon the motion to suspend the rules, there were—yeas 46, nays 125; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abercrombie, William Appleton, Barrere Bell, John H. Boyd, Brenton, George H. Brown, Burrows, E. Carrington Cabell, Thompson Campbell, Chandler, Cleveland, Clingman, Conger, Curtis, Disney, Doty, Duncan, Freeman, Goodenow, Harper, Hart, Hebard, Howard, Kuhns, Mann, Humphrey Marshall, Martin, Miner, Henry D. Moore, John Moore, Polk, Robbins, Robinson, Sackett, Stanley, Frederick P. Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Thaddeus Stevens, Stuart, Taylor, Thurston, Tuck, Walbridge, Walsh, and Williams—46.

NAYS—Messrs. Aiken, Charles Allen, Willis Allen, Allison, John Appleton, Ashe, Averett, Thomas H. Bayly, Bartlett, Bingham, Boocock, Briggs, Albert G. Brown, Joseph Cable, Caldwell, Lewis D. Campbell, Carter, Caskey, Chapman, Churchwell, Clark, Cobb, George T. Davis, John G. Davis, Edgerston, Dean, Dimmick, Dunham, Durkee, Eastman, Edgerston, Edmundson, Ewing, Faulkner, Ficklin, Fitch, Florence, Fowler, Thomas J. D. Fuller, Gamble, Gaylord, Gentry, Giddings, Gilmore, Gorman, Grow, Hall, Hamilton, Hammond, Isham G. Harris, Hascall, Haven, Hendricks, Henn, Hibbard, Hillyer, Houston, John W. Howe, Hunter, Ingersoll, Ives, Jackson, Jenkins, Andrew Johnson, James Johnson, John Johnson, Robert W. Johnson, Daniel T. Jones, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Preston King, Kurtz, Letcher, Lockhart, Mace, Edward C. Marshall, Mason, McLanahan, McMullin, McNair, Meade, Millson, Morrison, Murphy, Murray, Nabers, Newton, Olds, Orr, Outlaw, Andrew Parker, Pensler, Penn, Perkins, Phelps, Powell, Price, Rantoul, Richardson, Robie, Ross, Savage, Schoolcraft, Scudder, Scurry, Origen S. Seymour, Skelton, Smith, Snow, Benjamin Stanton, Abraham P. Stevens, Alexander H. Stephens, St. Martin, Stratton, Sweetser, George W. Thompson, Townshend, Wallace, Ward, Washburn, Watkins, Welch, Addison White, Alexander White, and Wilcox—125.

So the motion to suspend the rules was disagreed to.

[At the request of Mr. STANLY, the reporters insert the following article from a New York paper, as the information to which he referred. The rules not having been suspended, he had no opportunity to bring the evidence before the House:

"THE HUNGARIAN EXILES.—We are assured on all hands, that there is exceedingly great suffering among the exiles from Hungary, now in this city; and they present a claim for the sympathy of our fellow-citizens, which should not go unheeded. Every man of them is willing to labor if the opportunity offers; and we know a Magyar noble of high rank, who after struggling for months to prevent starvation and avoid beggary, boasts that he now earns in a hat factory, twenty-seven cents a week more than his board! Yet he is one of the most fortunate among his countrymen—many of whom are suffering incredibly.

"It has been suggested, and we think wisely, now that it is apparent to everybody, that nothing can be done for Hungary, with the funds recently raised here, that the committee get together and call upon the donors, through the press, for permission to use this fund for the benefit of the suffering Hungarians in our midst! This is feasible, practicable, and wise; and this should be done. Not one dollar of the sum raised can be used in Europe; and this is fully demonstrated by the recent usurpation in France. We hope, therefore, that the committee who has charge of this fund, will ask permission of those who contributed it, to use it for the relief of the really suffering Hungarians in the United States, instead of squandering it upon so visionary a project as the creation of a revolution in Hungary. Every member of the committee well knows, that it cannot be used for the benefit of Hungary, except in aid of her suffering children in America; and we therefore entreat of them to strive and appropriate it, with the sanction of the donors, to this praiseworthy object, instead of leaving it to be squandered hereafter, in some reckless and futile attempt to disturb the peace of Europe. Even Kossuth, now that he sees what has occurred in France, with the sanction of the French people, should counsel this proceeding.

But one thing is certain—there is suffering in our very midst by the exiles from Hungary; and it is the duty of those who possess the means, to extend to them the aid they so imperatively require, to prevent death by starvation and the inclemency of the season.]

Mr. WALLACE. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to offer a resolution.

Mr. FICKLIN. I insist upon the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FICKLIN] objects to the introduction of the resolution.

Mr. WALLACE. Then I move a suspension of the rules.

The resolution was then read for information, as follows:

Resolved, That the papers in the invalid pension claim of Hamilton Carroll, of South Carolina, be withdrawn from the files, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. FICKLIN. I withdraw my objection to the resolution.

The question was then taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. STANTON, of Ohio. I call for the regular order of the day.

BOUNTY LANDS.

The SPEAKER announced, as the regular order of business, the resolution submitted by Mr. Aiken, when the States were last called for resolutions, which had been amended so as to read as follows, viz:

"Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the justice and propriety of allowing bounty land to the Washington Light Infantry, Washington Volunteers, German Fusiliers, and Hamburg Volunteers, of South Carolina, who were engaged in the Florida war, and were discharged before the expiration of one month from the commencement of their term of service; and that the accompanying papers be, and are hereby, referred to the said committee; also, all those persons who were engaged in the removal of the Cherokee Indians west of the Mississippi river, from 1835 to 1838; and also, the Vermont Volunteers who were engaged in the battle of Plattsburg."

The pending question when the House passed from its consideration being upon agreeing to the following amendment, submitted by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. FOWLER,] viz:

"And also the soldiers of the revolutionary war who served less than six months, and more than one month."

The question was then taken upon the amendment pending, and it was agreed to.

The question then recurring upon the adoption of the resolution as amended, it was taken and agreed to.

So the resolution as amended was adopted.

REPORT ON THE COAST SURVEY.

Mr. GORMAN. I offer the following report from the Committee on Printing:

The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the subject of the Coast Survey, have directed me to report the following resolution:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the House of Representatives five thousand copies of the Coast Survey report, and one thousand for the use of the Superintendent of the said survey.

Mr. EVANS. I move to amend that resolution, not by increasing the number of copies, but by dividing them equally, so as to make three thousand for the use of the House of Representatives, and three thousand for the Superintendent of the Coast Survey. If I were to make my motion, the House of Representatives should have one thousand, and the Coast Survey the other five thousand. I apprehend it will be a much better disposition than that proposed by the honorable chairman of this committee. A very injudicious use is commonly made, by the members of this House, of documents of this kind. In the first place, many are distributed where there is little demand for them, and a great many go into the interior of the country, where they excite but very little interest, and certainly where they are of very little use. Now, the officers of the Coast Survey, upon the contrary, know precisely where they can be used for the best interests of the country. Having no possible object or motive to distribute them in an improper quarter, it is just and right that the larger quantity should go to that office. I think, however, that the committee should have reported in favor of a larger quantity of this document. It contains a larger quantity of valuable matter than it has contained in former years; and that matter of a different character and description. At the last session of Congress the special Committee on Printing reported in favor of printing six thousand extra copies of this document; three thousand, perhaps four thousand, of which were to go to the Coast Survey. That report was so amended by this House as to increase the quantity to ten thousand. The Coast Survey report of this session contains a great variety of valuable matter, not contained in the report of last year. There are a large number of geographical positions contained in this report. Of these, I think, there are about three thousand positions, and a large number of points upon the coast of the United States; the latitude and longitude of which are important to be known to navigators. It is equally important that these positions should be communicated to merchants and sea-faring men, and all who are engaged in the commercial transactions of this or any foreign country. On this account, therefore, I had hoped that the Committee on Printing would increase the number of copies to more than six thousand. I protest against the distribution made by this House of five thousand to the House, and one thousand to the Coast Survey. I ask the House to content itself with three thousand copies, and let the other three thousand go to the Coast Survey. There will be no inpropriety in this course. If we get three thousand, it will be a sufficient number for distribution to all of our constituents who are interested in the report. The Superintendent of the Coast Survey, and all of the officers engaged in the survey, will make a much better distribution of the three thousand copies that will be allowed them, than we can possibly make. I move an amendment, then, that three thousand be printed for the use of the House of Representatives, and three thousand for the Coast Survey.

Mr. FULLER, of Maine. Is it in order to move an amendment to the amendment?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. FULLER. I move to make the number ten thousand.

Mr. EVANS. I accept the amendment.

Mr. FULLER. The expense of this Coast Survey to the Government was over $300,000. This report, as I understand it, is the legitimate fruit of that expenditure.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I rise to a question of order. This debate is out of order, and I call the attention of the Speaker to the 26th rule of the House, and also to the 21st joint rule. The 26th rule provides that the whole of this day shall be appropriated to the reception of resolutions. The 21st rule provides "that it shall be in order for the Committee on Printing to report at any time." Now, I regard it as a violation of the rules entirely to occupy this day in discussing reports of that committee. The report will lie over, and certainly it is not in order to occupy the day appointed to resolutions in the discussion of reports.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not recollect what the practice of the House has been upon this subject. The joint rule of the two Houses provides "that the Committee on Printing may report at any time." It makes no provision in regard to the discussion or disposition of the report which they may make. The rules of this House appropriate this day to the calling of States for resolutions. The Chair was under the impression that the joint rule would be controlling, and that the authority to report carried with it the authority to dispose. The Chair thinks that is the proper construction of the rule, and that it is in order to dispose of the report thus made.

Mr. GIDDINGS. For the purpose of testing the sense of the House, I take an appeal.

The question was then taken, and the decision of the Chair was sustained.

Mr. FULLER said: I deem this document of vast importance to the whole country, indeed, of more real value than perhaps two thirds of the documents annually ordered to be printed by Congress. Three hundred and twenty thousand dollars was appropriated the past year to defray the expense of the Coast Survey. This work now proposed to be printed, is the legitimate fruit of that expenditure; and not to occupy too much of the time of the House, the following points will show the importance of publishing a larger number of copies of the annual report of the Superintendent of the Coast Survey than has heretofore been done:

1. It will give two thirds the work of the season, and most of the work of former seasons.

2. Sixty-five sketches will accompany it, forty of which will be charts for the navigator, eighteen sketches will relate to the western coast, and thirteen sketches will show sites for light-houses, &c.

3. It will give a list of 3,240 geographical positions, the first ever published, and bringing the work down to July, 1851. This list will not be published again for several years. Hence the necessity of a large supply for the Coast Survey office.

4. It will present the methods of copying plates by the galvanic battery, pursued in the Coast Survey office, showing the numerous improvements that have been introduced. Plates can by this process be made in eight to ten days, which take years to engrave.

5. There will be a large amount of geographical information embodied in this report.

Another, and additional reason, which gives increased importance to this report is, that by act of Congress approved March 3d, 1851, it is made the duty of the officers in charge of the coast survey, to examine and report upon light-houses, beacons, buoys, piers, &c., &c.—information which has been greatly desired—and this report contains valuable information upon that branch of the service. If no more than five thousand copies be printed, the share which would be assignable to me, will not supply the academies and public libraries in my district with a copy.

It interests alike the Atlantic coast, the Pacific coast, and the great lakes of the North and the Northwest.

Every man can refer to the coast survey with just pride, as a standard and scientific work, alike creditable to our own Government and the age in which we live.

As it is a work in which the navigating and commercial interests of my district and State have a deep interest, I hope the amendment will prevail.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. I think there is nothing of a domestic character in which this Government is engaged, or which this Government ever does, that is more important to some of the greatest interests of the country, than this very work known as the Coast Survey. The present report, combining the results, and the very important results of the operations of many years, is perhaps more important than any report ever before published, and contains more useful information of a practical kind. Under these circumstances, it struck me with some little astonishment that the Committee on Printing should not be willing to give the usual number of extra copies.

It has been stated that the engravings or sketches contained in this report are sixty-five in number. Now, it ought to be known to the House that all the engraving has been done by the Coast Survey itself, and that there will be no expense for engraving consequent on the printing of this extra number. They have done it by the galvanic process, as is known to every gentleman here who has taken the trouble to inquire into the matter. That expense, therefore, will not be attached to this printing. The expense of these additional copies will merely be for the paper and press-work—a very inconsiderable amount. When we consider the mass of printing, of a very different character to this, that is performed at the public expense, I do not see any good reason for reducing the number of extra copies usually ordered.

I am informed by the Superintendent of the Coast Survey, that these reports have been so much in demand, that parties endeavoring to make up a complete set, have offered very considerable sums for a single report, and in some instances been unable to obtain it. This fact is sufficiently indicative of the value of the work, and of the great demand for it by a certain class of the people of the United States.

I hope that the amendment just offered by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FULLER] will prevail, and that the House will not, at this time—a more important occasion than has ever before occurred in the progress of this work—reduce the usual number of copies.

Mr. VENABLE. I simply rise to add my testimony to that of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. STANTON,] who has just taken his seat, as to the great importance of this work, and of diffusing it widely through the country. I should be ungrateful to the Coast Survey, and to the gentlemen conducting it, if I did not recognize and acknowledge the vast importance it has been to the coast of North Carolina, not only as regards the safety of our navigation, but also with reference to the reduction of the insurance on the cargoes of vessels, and on the vessels themselves, and the convenience of all who are engaged in the commerce of our coast; all of which has been secured by the faithful, able, and diligent work of the Coast Survey.

I know of no document which will be published during the whole session, which has a higher claim to be generally diffused and circulated throughout the United States, than this.

I hear gentlemen say that they represent inland constituencies; that the ocean touches no part of their districts; and that they have, therefore, no use for this work. I should be much indebted to those gentlemen if they would give their copies of it to me. I found no document which I received during the last Congress, so desirable, so much coveted, or so frequently sought after as this, and I trust that if we amend the resolution at all, it will be to increase the number. I shall vote with great pleasure for the highest number proposed, because it will diffuse throughout the whole country an amount of information which can be obtained nowhere else, and which is of great value.

The reason why this work is so valuable is, that it is based upon certainty. The coast surveys heretofore have been mere nautical surveys and nautical charts, but here we have geodetic surveys. The topographical surveys are made with reference to the actual shape of the earth; the hydrographic surveys presume the earth to be a plane, and being based upon that presumption, although the chart may be accurate with regard to a single port, it must mislead you when that chart is compared with the chart of another port. In the present surveys, the hydrographic are taken by the Navy, and the topographical by the Engineer Corps of the Army. These surveys having reference to the shape of the earth—to use a phrase of surveyors—the plats will meet, and if all the surveys are laid together, you will find that they represent precisely the spheroidal shape of the earth.

This work has been prepared by gentlemen well qualified by scientific attainments to give us valuable information. We have a sea-coast extending from the mouth of the Rio Grande to Maine; a coast, too, upon our lakes; and it is of the first importance to our navigation and commerce, that the whole of it should be fully understood, with that certainty which can only be attained by surveys. I hope, therefore, that this information will be diffused throughout the whole country.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. EVANS]—as well as some of the other gentlemen who have addressed the House upon this subject—is, I think, mistaken as to the action of the House heretofore. I understand the gentleman from Maryland to say that at one or other of the sessions of the last Congress, there were some three or four thousand copies given to the office of the Coast Survey. Now, at the first session of the last Congress the Committee on Printing reported to the House, that four thousand five hundred extra copies should be printed, and that five hundred of them should be given to the office of the Coast Survey; and the House agreed to that report.

Mr. EVANS. The gentleman misunderstood me. I did not say that the Coast Survey had four thousand copies, but that the committee reported in favor of four thousand copies, and that the House increased it to six thousand copies.

Mr. HOUSTON. I understood the gentleman to say that they increased the number to six thousand to be divided equally between the House and the Coast Survey office.

Mr. EVANS. Oh no, I did not say that.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am not speaking of the gentleman's proposition, but of his argument.

Mr. EVANS. The gentleman misunderstood me. I said that the House increased the number to six thousand. I am in favor of ten thousand now.

Mr. HOUSTON. At the first session of the last Congress, the House did not increase the number reported by the committee, but adopted the report of the committee, ordering the printing of four thousand five hundred extra copies—five hundred of which were given to the office of the Coast Survey. At the second session of the 31st Congress, I find by the Journal that the committee reported that six thousand extra copies of the report of the Superintendent of the Coast Survey be printed—five thousand for the use of the House and one thousand for the Coast Survey office. So that instead of the Committee on Printing having now departed from the usages of the House, they are in fact conforming to those usages more strictly than we should be if we agreed to this amendment.

In deciding on these propositions to print, we are not only called upon to consider the direct and immediate expense of the particular item of printing; they involve considerations of a much higher character.

Mr. FULLER, (interrupting.) Can the gentleman state what will be the expense of this extra printing?

Mr. HOUSTON. I do not know what the expense would be, and I am not going to argue upon that subject. I intended to present this view to the House: that on a proposition of this sort, we have only to refer to the legislation of Congress heretofore to see how all these things grow and increase. The expense at this or the preceding Congress may be too small and trifling to occupy our time for consideration or investigation, yet these things grow and enlarge until after a while they become so large as to be serious items—as in the case of the orders to print the Patent Office reports. As a proof of this, gentlemen have only to look at the contingent fund of this House for printing, which has increased within the last few years from fifty thousand or seventy-five thousand dollars, to nearly three hundred thousand dollars. Why is this? How has it been brought about? It is because these various small items are presented to us, which we readily adopt, and then they go on enlarging session after session, until finally they become serious items of expenditure.

There is another consideration involved in this proposition. Gentlemen tell us that these members who represent interior districts and whose constituencies are not, therefore, so deeply interested in these documents, can hand them over to those who represent constituencies on the seaboard. It is very true that they could do so. But is that the object of our legislation? Are we to make appropriations for the printing of large numbers of documents which do not—according to the confession and admission of the gentlemen themselves—interest all parts of the country? If it is true that all parts of the country are not interested in this document, then the number reported by the committee is large enough.

I am informed that the Senate have ordered ten thousand extra copies of this report of the Coast Survey to be printed, and, if I am not mistaken, five thousand copies go to the Coast Survey office; and yet it is proposed here to give several thousand copies more to that office. How many copies of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury do you give to that officer to distribute? How many copies of their reports do you give to the officers of the other bureaus and departments of the Government for distribution? None at all. Not a copy. But this is to be an exception to the general rule; and, singularly enough, that exception is attempted to be applied to a document which is admitted by the friends of the proposition to print a large number, to be uninteresting to a large portion of the people of this country.

My object in rising was more particularly to bring before the House the facts to which I have referred as having occurred in the last Congress, and you will find the same in previous Congresses. I do not intend to investigate or discuss here the merits or demerits of this Coast Survey. I am willing to acknowledge its merits; but while I do that, I do not feel called upon to go further than the committee have gone in the printing of extra copies of the report.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I think that all the copies of this report that are ordered to be printed—and I am not now going to discuss the propriety of the number—ought to be left with the Coast Survey for distribution to those persons who may want them. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. VENABLE] says that this document is very much sought after in his district. He represents an interior district, I believe, and so do I, and I can say that the document is never sought after from me, in my district, although I do not doubt that it is much desired in some of the districts of the country—those along the coast. It is but a waste of money to give me a number of these documents to distribute. I know not to whom to send them. Persons wanting them do not write to me for them. Now, if they are all left in the Coast Survey office, they can distribute them in the best manner. I, therefore, heartily concur in the suggestion of the gentleman from Maryland, that at least half of whatever number we order should go to the Coast Survey, and if it was in order I should move that the whole of them should go to that office.

Mr. HAMMOND. It is not my purpose to oppose either the resolution offered by the chairman of the Committee on Public Printing, or the amendment. But I do desire to know what it is I am about to do, and I desire the House to know what it is they are about to do. Now, I wish to know from the gentlemen who compose the Committee on Public Printing, whether they intend that all the plates and charts that accompany this report of the Superintendent of the Coast Survey shall be printed? This is a question which will come up appropriately on the report of the Committee on Engraving. It may seem extraordinary that there should be any doubt whether the charts which accompany this report are to be printed with it, but it will not seem so extraordinary when gentlemen are reminded that they refused, the other day, to publish the maps from the Commissioner of the Land Office showing the public lands that have been surveyed, and the character of those lands—whether swamp or mineral, or of what character—maps which are certainly as important as these charts. These charts are no more interesting to our constituents upon the sea-board than were these maps which the House refused to publish the other day to our Western settlers and to all who are migrating to the West.

But it has been said by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. STANTON], that this engraving has already been done, and that no additional expense will be incurred except that which pertains to the press-work and paper. It is very true that these charts have been engraved upon copper, but to publish the large number of extra copies which will be ordered, in time to be of any use to the House during the present session, the impressions will have to be transferred from the copper to stone, and the expense of that transfer will be added to the expense of the printing and paper, which by itself will be a material item in so large a number of copies as five or ten thousand. Yet I suppose it would be as extraordinary to imagine that any person could understand this report without the charts as it would be to expect that a child could learn geography without an atlas. The House need not be surprised, if they pass this resolution intending the charts to be published, if six or seven thousand extra copies should cost at least upwards of $2,000.

Mr. MEADE. It seems to me that to carry out the policy that governed us in ordering this printing, some steps should be taken to secure its fruits. I agree with the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS], that the distribution of these works among the members of Congress is of very little use, and does not answer the purposes for which they should be published, and that is to improve the commerce and facilitate the trade of the country. If we intend to appropriate to ourselves any benefit that may be derived from the work of these officers, we should distribute their reports among the owners of vessels. Let every vessel of so many tons burden, for instance, be furnished with a copy, to belong to the vessel as an appendage to it. In that way we may realize the fruits of this labor, but not by distributing four or five thousand copies among the members of Congress, most of whom live in interior districts, where the work cannot be appreciated and will be of no service. I thoroughly agree with the gentleman from Georgia, that it will be a work of supererogation; and so far as I am concerned, though I represent a district that has some connection with the sea-coast, I should be perfectly satisfied to have only half a dozen copies or so to supply some few individuals, while the residue of the copies should be deposited in the Coast Survey office for distribution.

But the only question with me is whether it is competent for Congress to expend money for this purpose; and while the gentleman from Georgia was addressing the House upon this subject, it occurred to me that if we did not think proper to order this work to be distributed among the navigators of the United States, we might, at least, place it in such a condition as to enable them to obtain it by adopting the policy which is usually pursued by the State governments in reference to the publication of the decisions of their courts of appeal. In my own State, so many copies of those decisions are ordered to be printed at the public expense, and then a sufficient number is also printed to supply the practising attorneys throughout the Commonwealth, and others who may want them, at the cost of the work.

I am not particular in relation to the manner in which this thing shall be done, or whether it shall be done entirely, or only in part at the expense of the Government; but as the publication is to be made, as the printing is to be done, as the copies are to be furnished, and as they must ultimately be paid for out of the Treasury of the United States, let us adopt that mode by which the country can reap the most benefit—that is by causing the distribution of the work among those who are engaged in navigation. Let the work be distributed along the coast where it may be useful. It can be of no service to gentlemen residing in the interior of the country, except to some few literary men who would make this study a matter of amusement. Generally speaking, it would be of very little service to any other class of our citizens but commercial men and navigators.

Now, inasmuch as to secure the object at which I have hinted, it would be necessary to draft this resolution more particularly with reference to that object, I should prefer that the subject should be passed over for to-day, so as to afford members an opportunity of preparing amendments, which would secure the object which we all have in view—to make such a distribution of this work as will enable those most interested in it to derive most profit from it. I suggest to the friends of the measure, the propriety of passing it over for the present.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. I should regret exceedingly to see this resolution disposed of in the manner proposed by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. MEADE], or in any other way which would produce the slightest delay. The eminent gentlemen who are at the head of the Coast Survey, are very anxious that the resolution should be adopted. They have appealed to me to urge its passage, that the work may be in a state of progress as soon as possible; and surely if we intend to give to the country the benefit of so important a report, we should do it immediately.

As a member of the Printing Committee, I have had an opportunity of learning the wishes of the gentlemen having charge of the Coast Survey, in regard to the printing of these extra numbers of the report. They ask for ten thousand copies. In view of the interesting and valuable character of the work, I do not think this number too many. It differs materially from the report of last year, because it contains highly important and valuable information not contained in other reports. It brings the work down to July, 1851, and embodies a variety of geographical and other valuable facts connected with the work, and interesting and important to the country, never before published. By the aid of the gentlemen having charge of the Survey, I am enabled to afford some idea of what the report will contain:

"It will give two thirds of the work as it has progressed the present season, and nearly all of former seasons.
"It will contain sixty-five sketches, forty of which will be charts, valuable for purposes of navigation; eighteen will relate to the western coast, and thirteen will show suitable positions for light houses, &c.

"It will give a list of three thousand two hundred and forty geographical positions, the first ever published. This list will not again be published for many years.

"It will embody a large amount of geographical information.

"In addition to the foregoing, it will present the mode adopted by the Coast Survey of copying plates by the galvanic battery, and exhibit the numerous improvements which have been introduced into this process. In eight or ten days, plates may be made by this mode which would take years to engrave."

These constitute many of the important features of the report, and when properly appreciated, as I trust they are by the House, will be sufficient to justify the publication of the number of copies asked for.

"The gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. HAMMOND,] is disturbed by apprehensions that some enormous expense for plates is to be incurred, over and above the press-work and paper. I can relieve him from all fears in relation to that part of the subject. If I understand correctly, the distinguished scientific gentlemen at the head of the Survey, have devised a plan by which plates may be made, through the instrumentality of the galvanic battery, much more easily than was ever known before. In eight or ten days may be accomplished by this process, what hitherto has been the work of years. These plates are all made. They are to be transferred to stone by the gentlemen of the Coast Survey, and nothing then will remain to be done but to take the impressions. The preparation of the plates is therefore a work already accomplished by the Government officers, and need not cost an additional cent to what has already been expended. Impressions can be taken from the stone at the inconsiderable cost of less than one and a half cents per sheet, indeed at the rate of fifty for sixty-five cents. So my honorable friend from Maryland will perceive that all his apprehensions in regard to the enormous expense referred to, are without foundation.

But why is the larger number of ten thousand copies of this report objected to with so much vehemence? Are they more than the country requires or can find use for? We are told that the operations of the Coast Survey for the last year cost the Government about $300,000. Is this a useless expenditure? No gentleman will hazard his reputation for intelligence, by declaring it to be so. If it is important to expend so large a sum of money to obtain hydrographical and topographical information of the condition of our immense line of coast, then surely it is important that that information should be given to the public. Do gentlemen desire that the labors of the Coast Survey shall be known only to those who make them? The whole world is interested in the results of this immense scientific undertaking. It is one, hitherto unequalled by any similar enterprise in the history of nations; and having achieved so much at such immense expense, I am not willing that its benefits should be lost to the world on account of the expense to be incurred by publishing them.

The honorable gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. HOUSTON,] who is at the head of the Finance Committee of the House, opposes the amendment increasing the number of copies to be printed, for a reason which I deem of but very little force indeed. He takes the position, that the expense of printing this report ought not to be incurred, because the aggregate of expense for printing each year has been gradually growing larger. Does not the gentleman know, that with the increase of territory has come an increase of population, and as our population has increased, so, also, has increased the intelligence of the country? Is it, then, wonderful that with the growth of population and intelligence of the country, our printing expenses should grow upon us? Every day's progress makes necessary additional expense in this particular. The advancing character of the very work upon the Coast Survey creates the necessity for increased expenditure in the publication of its report. The last report was but a small pamphlet; the report this year will embrace four hundred pages, and will be a good sized book well bound. And why has the report grown to such a size? Why, sir, the work has been advancing with great rapidity and success, and the material for the report has accumulated in due proportion. As a member of the Printing Committee, I opposed the number named in the report of the chairman, because I considered it too small. I advocated in committee, and am now in favor of printing the number contemplated by the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. EVANS.] It is idle to say, that the information to be derived from the report is only interesting to citizens upon the sea-coast. This is a great mistake. In the distribution of those printed by the House last year, about thirty fell to my share. They were sent to my residence after the adjournment; and even there in the distant West I found gentlemen—men of intelligence and science, eager to get possession of them. I had no difficulty in distributing them. Should the ten thousand copies be published, it will afford to each member not more than forty copies each; and there is no district in the Union where that number may not be usefully sent. Besides the demand which exists in our country with men of science and others interested in the progress of the Coast Survey, I understand many applications have been made to the Superintendent from scientific men in other countries, for copies of this work. It is not surprising that a work of so much importance should attract the attention and elicit the interest of distinguished men abroad; and we should be proud that it is so. But it is a matter of regret, that on account of our niggard policy in this matter of printing, the distinguished head of the Coast Survey has heretofore been unable to supply the demands made upon him for copies of his report, from other countries. I trust now, sir, we shall place it in his power to furnish all that may be asked for. The Senate has considered the work of importance enough to justify the printing of ten thousand extra numbers, and I hope the House will order an equal number.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio. I rise for the purpose of moving the previous question. Before doing so, however, I desire simply to say, that there is a great defect in the distribution of all these public documents. I represent an agricultural district, and I do not care to have a single copy of the Coast Survey to distribute in my district, and have no demand for them. It is true, if I were to take a large number of bound volumes of reports of any description into my district, and announce publicly that they were there, I should have a great number of gentlemen calling upon me for them. But the great demand in that district is for the agricultural branch of the Patent Office report. While, therefore, I am ready and willing to vote for any reasonable number of copies of the Coast Survey, I should prefer that the whole number ordered should be given to the officers connected with that bureau for distribution, believing that the distribution would be more judicious by those officers than it could possibly be done by the members of this House. There are members here representing districts intimately connected with the subjects treated of in this report, and who will need a good many copies for distribution; but of course they can get them by calling upon the officer to whom they shall be given. I would, therefore, prefer that this resolution should be put in such a shape as to leave the distribution of these reports entirely to the officers connected with the Coast Survey.

Mr. FULLER, of Maine. Has the gentleman no academies and public libraries in his district?

Mr. CAMPBELL. The gentleman inquires if we have no schools and public libraries in my district? We have. And I took occasion during the last Congress to exhibit the number of schools and academies in that district; but if I wish any document of this kind to send to any academy, college, or public library, I have always found the officers of the Coast Survey ready and willing to supply me with anything under their control. If, therefore, it is the wish of the House to print this document, and distribute it among the members, I shall propose to some gentleman—for instance, to a gentleman representing some portion of the city of New York whose constituents do not care about knowing the best method of raising wheat, or what kind of soil is best adapted to the culture of corn—I say, I shall propose to him to exchange my portion of the report on the Coast Survey for copies of the agricultural part of the Patent Office report, which will be of use to my constituents.

Mr. MILLSON. As the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CAMPBELL] has indicated his intention to move the previous question, I desire to say that I am in favor of the suggestion of that gentleman proposing that all the copies of this document shall be given to the Coast Survey. I wish to inquire whether the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] did not move that as an amendment?

Mr. STEPHENS. I did not. There was already an amendment to the amendment pending, and it was not in order.

Mr. MILLSON. I did not so understand it. I understood that the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. EVANS] accepted the amendment of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. FULLER,] and therefore it would have been in order to move an amendment to the amendment. I would suggest to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. CAMPBELL,] that before he calls the previous question, he should move an amendment to the amendment giving all the copies which the resolution provides for printing to the coast survey, for distribution.

Mr. CAMPBELL. That is my purpose. Then if gentlemen desire any copies for distribution among their constituents, by calling upon those officers and leaving the names of the persons they wish to send them to, they will be sent. For myself, I do not want a solitary copy, unless institutions of learning in my district desire them; in which case I can obtain them as I have indicated. If it is in order, therefore, I now move an amendment to the amendment so as to provide that all the copies of that document which the resolution provides for printing shall go to the Coast Survey for distribution. I make that motion, and upon it I call the previous question.

Mr. CARTTER. Will my colleague withdraw the demand for the previous question for a moment?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Will the gentleman renew it?

Mr. CARTTER. I will renew it if the gentleman desires it.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Then I withdraw my call.

Mr. CARTTER. I am opposed to the amendment offered by my colleague, [Mr. CAMPBELL,] for the simple reason that I believe that the gentlemen who represent this nation in its various districts upon this floor are fully as capable of distributing this information as a clerk in the Coast Survey office. That is my humble opinion upon the subject.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Will my colleague allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CARTTER. By all means.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Does not the gentleman believe that we should be able to get as many copies from the Coast Survey as we desire?

Mr. CARTTER. I will answer that in my regular course of remark. We have learned by the mover of this proposition that the number of forty copies are given to each Congressional district in the United States; and this enormous number of books seems a subject of great burden to my colleague. He does not know how to dispose of them all in the great "Butler" district. We are told, at the same time, that this document brings to light the minute geography of our coast, hitherto unexplained in the geographical books of the country. This is another item.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Will the gentleman allow me one word? I do not pretend that my constituents of the Butler district are very desirous of entering into all the minutiae of the coast survey business; but I doubt whether the gentleman's constituents, notwithstanding he may have sent his forty copies among them, have ever read a single copy. I doubt very much whether my colleague himself ever read one entire, and I put that question to him, whether he ever did read one? I confess I never have, for I feel no interest upon the subject.

Mr. CARTTER. I hold that no gentleman upon this floor who is as incapable of appreciating the importance of this geographical survey as my colleague, by his remarks, has proved himself to be, is entirely at liberty to ask the question as to whether anybody else has ever read this work.

Mr. CAMPBELL, (interrupting.) But will my colleague answer the question?

Mr. CARTTER, (continuing.) He is at liberty to ask whether the constituents of anybody have ever read it. But I think if the gentleman will appeal to the colleges of my district—to a public acknowledgment rendered to my humble self, in courtesy for having transmitted this very geographical information to them during the last Congress, he will find an answer to his question.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Will not the gentleman—

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

PUBLISHED AT WASHINGTON, BY JOHN C. RIVES.—TERMS $3 FOR THIS SESSION.

32D CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 15, 1852.

NEW SERIES.....No. 17.

Mr. CARTTER. No further interruptions! Mr. CAMPBELL. But the gentleman has failed to answer the question I propounded to him. I ask—

Mr. CARTTER. No more interruption! I cannot allow the gentleman again to interrupt me!

The gentleman is in great difficulty how he is to dispose of his forty copies containing the geographical information, brought to light at an annual cost of $300,000 to the nation. He cannot conceive how an interior district in the West can be benefited by any information of this description. Why, do you not wish to overspread this Republic with this minute geographical information which you have brought to light by the energies of your Government? And have not you sprinkled over the whole country, institutions the whole object of which is to enlighten the public mind with regard to these very facts?

But my colleague has forgotten another important fact. He has forgotten that this coast survey also applies to and is extending along three thousand miles of lake coast in the West, penetrating the great interior; and in connection with which both his district, and my district, and every district in the interior of the great West, is interested—the coast by which every barrel of flour and every pound of pork must be transported; and with reference to the peculiar interest of my friend's district, every barrel of whiskey, too. [Great laughter.] Now is this great interior, or this great Northern interior, stretching for three thousand miles along the coast of these great inland seas, which bear upon their bosoms a commerce equal in extent to the salt water coast, to be told that they do not want information upon this subject? And are we to be told that it is better for us to commit to a clerk in the Topographical Bureau the distribution of this information, rather than to the Representatives in Congress? Why you cannot find a district, be it ever so benighted, or ever so isolated, in the great West, the people of which do not inquire every day and every week in reference to these great issues of commerce, which are to carry off the productions of the soil.

But our constituents in the West desire to inquire into another important matter. When this Government is lavishing its expenditure upon the salt water border, in developing its geography and its topography—while they are doing that, our constituents want to inquire what they are doing for the interior commerce of the nation, and the interior sea-board? If it is for no other purpose than to discover the patronage of the Government along the coast of the nation, I would send them this profile of our great national work, that they might go and demand what is coming to them. Now I cannot see any particular difficulty—I have myself no very serious apprehensions that I shall not be able to dispose of forty whole copies of this Coast Survey in my district. [A laugh.] And I presume my friend [Mr. CAMPBELL] will wait upon his constituents as courteously, although he is indisposed to support this resolution, for I know his fidelity to them and industry in their service is not exceeded by any other gentleman upon this floor. I hope this amendment will not prevail.

In accordance with my promise, I now move the previous question.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Will the gentleman withdraw it for a moment?

Mr. CARTTER. I am under special obligations to insist upon the previous question. [Laughter.]

Mr. CAMPBELL. I ask the gentleman to withdraw it. I have propounded the question—

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order unless the call for the previous question be withdrawn.

Mr. CARTTER. Well, I will withdraw the call for the previous question for my colleague, if he will promise to renew it. [Great laughter.]

Mr. CAMPBELL. I will renew it. For some time I was utterly unable to understand the reason why my colleague had assumed the position which he has taken in relation to the distribution of these copies of the report on the Coast Survey. Towards the close of his remarks, however, the secret leaked out. It seems he has a particular interest in the whiskey trade. [A laugh.] Now, if that article does happen to be a staple in my district, and that gentleman and his constituents feel a deep interest in the subject of its transportation, let me say to him that they can be supplied from my district without the aid of any information from this Coast Survey. [Laughter.] That gentleman represents a district in central Ohio. I have the honor to represent one in the southwestern portion, and the article can be carried by the overland route. It is not necessary to employ any conveyance upon the high seas to furnish them with as much as they want to answer their purposes.

But the position which my colleague has assumed may be accounted for, perhaps, in another way. He told us that he had received resolutions from schools and colleges in his district, tendering to him their most profound thanks for distributing these documents to them; and yet it will be observed by this House that while I, with frankness, admitted that I had never examined a word in any one of these Coast Surveys, yet when I put the question to my colleague—when I asked him to say whether he had ever read any one of them himself, he refused to make any response. While he bears down upon me for my neglect, he does not seem to have the manliness to acknowledge the same neglect in himself, but dodges the question. Therefore I have the right to assert before this House that he has never read that report, and I have the right to draw the inference, that if a gentleman possessing, perhaps, as much intelligence as any in this House, has never considered the subject of sufficient importance to examine it in detail, it follows, as a matter of course, that his constituents care nothing about it.

But the point I make by my amendment and by the remarks which I have submitted is, that this nation is going into an enormous expenditure of the people's money to print this document, and when it is printed the copies are to be scattered over the country at great expense to the Post Office Department for transportation, while they are utterly worthless when they reach their destination. I desire to see some reform in this respect. I desire to see the Coast Survey office transmit this document to the coast itself—to those who are engaged in carrying on our trade upon the high seas and are interested in having a knowledge of the condition of our harbors; and that these reports relating to agriculture—these reports which point the farmer to the true road to prosperity, shall be circulated in all our agricultural districts. That is my proposition. My colleague's constituents may feel a deep interest in this Coast Survey. Mine do not. I speak for mine, not for his. My constituents desire that kind of information, if we give it publicity here, which will result to their practical advantage. The farmers of my district, and I think I may say the farmers of my colleague's district too, care nothing about examining the maps and profiles presented in this coast survey. I would not vote a dollar, were I to look to the interests of my constituents alone, for the publication of this report. But when I look at this Union—when I look at this great interest of all interests, the commercial interest of the country, I find it necessary to have this document printed. All I desire by the amendment which I have submitted is to have these reports sent where they will be of some practical service.

So far as respects the intelligence of my constituents I have nothing to say, except—

Mr. FULLER, of Maine, (interrupting.) I believe it has been the universal practice of the Superintendent of the Coast Survey heretofore when these charts and reports were published, to address a note to every member of this House, requesting them to point out the particular institutions and persons to whom they may wish the report sent, and to send them to such as are pointed out.

Mr. CAMPBELL, (resuming.) I am obliged to the honorable gentleman from Maine for reminding me of that fact; and my colleague [Mr.

CARTTER] was no doubt one of those members who were addressed upon the subject. And let me say here, that I have very strong suspicions that the resolution of thanks from that country school in my colleague's district, of which he has boasted, originated from the fact that he had transmitted the identical charts to that school which had been sent to him by the Superintendent of the Coast Survey, and did not come through the distribution provided by the joint resolution.

Now, sir, my colleague's objection is, that a clerk in the Coast Survey department is not as competent as a member of this House. Let me say that I regard the Superintendent of the Coast Survey as better qualified to disseminate the information contained in these reports—which is doubtless valuable—than the gentlemen who have the honor to represent the agricultural districts upon this floor. Yes, sir, better perhaps than those who represent any other sort of districts. And, Mr. Speaker, my object, while I have the honor of a seat upon this floor, is to put this Government to no expense whatever that may not result in some practical good. The gentleman talks about economy, and yet he wants forty or fifty or a hundred copies of the Coast Survey report to circulate in a district that is in nowise interested in the survey of the coast. I did not rise, Mr. Speaker, for the purpose of consuming so much time as I have done. I hope the motion will prevail.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. I ask the gentleman to allow me a single word. I desire to say I fell into a mistake in regard to ten thousand being the usual number of extra copies which is printed of this report. I supposed that that was the case, without having examined the particular facts; but it does not alter the state of the argument I had the honor to present to the House. I think the report is of sufficient importance to justify the printing of the number demanded.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I have no objection to the number proposed to be printed, but to the manner in which they are to be distributed. I move the previous question.

The previous question received a second, and the main question was ordered to be put.

Mr. GORMAN. I believe I have the right to make an explanation. I do not want to make an hour's speech, nor even a ten minutes one. As chairman of the Committee on Printing, I have taken some pains to investigate this question of printing, and I reported this resolution in obedience to the will of a majority of that committee. I did not concur in printing even six thousand copies; nor do I concur now, but I yielded my assent. Some remarks have been made in regard to the cost. Let me say to the House, in the first place, that the Senate have passed a resolution ordering ten thousand copies to be printed—five thousand copies to go to the Superintendent of Survey, and five thousand for the use of the Senate. Last year this House ordered six thousand copies—one thousand for the use of the Survey and five thousand for the use of the House. Some gentlemen have undertaken to speak of the cost. After investigating that subject, I can say to the House that the cost of engraving alone, notwithstanding the use of the Electrotype process by which they are able to do it with greater facility than formerly, is from ninety to ninety-two cents for each one of the extra volumes. For every thousand copies that are published, they are obliged to renew the plate. This is done by the Electrotype process, which I confess I do not accurately understand, except as it has been explained to me by the members of that Survey. The engraving for these extra copies will cost from $1 12 to $1 25 per copy, and if I am not mistaken, it will in all probability exceed the highest sum named. I looked into the question to know where these copies were to go to, and what the Coast Survey wanted to do with so enormous a number. I said, where do you propose to distribute them? The same interrogation was made by the honorable gentleman from New York, [Mr. HAVEN.] The response was, We want to give some to the officers of the Army. How many? Two or three hundred. We want to give some to the officers of the Navy. How many? Two or three hundred copies. We want to send some abroad—to Europe, for the purpose of disseminating a knowledge of our coast in that country. How many? A thousand copies. They had not yet reached two thousand copies. What other sources do you desire to supply? We desire to supply the colleges and academies, schools and various institutions throughout the country. How many? A thousand copies, I suppose. Still they have not reached three thousand. What else do you desire to do with them? Well, for general distribution. Under the general head of "&c." we have allowed two or three thousand copies. This Coast Survey will receive five thousand copies from the Senate; and one thousand from this House—six thousand copies in all for the use of the Superintendent of the Coast Survey. The Senate will have five thousand copies—some seventy or eighty to each member of that body. And the House five thousand copies—some twenty or thirty to each member. This number will doubly supply all the institutions of the country; it will supply all the purposes of education through the country, unless you should include all the two-mile district schools. It will supply all your public libraries, and still there will be some one or two thousand for miscellaneous distribution—if you please.

The whole cost of these five or six thousand extra copies will be from seven to eight thousand dollars—most likely eight thousand dollars. I speak now of the extra copies, not of the original cost of the plates, and the number to be printed for each member. To this six thousand you must add the usual extra number—say one thousand—and you will have seven thousand copies, and if you get off with an expense of ten thousand dollars you will do better than I expect.

I have nothing to say with respect to the utility of this document, for I apprehend this House is fully satisfied that there is more or less public utility in the distribution of this work; but I have this to say, that I regard the argument which has been used upon this floor as potent, that the printing of this country is becoming enormous. When this country is informed that the printing for the Government has increased from seventy or eighty thousand, to a quarter of a million of dollars, they will begin to call the representatives of the country to an account. What has produced this additional expenditure of a quarter of a million of dollars? This, among other reasons, which I shall not now enumerate, is the main reason for my opposition to the publication of ten thousand copies of this Coast Survey report. A strict investigation of this whole question will dispel this idea which has got into the heads of members, that we need ten thousand copies.

No college wants more than one copy, no academy wants more than one copy, an officer in the Army or Navy needs but one copy, the heads of Department but one copy, to be placed in the public libraries to which they have access. I repeat again, that the number of this document published has increased by one thousand copies each year since this Coast Survey commenced. If we are to judge the future by the past, the demand next year will be for ten thousand copies. The argument is urged by one of my friends from Kentucky [Mr. STANTON] that our Government is increasing; our institutions are increasing, our population is increasing, and therefore the necessity for the increase of this expense. I do not regard this argument as being at all a good one. I hope the amendment will be voted down, and that the report of the committee will be acceded to. If gentlemen had taken the pains which I have, in investigating this matter, they would not ask for the publication of more than the Coast Survey officers themselves ask for.

[Mr. BARRERE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported as correctly enrolled, a bill making appropriations to meet the expenses incurred in consequence of the late fire; which was presented to the Speaker, and received his signature.]

Mr. SEYMOUR. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GORMAN] what number the officers of the Coast Survey asked to have printed?

Mr. GORMAN. Eight thousand, as I understand it.

The resolution, the amendment, and the amendment to the amendment were read for information.

The question being put upon the amendment of Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio, to the amendment so as to provide for the printing of ten thousand copies for distribution by the Superintendent of the Coast Survey, it was decided in the negative.

The question then recurred upon the amendment of Mr. EVANS; upon which

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, demanded tellers; which were ordered; and Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, and Mr. HAMILTON were appointed.

The question being put, the tellers reported—ayes 66, noes 80.

So the amendment was rejected.

The question being then put upon the original resolution, upon a division there were—ayes 134, noes not counted.

So the resolution was adopted.

CENSUS TABLES.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask leave to offer a resolution. If objection is made, I will move a suspension of the rules.

Mr. JACKSON. I rise to a point of order. The question of order I make is this: that when the call for the State of Georgia was made by the Chair, a response was prevented by a motion from a privileged committee, and that, consequently, it is now in order for gentlemen from the State of Georgia to respond.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is aware, however, that on Monday it is in order to move for a suspension of the rules. The gentleman upon the left of the Chair moves to suspend the rules.

Mr. JACKSON. I hope the rules will not be suspended, that I may have the privilege I am entitled to.

The resolution was read for information, as follows:

Whereas the Superintendent of the Census has published—in the Globe of January 1st, 1852—a clear and condensed report of the Census, containing a large amount of valuable information:

And whereas that information, now desired by the people, cannot be had, in the ordinary course of printing, for a long time to come, and then in limited and very inadequate quantities: therefore

Resolved, That the Committee on Printing be instructed to order 100,000 copies of that report for the use of this House, provided the cost shall not exceed one cent per copy.

The question being put—on a division there were—ayes 100, noes 48.

So the rules were suspended.

Mr. OUTLAW called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Illinois, moved the House adjourn; which motion was agreed to.

So the House adjourned.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. FELCH, in pursuance of notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. 111) for the relief of William A. Richmond; which was read a first and second time by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

NOTICE OF BILL.

Mr. STOCKTON gave notice that he should to-morrow, or on some early day thereafter, ask leave to introduce a bill to authorize the Postmaster General to contract for carrying the mails between Jersey City and port of New York and Galway, in Ireland.

COMPENDIUM OF PUBLIC DOCUMENTS.

Mr. BRADBURY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained leave to introduce a joint resolution providing for a compendium of the annual public documents; which was read a first and second time by its title. It is as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President be, and he hereby is authorized and requested, at the commencement of each future session of Congress, or as soon thereafter as may be practicable, to cause to be prepared a compendium of the public documents accompanying the President's message, and of the reports of the Secretary of the Treasury on the finances, and on commerce and navigation, and of such other reports of any of the Secretaries as may be of general interest, embracing only the more important portions thereof, for the purpose of being printed in a single volume, as a substitute for the extra numbers of said documents heretofore published.

Mr. BRADBURY. I move that the resolution be laid upon the table and printed.

Mr. BADGER. I would ask the honorable Senator if that resolution ought not to be referred to some committee? It seems to me that there is a provision in the latter part of it which requires grave consideration. It is whether, if that joint resolution becomes a law, it will not have the effect of preventing the Senate from publishing these documents at large. I suggest that it should be referred.

Mr. BRADBURY. By reference to the phraseology of the resolution, it will be seen that it will have no such effect. The resolution contemplates the preparation of a compendium of the more material portions of the public documents in order that they may be printed. It does not declare that they shall be printed; but the number of documents that shall be printed in full, and the number of compendiums that will be printed, will all be matters depending on the future action of Congress. After the resolution is printed, if any necessity shall arise for its examination it can then be referred.

The motion to lay the resolution on the table and print it, was then agreed to.

ADDITIONAL COMMITTEE CLERKS.

Mr. GWIN submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be authorized to employ a clerk.

Mr. RUSK submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be and they are hereby authorized to employ a clerk.

ASSIGNABILITY OF LAND WARRANTS.

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. President, there is a bill upon your table which perhaps more than any other interests the public. If it can be taken up I believe it will be passed in a few minutes. I allude to the bill making bounty land warrants assignable. I hope it will be the pleasure of the Senate to take it up, and to effect that object I move that all previous orders be postponed.

Several SENATORS. It will lead to debate.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. I believe there are some two or three resolutions on the calendar as unfinished business, which should be first disposed of. The honorable Senator from Virginia, I believe, thinks the bill which he mentions can be taken up and passed without discussion. Now, I happen to know that there are questions involved in that bill which will not be disposed of without considerable debate. Under these circumstances, I hope that bill will not be taken up.

Mr. HUNTER. I withdraw the motion for the present, but give notice that on Monday next I will renew it.

PRINTING THE SEVENTH CENSUS.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the following resolution:

Be it resolved, &c., That the Joint Committee on Printing be directed to contract with Donelson & Armstrong for printing the Census returns, upon such terms as the committee may deem reasonable."

Which Mr. SMITH had moved to amend by substituting the following:

"It shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior, in conformity with the provisions of the act entitled 'An act making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year 1842,' approved on the 18th May of said year, to contract for the composition and press-work of—copies of the returns of the Seventh Census, as the same are classified and arranged by said Secretary; and in like manner to contract for so much paper and of such quality as he shall deem proper for said work; and in like manner to contract for binding said returns as printed in such style as he may judge expedient; provided the party to each of said contracts shall give such surety, and said paper and work shall be subject to such inspection, as said Secretary shall require to insure a faithful performance of the same."

Mr. BRIGHT proceeded to address the Senate at some length in defence of the resolution, and in reply to the remarks of the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. SMITH,] of yesterday. This speech will be found in the Appendix.

Mr. SMITH. I wish to make a very few remarks in reply to my honorable friend from Indiana; and I am prompted to do so on account of the personal issue which my honorable friend made with me last evening. That honorable Senator saw fit to remark, that at the last session of Congress he understood me to take ground in the Senate in favor of giving the printing of the census returns to a political press in this city—I think he named the Republic. I then suggested that he was under an entire misapprehension upon that subject. I do not suppose that my honorable friend intended to misrepresent my position in that regard. The truth is, that from the very outset of this business, I have been utterly opposed to the re-introduction into Congress of the old practice of dispensing the public printing, on any principle of political favoritism; and it so happens that I find myself on record, in a train of remarks submitted to the Senate, in relation to this very subject of printing the census returns, in which, views are expressed, such as I had the honor to lay before the Senate in the remarks which I made yesterday, and I hope the Senate will indulge me in reading from these remarks a few extracts, showing what I said. In the first extract which I will read, I remarked as follows:

"I fully accord in the opinion which has been expressed by my friends upon the other side of the Chamber, that the time has gone by for investing the head of any department with an arbitrary discretion upon this subject of printing."

And then again:

"Now, then, this committee has reported this bill, as I have before remarked, containing the provision of the old law, and conferring on the head of the Department of the Interior the arbitrary power of making a contract with any individual that he pleases, and upon any terms that he may see fit, without advertising, without competition. To any such provision in this bill, I am utterly opposed—not that I believe the honorable gentleman at the head of that Department would abuse the trust thus confided in him; I am convinced he will execute it with as much fidelity as any other of the distinguished citizens of our country."

"Now, sir, in order to realize, or rather to carry out what has been the policy of the Government for several years past, to wit: to have all the printing let out at contract, and given to the lowest bidder, all that is required is the addition of a few words to the clause of the twentieth section."

The last clause reads thus:

"And further, as the returns are made, to cause the same to be classified and arranged in the best and most convenient manner for use; and thousand copies thereof to be printed for distribution."

"Now, sir, if the amendment of my honorable friend shall fail, I shall propose to add to that clause these words: 'On contract, as now provided by law.' That is to say, to the lowest bidder."

And then, again, I remarked:

"I would say that I am not for subsidizing the press of the city, either the Whig or the Democratic press—either the one or the other."

And again:

"As to the scheme of giving the printing, at this late day, to the political press of this city, it is a proposition that I shall resist to the uttermost, and at all times."

And finally, I remarked:

"I am opposed to the existing system of printing. It must be amended; and I trust that before the present Congress is over, we may have some plan of doing the Congressional printing which will secure accuracy, good quality, expedition, and all the other elements which are indispensable to the transaction of business of Congress. I intend, sir, to resist now, and at all times hereafter, the connection of the public printing with the political press of this city, whether upon the one side or the other. I therefore insist that the 21st section is exactly right; and with respect to the preceding section, all that is required is simply the addition of four or five words such as I have already suggested to the Senate."

Such, Mr. President, were my views then, as they have been at all times; and I have resisted to the uttermost, and on all occasions, the idea of breaking up the existing policy of the two Houses of Congress, and letting out the printing—either the printing of Congress or the departmental printing—to the lowest bidder. But I understand my honorable friend from Indiana [Mr. BRIGHT] to say, that the amendment which I propose to his resolution contemplates giving this printing to the Secretary of the Interior, to be disposed of by him arbitrarily and at his own discretion; or, in other words, to confer upon him the power, if he should see fit, to confer the execution of the work upon some portion of the public press in the city. I regret very much, Mr. President, that when I closed my remarks yesterday, I did not move the printing of this amendment; and when I consider the character of my chirography, I will not complain that my honorable friend from Indiana [Mr. BRIGHT] should have entirely misapprehended the character of this amendment. It does not, sir, propose at all to confer any discretionary power upon the Secretary of the Interior. On the contrary, it requires him, in the first place, to let out the composition and the press-work; in the next place, to contract for the supply of paper; and in the third place, to contract for the binding, in conformity with the provisions of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year 1842," or, in other words, to let it out to the lowest bidder; to advertise it in the public papers for thirty days; to receive the bids of all those who choose to enter into this competition, and then to let it out to those who will do the work for the lowest price, according to the specifications—the party bidding to give security, and the work, the whole work—the paper, the composition, the press-work, and the binding—to be subjected to such supervision and inspection as the honorable Secretary may deem to be necessary in order to secure a full and faithful performance of the contract. By my proposed amendment, therefore, I banish all favoritism in the execution of the work in any and every form, and put it upon the same footing as the departmental printing, except in one or two points which I regard as improvements, such as the separating of the printing and press-work from the purchase of the paper, and these again from the binding—making each department distinct; and then again in requiring security and inspection and supervision in the execution of the work. There is, therefore, not to be any favoritism. The work is to be done on the lowest terms, and it will be done, I have no doubt, in a manner which will be entirely satisfactory to the Departments, as well as to Congress and the people of the country in general.

Again, Mr. President, the honorable Senator from Indiana saw fit to remark, that I had, as he presumed, greatly underrated the value of this work, and that I seemed to suppose that it was of very little consequence—that it was a thing to be printed and thrown aside, like many other documents, as of no value. In his argument, however, the Senator says it is a work of very great value—that it is to go into the records of the Government, and into our colleges and the various States of the Union; and the honorable Senator saw fit to have read, at the desk of the Clerk of the Senate, some eulogies by some foreign writer (I hardly know who) on the value of this work, and speaking of it as being a very great improvement on any work of this character, either in this country or in Europe. Sir, I have not undervalued this work. I know that it is a work of high importance. But what, let me ask the honorable Senator from Indiana, has that to do with printing it at the Union office? That is the question I wish him to answer me. What has the importance of the work to do with the printing of it at the Union office without any competitors? What has that to do with the question of the propriety of conferring this work upon the political press of this city as a matter of favoritism? I do not know but that there may be Senators enough to carry out such a scheme; but at all events I am going to wait to hear the votes of Senators announced before I will believe that they will do it. But the honorable Senator stands up and gravely tells the Senate that this work is undisposed of—that it is a sort of waif and estray, which the honorable Senator proposes we should capture and deliver over to the proprietors of the Union newspaper in this city. And "it is work," says the honorable Senator, that is "undisposed of!" And this is said, I presume, to alleviate any little irritation of conscience which there may be; and I venture to say that there is a good deal on all sides of this Chamber in regard to the propriety of taking this course. It is a work which the honorable Senator says is "undisposed of!" And why is it undisposed of? Simply because we have not ordered the Secretary of the Interior to print it. And if it were ordered to be printed, then it would come under the law of 1842, which tells the Senator from Indiana that it shall not go into the Union office, or, in other words, that it shall not be disposed of unless they do it in this form. The Senate is to make this order, and then comes in the law of 1842 to take hold of it. The gentleman proposes to alter this law to take it out of the hands of the proper party, and to hand it over to my friend from Arkansas; [Mr. BORLAND.] He again [Mr. BORLAND] replies that he will have nothing to do with it, and I respect and honor him very much for coming to such a conclusion. He does not like the job. But, says my honorable friend from Indiana, "I guess I can find Senators who would be willing to do this." Possibly he may; I do not know but he will. Perhaps the honorable Senator from Indiana himself will volunteer to help this most lucrative job into the office of a certain concern, for the welfare of which he appears to have a profound solicitude.

"But," again says the honorable Senator, "I can furnish you a precedent for all this, because Congress has been buying books from Gales & Seaton for I don't know how long—about a quarter of a century—and handing them over to themselves." Very well; I can tell that honorable Senator that I have not a very exalted opinion of that operation; and if he will introduce a proposition to repeal the whole system, I will vote for his proposition, and restore all the books that I have got, to the Government. I say that a more wasteful, more prodigal, more wicked system of disbursing the public money never existed on earth than this system of distributing books among members of Congress. I do not say this with the view of being understood as objecting to any pay which members get either in the form of mileage or per diem. It is not because I believe that they really get anything more than a fair compensation for their services here. I know that I earn every dollar which I receive here; and if I have a trifle to carry home to keep to pay the expenses of my family during the recess, I think I do very well. It is not because we take out of the public treasury $17 to pay for a volume to give to a member that I object—seventeen dollars to pay for that which is absolutely not worth three dollars. We pay hundreds of thousands of dollars out of the Treasury of the United States every year for what is of no real use to us.

A SENATOR, (in his seat.) Oh, move to divide the money amongst ourselves.

MR. SMITH, (laughingly.) Yes if we could divide the money among ourselves, there would be some propriety in that—some good common sense in that; but for the sake of conferring some little miserable pecuniary benefit upon this member, or upon that one, when he newly comes to Congress—and I take my full share of responsibility on this matter, for I have had these books myself, and when they are applied for for others who have not received them, I am constrained to vote for them for very shame, because I myself have had them—but I say, in all earnestness, that it would be infinitely better, if this system is to be continued, to take this money openly and manfully out of the Treasury and distribute it amongst ourselves, than to resort to this indirect method of increasing the remuneration of members in a mode which is really of very little value to us one way or the other. But the honorable Senator from Indiana says that because this old and corrupt system—and I beg pardon for using the word "corrupt," for I mean nothing offensive by the word in which I use it—which has come down to us, I do not know how long, is still in use, and because we are in the habit of ordering books for members of Congress, and now that we have a piece of departmental printing, which the honorable Senator thinks will cost not more than three hundred thousand dollars, reckoning on the basis of six dollars per volume as the cost of the Archives, whereas that cost was no less than seventeen dollars a volume; and because—

MR. BRIGHT. I desire to correct the Senator, I did not use the word "corrupt," nor did I say anything against the system of printing books. I have never voted for books; I have always voted against the practice, though I have taken them, as I understand the Senator from Connecticut has also.

MR. SMITH. I am sensible, in speaking of the distribution of books among members, that I have traveled in some degree out of the proper limits; but the honorable Senator referred to it, as being some justification of this extraordinary measure. I think I am in order to denounce this system as an abuse. But after all, what is it but buying books? It is not Congressional printing, it is not departmental printing; it is buying certain books, containing a great deal of information which we distribute among the members for the purpose, as we suppose, of enabling us the better to discharge our duties here. But I must confess they have had very little effect so far as I am concerned, for there are many volumes of them into which I have never looked. I know that Congress has purchased books, and has paid for them a great deal more than they were worth; and I hope that when my friend brings up the subject as one to be imitated, he does not propose that we shall pay this enormous price of $17 per copy; for if he does, instead of $300,000, it will cost half a million of dollars at the very least.

But how does he know it will cost only $300,000? On what basis does he make that calculation? Has the Senator told how many copies of this work he proposes to have printed? and is it not absolutely necessary that Congress should settle the question in regard to the number of copies before anybody can make any calculation on the expense of the work, or even the cost of composition, to say nothing about press-work? Now my friend—and I certainly cherish for the Senator from Indiana sentiments of the very highest respect; I know he is a vigilant and highly-valuable member of this body, and I will do him the justice to say here, that I know of no man who is more prompt, more energetic, and more determined in resisting the passage through this Senate of any bill which will be likely to cast a burden upon the Treasury, without the severest scrutiny, and will more insist on knowing all the elements of the cost—on this occasion seems to be prepared to go to the entire extent of the result which may follow from his proposition, without knowing what number of copies we are to have printed; and he proposes to rush into this field at once, and in the dark.

There appears to be something that has disarmed the usual vigilance of my friend from Indiana, for he says the Secretary tells him this morning that he has one State done. I do not know how long they have been in arriving at that point of consummation; and when the remaining States are to be completed, I do not know.

Sir, I know that Congress has been in the habit of buying books; and I know that we provide for the publication of our debates—to what profit I will not undertake to say, or with what utility to the country. We paid at the last Congress $7 50 per column for the publication of our speeches in the Intelligencer, and $7 50 to the Union. The Intelligencer could not live by it, and has therefore gone out of the business. But the Union continues to prosecute the work, and I hope will prosecute it with success. As it is very important, or is supposed to be very important, that our debates should be published in full, if $7 50 is not a sufficient compensation to the "Union," I am willing to add to it, particularly as we are now relieved from the expense of publishing them in the "Intelligencer." But what has that to do with the question before us? What if we do hire the Union to print our debates, what if we do not open the printing of our debates to competition? This is a matter relating to departmental printing; and I say that the very moment we determine upon the number of copies to be printed, and order the Secretary of the Interior to print the work, it comes under the operation of existing laws, and is disposed of.

But, Mr. President, after having addressed the Senate, perhaps at an unreasonable length, yesterday, upon this subject, I do not deem it right that I should trespass further upon the time and attention of this body; and I have to express my thanks for the patience and attention that has been shown in listening to me.

MR. HALE. I want to say a word or two upon this subject, though I enter upon it with great reluctance, and, if the Senate will excuse me, with great diffidence, [laughter] because, sir, we have been entertained, of late, with such lofty subjects, the safety of the Union, the spirit of the age, progress, manifest destiny, national intervention, the Magyar race, &c., that it is a great effort to clip the wings of a man's imagination and come down to a printing office, and deal in such a commonplace subject as the mere printing of these Census returns will be. But it is a part of what we are bound to do, and we must do it. I apprehend that a great mistake has arisen from the fact that we are endeavoring to be a little more pure, a little more patriotic than our poor human nature will allow us to be. And here is an opportunity offered to us—I mean, to us Democrats—to do a great public benefit to the country, and a little private benefit to a party at the same time; and that a great good and a small good can be effected at once. We had better not shut our eyes to the existing realities about us, and to strain them at some great national object that does not exist. We had better look close at hand. We have a country first, and the country has got a Whig and a Democratic party in it. We cannot get along without them; and the next thing to be looked at is, that the party cannot get along without an organ. Who ever heard of a party without an organ? But the countryman, who never saw an organ, and sees for the first time the man who is performing upon one, comes to the conclusion that the man who is touching the keys is the only one employed in making the music. He does not know that there is a boy behind, who blows the bellows. [Laughter.] What sort of an organ would it be without somebody behind? This bill is the boy that blows the bellows; this is the wind that fills the pipes; the keys are to be played elsewhere. All that the public ordinarily sees, is the man; the bellows boy is behind. The bellows boy in this case has to sit behind—and "raise the wind," as a friend near me suggests. Now, it seems to me, it is a little ungenerous in the Whigs—standing on a high moral platform—I now stand on a high platform, I can look down upon and talk to both parties—I say it seems to me a little ungenerous in the Whigs who, according to the authority which the honorable Senator from Indiana has adduced, have had bellows blowers for a long time, and their keys have been touched, for Whig organs will not go without bellows blowing any more than Democratic organs—I say it is a little hard, when they have had their bellows blown so long, that they are not willing to have these new performers have the benefit of a little wind. Donelson & Armstrong cannot touch the keys without this blowing, and I am willing to give a liberal quantity of wind; I am willing to give anything not very extravagant; and I hope, if we do this, as we certainly shall—for we all know where the majority is—we are a majority here, sir, I mean we, the Democrats, and we are going to have a broad platform, broad enough for all conservatives and republicans to stand upon, both North and South—being in a decided majority, we shall carry this measure in one way or another. There is no doubt about it, for human nature is as human now as it ever has been, and it will continue to be the same, at least till after the next presidential election. Well, I hope, looking to the future, that after we have been so liberal, our liberality will continue, for there is another party, a very small party, I mean now the Free-Soil party—and they, too, want wind. They only publish a weekly paper now, but by and by, as the party is progressing, they may have a daily organ; and if they do, their organ cannot go any more than yours can without wind. And I hope those whose organs have been so long making such sweet music, the public all the while blowing the bellows, will show some magnanimity to them when they come forward with their very modest request to raise a little wind. Now this, I think, is the real, sober, matter of fact view of the case. That is to say, this is what we will talk over between ourselves. I hope the reporters will not print this, because this is not for the public; it is for us. Our organs want wind; we have the means to give it to them, and we will give it to them. I know that this will be a favor to these gentlemen, I know that if I were in power—but I forgot, I am of the Democratic party, [laughter;] but if I were differently situated, I would go for giving to my friends in preference to those who are opposed to us. Now, as this is the natural and common-sense view of the subject—the view we all take of it, the view that everybody has taken since the fall of Adam—I do not mean of Adams—as that is the proper view, why not come up to it at once? I presume that Donelson & Armstrong are highly respectable gentlemen; I do not know them. And I hope there will be a provision, or that the committee will arrange the matter so that what we do for the Union now will not prejudice Mr. Ritchie's claims, because he said that he played and furnished the wind. I hope then this will not prejudice his claim, but that we shall remember him.

"Let others hail the rising sun—
I bow to him whose race is run."

And I hope we will not forget to reward—not to reward, but do a patriotic act to those coming on the stage. I am perfectly satisfied that a majority of this Senate will give this patronage to their friends. It would be strange if they did not. I think if my friend from Connecticut [Mr. Smith] was in power, he would do the same thing; if he would not, he would not live up to that reputation he has acquired, for his reputation has been that he will stand by his friends. No man need blush for that. I hope my friends will stand by me. I have not a great many here, sir; but I hope what few I have will stand by me.

Now let us have done with this matter. I have no doubt this will help the Union, and I am willing that it should be helped. The great Union has been saved, and the little Union ought to be helped; and the two acts are in unison. I hope we shall all take this practical view of it. I trust I do not offend the sensibilities of any one; I hope nobody is loaded with a flowery speech, full of tropes and figures of rhetoric, who will be shocked at the apparently trifling manner in which I have treated this subject. I am in earnest; and being so, I can assure the honorable gentlemen from Connecticut and Indiana, that I do not impeach their motives in the least. I believe there is a good deal of human nature in mankind generally, and as much of it in these honorable Senators as there is in high-minded men everywhere, and not any more. And I believe that manifest destiny points to this manner of doing this printing. Let us bow to manifest destiny, and let us not spend a great deal more time in discussing this question. I hope I have given a rational view of this subject—one that will commend itself to the mind of every Senator, and that we shall be disposed to come to a decision of this question at once.

Mr. DAWSON. Before the question is taken I desire to say a few words on the subject. The resolution and amendment both contemplate the printing of the census returns, and it is a question of judgment submitted to this body which is the best plan, and which will carry out the object of the Senate, and be most advantageous to the country. That is the question on which we are to divide, and I am sure, for one, that party considerations will not influence the votes of the majority of this body. The resolution of the Senator from Indiana proposes that this printing shall be let out by the Committee on Printing of this body, and designates that a contract shall be made with persons therein named. Now I object to this course, for the reason that it excludes all competition, and places the publication of an important work in the hands of a mere newspaper establishment—not a bookbinding or book printing establishment at all.

It is said that there is a precedent for this. That is very true. Both parties in Congress at different times have probably pursued this course; but the question at present is, has there ever been, since this Government commenced, one single proposition for printing for the benefit of the country involving so large an amount? What is the question? It is in truth an appropriation of from three hundred thousand to five hundred thousand dollars of the public money to execute this printing. The Senator from Indiana puts down this work at six dollars per volume, and makes it to consist of two volumes, thus making twelve dollars for the set; and he limits the number to twenty-five thousand volumes, which makes the sum of three hundred thousand dollars. Now, sir, if Senators will only reflect for a moment, I think they will soon perceive that the Senator from Indiana has not given us more than half the estimate of what this work will actually cost. Look at all the history of the past, and all the precedents that can be cited, the patent reports and others, and see whether this is not the case. This document will be admitted to be a vastly more important publication than any we have ever ordered. Suppose, now, that we should print fifty thousand copies—and a friend on whose judgment I can rely, supposes we shall need that number—then the amount will run up to six hundred thousand dollars.

Now, what is it that we want? We want a book published in the best and cheapest style; and the question is, what plan shall we adopt to effect this? I maintain, Mr. President, and I think I can show it satisfactorily, that the plan proposed by the amendment submitted by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. Smith] is the proper plan. And what is that plan? It is that the work shall be let out under contract by the Secretary of the Interior. And why is it proper that the Secretary of the Interior should have something to do with this work? Has not the Census been taken under the law, through that department of the Government? Is not the Superintendent of the Census, the head of that bureau, subject to the Government of the country? Certainly. Who knows most about the plan of this work, or about the way in which the compendium has been formed, or how it should be printed, so as best to carry out the intentions of Congress, as perfected in and through the Interior Department, as the Secretary of the Interior? And is it not well known to this body that the printing of this work will be commenced before the work itself is completed in the office of the Secretary of the Interior? It seems to me that, in a matter involving so many figures—for I believe the work will consist pretty much of figures, except merely a few words of introduction to each State—with this exception, all the rest are statistics,—I say, that in a matter where there are so many figures, there must be liability to very many errors. And how are those errors to be avoided or corrected except by those who superintend the publication? And who can better superintend the publication than the head of the Census Bureau, or Superintendent of the Census, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior? Sir, it is clear that no one can do it so well as he.

And here permit me to throw out a suggestion for the consideration of both sides of this House, whether they be Democrats or Whigs. What would be the suggestion which would be made in relation to this resolution, if we were to pass it just on the eve of a presidential election? Would it not be said that through the agency of party power, we had made an appropriation of public money to sustain an organ at the expense of the Government? I do not make any such charge; but it is our duty so to legislate as to prevent the public mind from entertaining the belief that we are influenced here by improper motives. Now, how can this best be done? Why, sir, by doing that which is right—by doing our duty, and then endeavoring to satisfy the country that what we have done is right. And I submit it to you, and to every Senator on this floor, if we as individuals had the contract to let out, having to pay from three to five hundred thousand dollars, whether we would not do it under special contract, and let it out to the lowest bidder, first giving him the means of ascertaining the terms we proposed, and the character of the work which we desired to have done? We should certainly do this. We would feel ourselves bound to employ those persons whom we believed would do the work best, and at the cheapest rate. And who, sir, understands this matter best? and who should be our agent? Not the Committee on Printing of the Senate, for their chairman refuses to undertake the great and important work of making a contract by which from three to five hundred thousand dollars are to be expended. Why does he refuse? Because, he says, that he is not competent; that it is not in the line of his usual vocation; that he has not the requisite judgment to protect the country through his instrumentality from probable imposition or from a bad contract. This is honest and correct on his part.

Where then can we next best go to? We go to the head of the Interior Department. And who is the head of that Department? And what are his qualifications for this business? We all know that so far as printing is concerned, he is an individual who has more printing to be done than any other of the Secretaries in the various departments of this Government. And has not the printing of these various departments for years been done under contracts made by the gentlemen at the head of these various departments? Certainly it has. And has not that printing been satisfactory? Have we ever heard of any complaints similar to those which we have heard in reference to the printing of the Senate? No, sir; not any. Why then do we say "We will not trust you?" Why take it from him? Is he not as competent as the committee of this House? And will he not be more competent when he can say to the world, "Here is a contract which will involve the expenditure of five hundred thousand dollars; I require these census returns to be published according to the plan or size of a certain book, on such and such paper, and the binding to be done in such and such a manner and who is the public printer;" from Appleton, of Boston, to Harpers, of New York, who will undertake this work, and if you cheapest, according to the plan proposed by the Secretary of the Interior? Are we to suppose that he will propose a plan for the work not durable in its character, and advantageous to the country? Not at all. Then by this means we have competition, and competition regulates prices. Competition brings down labor to the mere point where it can make support, and it is our duty to make it so. Now, I ask, is the Union office to be deprived of the same privilege, or the Intelligencer or any book-binding establishment in the United States? No. They come in competition; and if they have the material, and the time, and the proper capacity to execute the work, there is the public announcement; put in your bid, and if you are the lowest bidder you will get it. By this mode you will not exclude the Globe or the Republic, or any other office. And why then give it exclusively to the Union? Is it because they can do it better than any other? Not at all. They may do it equally as well. The only objection I have to the resolution is, that by it you confine the printing to certain individuals, and deprive the country of the benefit of competition.

Mr. President, it is said that our work has been badly done. In some instances, I admit this may be so, but to make this declaration with respect to all of it, is unjust towards that old gentleman who formerly did our printing. I speak of Mr. Ritchie. To say that his work, so far as the printing is concerned, was not done honestly, and in good faith, is not true. The printing by Mr. Hamilton has been better than for many years preceding, and the paper has been honestly supplied, and all the material has been such as shows durability and clearness upon its face.

Mr. BORLAND. I wish to inquire of the Senator from Georgia, if I understood him to say that the printing has been done according to contract.

Mr. DAWSON. Not at all.

Mr. BORLAND. It is my duty to say that I have most carefully examined both the printing and the paper, weighing the paper with a pair of scales, prepared expressly for that purpose, and I find it to fall short, at least twenty-five per cent., of what the contract requires.

Mr. DAWSON. I am not speaking about the contract; I maintain, though, that the paper and printing are both clear, and to my eye very good.

But it is alleged, on the one side, that you have failed in all the special contracts which you have made; and on the other, that all the contracts which you have made by letting out the work to the lowest bidder have been a total failure. I will ask of the Senate, where is the special contract, which was made with the lowest bidder according to the terms specified, that has not been conformed to and the printing well done for the Senate of the United States? Is it your "Blue Book"? Is it Schoelcraft's publication in relation to the aborigines of this country? They have come up to the public expectation. They have come up to the contract. And, besides, if you let the work out to the lowest bidder, upon terms specified and agreed on, and the bidder fails to discharge his duty, what are your courts of justice intended for? What is the judgment of your body? You have the power of appropriation; and if there be a failure to comply with the contract, you have it in your power to stop the appropriation for it, and also to sue the violator of the contract and recover damages. Why, sir, has it come to this that there is such a want of confidence in the contractors with this Government that we should look necessarily for a failure, and that we should make a contract for an amount above what we could procure it for from other individuals, merely to avoid the consequences of the failure on the part of contractors to conform to their contracts? It is unjust to argue thus. The presumption is, that every man who enters into a contract is honest and will honestly conform to it.

I stated that I preferred the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut; and why? Because it would permit competition to enter into the disposition of this contract; because it would give to all connected with the printing interest of the United States a right to judge whether they could bid lower than another or not. In disposing of the public work, where printing is involved, it is a right that belongs to every printing establishment to have the liberty of making a proposition to do it. It is contrary to the principles of our Government to confine our contracts to particular persons, to the exclusion of others equally competent to perform the work. We should observe an equality, sir, and base our action upon such a ground that every man in the community who desires, may compete for the contract. I submit to the Senate and the country whether either party, I care not which, that pursues the course proposed by the resolution of the Senator from Indiana, is not confining itself down to terms inconsistent with the public interest, and in violation of the right of other citizens of the country. What! if I am a printer in the city of Washington, and the Union office is also a printing establishment here, shall I be excluded from the right of competing with it for the public printing upon any principle that we can adopt? Upon what principle would it be? The Senator from New Hampshire rather ironically presented a state of things here which I do not pretend to stand upon—that it grows out of party considerations. I cannot believe that—I ought not to believe it. But if these charges go forth to the country against the character of this body, should we not avoid giving any foundation for them? And how can we avoid it? By pursuing a proper and consistent course on this subject. Let your printing go where it ought to go. This is an emanation from the Department of the Interior. There is a responsible man there deeply interested in the proper publication of this work. He superintended the taking of the census. His reputation is involved in it. We are now about to adopt much in that work which was never authorized by law; for in the act authorizing the census to be taken nothing is said about ascertaining when the States were settled, when the counties were formed, or making any historical or geological representations of the various States in the Union. That was never contemplated. But it is all in the returns. They contain that valuable information all of which we are to adopt. Who is the author of that? Congress did not authorize it to be obtained. The Superintendent of the Census, through his labor, has brought all that into the census returns. It is his production; and is it not just to him, if you adopt that as a part of your census returns, that he at least should have the superintendence of the publication, so that he may correct any errors which might creep into it. When you passed the law authorizing the census to be taken, you said that the printing of this work should be reserved to Congress. And why? To keep it out of the public printer's hands—the printer that you had already employed by contract to do the Congressional printing. And why did you do that? In order that it might be printed in a style to accord with your views and wishes. Now, Congress can prescribe the manner and style of publication, and direct the Secretary of the Interior to attend to it, or we can direct him to prescribe the manner in which it should be done, and he can have it done.

Mr. President, I have very little interest in this matter as to the amount of appropriation. I have an interest, though, in protecting this body from unjust insinuations. I have no objection to the Union office having this printing. But I object to their having the exclusive right to it. I maintain that Rives, or Gales & Seaton, and everybody else, should have the same privilege. No party considerations govern me in this matter. None at all. I stand independent of all influence of that kind. We do not know how the papers will be divided in the presidential canvass. It was said by the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. HALE,] that human nature will be the same at least until after the next presidential election. What does that mean? It means that we are acting on party purposes; that we are laying down party positions, and making contracts merely to subserve party considerations, and not the interests of the country. I say it is our duty to avoid that; and the only way to avoid it is to accept the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. SMITH. There is a blank in the amendment which is to be filled. I move to fill it with twelve thousand.

Mr. BADGER. I move to fill it with fifty thousand.

The PRESIDENT. The question will be first on the motion of the Senator from North Carolina to fill the blank with fifty thousand.

When a division was called for—

Mr. BADGER said: As gentlemen seem to be startled at the idea of fifty thousand copies, I will change my motion to twenty-five thousand copies. The twelve thousand proposed by the Senator from Connecticut will be entirely too inadequate. It will only involve the necessity of Congress publishing a future edition of the work with increased expense.

Mr. PEARCE. Does this refer to the printing of a compendium or of the original returns?

Mr. SMITH. The original returns as arranged in the Census Office. It is the large work.

Mr. BADGER. I did not know that.

Mr. PEARCE. The number is entirely too large. I think one-fourth of the quantity will be entirely adequate.

Mr. BADGER. I thought it related to the compendium; but as it relates to the original returns, I withdraw my motion.

Mr. BORLAND. I think the whole proceeding, now proposed, embracing the original resolution, as well as the amendments under consideration, is irregular and premature. The act of the last Congress, commonly called the Census Bill, in reference to the results of which it is now proposed we shall act, requires, by express provision, that after the information had been collected by the marshals, and forwarded to Washington, the Superintendent of Census should digest and prepare a plan for its publication, and lay it before Congress at this session; and further, that the printing of the information thus obtained, prepared, and laid before us, should then be done, as Congress should direct. Now, sir, I ask, has this duty of the Superintendent of Census been performed? Has the information required by the law, and in the form required, been laid before us? If so, where is it—who has seen it—who can tell us anything about it? What are we to print? Shall it be the whole mass of matter, in the crude and undigested state in which it was received from the deputy marshals, that has been received by the Superintendent of Census? Or, if not the whole, then how much of it, and what part of it? It seems to me that every one must perceive that, before we undertake to dispose of this matter, it is indispensable that we shall know what it is; that is, we must know what, and how much, we intend to print, before we can print it; or, what is the same thing, contract for it, as proposed in the resolution. With all the information before the Senate, or the committee, which could possibly be obtained, it would be very difficult to make the estimates to insure an intelligent and practicable contract. Without any information at all, as to the character and quantity of the work, as we now are, it would be impossible. No one can tell us, except by vague and unreliable guesses, whether the work, when printed, will make one volume, or twenty volumes. But all the information I have mentioned, the law actually requires we shall have before we proceed further. I think every consideration of duty and of policy demands that we should conform to the requirements of the law.

At the suggestion of a friend near me, I ask for the reading of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. SMITH.]

The amendment was read.

Mr. BRIGHT. The original law which was introduced at the first session of the Thirty-first Congress, directing the taking of the Seventh Census, constituted the Secretary of State and Attorney General a Census Board. They were directed by the terms of the law to agree upon the statistics and enumerations of the inhabitants of the United States which were to be taken. The forms that are now in use or have been used were adopted. The census, the enumeration, and statistics were collected in pursuance of that law. The Superintendent of the Census Bureau has prepared at the head of each State, what is called a historical account of the State. A description of the counties, of their political organization, resources, &c., is also given. I understand some Senators to object to the printing of so much of that collection as relates to the counties. The resolution which I have offered, places it in the power of the committee to say whether it shall be printed or not.

I do not see how the Senate can decide that. I have proposed to refer it to the committee, inferring that they are the judges as to what should be printed in this case, as they have been in all other cases of printing—for when we introduce a bill or report, I believe, under the rule, it goes to that committee, and they have the power to decide whether it shall be printed or not, or at least to act upon it and recommend to the Senate what should be done. And I have known of no case where their report was overruled.

Mr. BORLAND. It has been done frequently.

Mr. BRIGHT. At any rate, the original resolution contemplates the reference of this matter to that committee, and they are to decide what shall be printed, and upon what terms it shall be done. I shall not address myself to the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut, for the reason that I have no idea that it can be adopted. I think, however, that twenty-five thousand is an ample number; but that is a matter not provided for by my resolution. The committee can decide upon that and report to the Senate.

Mr. BORLAND. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. BRIGHT] has fallen (inadvertently, I have no doubt) into a mistake upon two points:

1st. He has, I think, misapprehended the preliminary census bill as to the functions and duties of the Census Board created by it. He proceeds upon the supposition that the powers of that Board were plenary, and its action final, in adopting the plan for taking the Seventh Census. In this he is mistaken. It was made the duty of that Board to prepare a plan, embracing schedules, for the use of the marshals in taking the census. That was the extent of its powers; and its action, even to that limited extent, was not final. It was required to report to this body what it had done. That report was made, and we all remember what was then done. A census committee was then appointed, to whom the report of the Census Board was referred. The plan proposed by the Board was revised, and materially modified by the committee. And the revision and modification did not stop there; but when the committee reported to the Senate, a protracted discussion was had—the whole subject was examined, perhaps more thoroughly and critically than any other subject has ever been examined here; many days, indeed my memory is that several weeks, were occupied with it. Many, and in some respects radical, changes were made. In the schedules, whole columns were stricken out and others were added; and in several instances, I think, the captions were so altered as to give an entirely new character to the information to be collected. When we had done with it, in this respect, and adopted a general plan, which may be called a new plan, of our own, upon the basis, I admit, of those furnished us by the Board and committee, but materially differing from both, we were so careful to guard the consummation of a work to which we attached so much importance and upon which we had bestowed so much labor, that we would not agree that its results should be printed and published until it should again undergo our scrutiny and revision. For this final scrutiny and revision, we provided in the census bill, proper, passed at the conclusion of that careful and extended discussion, by requiring that the Superintendent of Census, after the information should have been collected, under the law and according to the plan we had adopted, should classify and arrange that information and lay it before us with a plan for its publication at this session of Congress. The duty of thus classifying and arranging the information collected under the census bill, and of laying it, together with a plan for its publication, before us, has not yet been performed. Until that shall have been done, we have nothing to act upon for the purpose of printing. There is nothing to print.

2d. The Senator is equally mistaken as to the functions and powers of the Committee on Printing. The powers of that committee, like those of all our other committees, are properly limited to making reports and recommendations. In the matter of ordering documents to be printed, its action is, in no case, final. A motion to print is made in the Senate, and then referred to the committee. This is followed by a report from the committee, which is only a recommendation which the Senate can adopt or reject at its pleasure; and it is well known that they not unfre-quently do reject these recommendations. As a general practice, I admit, the reports from the Committee on Printing are adopted; but there have been many instances of rejection, and still more of modification. Certain it is that the action of the committee is, in no such case, final.

Mr. BRIGHT. I desire to make one remark to correct the Senator from Arkansas. I was not mistaken in saying that the census, as taken under the present heads, is in conformity with the directions of Congress. I think the Senator himself is mistaken in having mistaken me. I stated that the report made by the Census Board was adopted, to be sure with alterations, by Congress subsequently; but the recommendations made by Congress, correcting the report of that Board, have been adopted and followed by the Superintendent of the Census. It is in pursuance of corrections made by the Senate that the census has been taken and prepared, and it is now ready for delivery. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAVIS] can correct me if I am mistaken.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Pres—

Mr. BORLAND. Will the Senator permit me to make a single remark?

Mr. DAVIS. Certainly.

Mr. BORLAND. I will admit that the Superintendent of the Census has followed the general plan prescribed in the census bill for taking the census. But in the remarks I just now made I did not allude to that part of his duty; I was speaking of his other duty, required by the law, to classify and arrange the information collected, and prepare and lay before us a plan for its publication. I repeat, the census bill requires this last-named duty of him, and its due performance is an indispensable preliminary to our action upon the question of printing. We are not to print and throw out to the public the enormous and crude mass of matter made up of all the returns of all the marshals in the form in which it has been received at the Census Office. Why, sir, if we were so unwise as to undertake such a work as that, it would be difficult to estimate its cost in dollars and cents, and equally difficult, perhaps, to find room in the Capitol for the books after they were printed. I feel quite sure this Chamber is not large enough to contain them. But the proper course alike for the Superintendent of Census and for us, is plainly and imperatively marked out by the law: He shall classify and arrange the information, and then lay his plan for its publication before us; and it becomes our duty, after adopting, modifying, or substituting that plan, to order the printing in accordance with the plan agreed upon. Any plan to be adopted must of course embrace such a condensation and digest of the whole mass of information as to bring it within a compendious and practicable compass for printing.

Mr. DAVIS. I do not think it is very important to go into the history of the bill under which the census was taken, though I apprehend that both the gentlemen, especially the Senator who brings forward this resolution, are under some mistake about it. The truth is, that the Census Board, as it is termed, was directed by Congress to make a set of tables; but when Congress assembled, no set of tables was laid before them. They, however, appointed a special committee to enter upon this subject. That committee had accomplished nearly all their labors before any official report was made at all, and then a very large portion of their work, as my friend knows, was incorporated into the report of this very board. That is the history of those tables. They came in an unofficial form that had been worked out by a number of individuals who had been employed upon that subject. They contained information of very great value. They were of very great importance, but at the same time they were not officially laid before us. It was upon them that the tables were finally built up mainly and chiefly by the committee. But that is not of any importance. It was sufficiently discussed at the last Congress.

Mr. President, I had supposed when the discussion upon this subject first commenced, when this topic was first brought before the Senate, that there was in preparation—indeed, I had seen it announced in the newspapers that there was in preparation—a condensation of the statistics for the State of Maryland, which was to be laid before Congress as a specimen of the method of the preparation, which would be followed out with the residue of the States and Territories. It has been so said since the subject has been under consideration here. Well, sir, it is quite necessary that this vast mass of matter, which I suppose goes into the Census Office by cart-loads, should be condensed with great judgment and good sense, and reduced to some practical size, so that it can be brought into print without incurring any very enormous expense to do it, and into a form that will be useful to the public. On that hangs all the value of this immense undertaking of collecting statistics of population, &c. I do not know to what the expense of all this will sum up, but I suppose it will be from one to two and a half millions of dollars. My honorable friend from Connecticut says that it will be somewhere between seventeen and eighteen hundred thousand dollars. I speak of the expense of taking the census. I mean to say, that this information is acquired by the payment of a vast sum of money. It is either valuable or ought to be valuable. And, sir, when we are undertaking to arrange this matter so as to spread it before the public in a form that will make it accessible, I really think we ought to understand what we are about to do. Now, I would ask the Senator who takes the lead in this business, where is that account of the State of Maryland which was proposed to be laid before us?

Mr. BRIGHT. I have a copy.

Mr. DAVIS. I have not seen it on my table. It has not been communicated in any form that I have seen.

Mr. BRIGHT. I will answer the Senator. I obtained a copy only by applying at the office for it, for the purpose of information. I obtained it as a sample to show the size of the work, and what would be the probable cost of it. I did not bring all which relates to the State of Maryland.

Mr. DAVIS. The Senator says he has been favored with a part of it. We all want to see it. We all desire to see the plan, to see what the Superintendent of the Census proposes to do with the information which has been collected. After we have seen his plan and arrangement in regard to Maryland, we can form some opinion as to what will be the size of the work; whether the arrangement of the work is judicious; whether it is thrown into a form which will be most useful; or whether it is capable of improvement. If it is capable of improvement, the improvement ought to be made. Gentlemen ought to have an opportunity of seeing it. They ought to have an opportunity of examining it; and when they have done that, they can act understandingly on the subject, and not before, in my opinion. The act itself, as has been justly said by the Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. BORLAND,] provides that such an arrangement, when made, should be reported to this body. It ought to have been done long ago. We cannot act understandingly upon the business until we see what the plan of operations is—until we can comprehend what is to be done.

Well, it is said that the statistics of each State, and of each county, and for aught I know, of each town, are to be preceded by a succinct history of the State and county. Now, if I do not misjudge, this is entirely out of place. It does not belong to statistics. It is no part of the object of Congress to publish a history of the country. It is to publish the figures with such explanations as will enable the reader to understand them. That is all. And of what importance is it to know whether a county exists, when it was first laid out, and when it was divided or subdivided? Of what importance is that? All that information can be obtained elsewhere with great ease. It belongs to other parts of history. It does not belong to statistics. Moreover, it is likely that by a process of that sort you will swell this work to a very inordinate size, at a very enormous expense; for it is carried on, as every one concedes, with an enormous expenditure. Then why should we trouble ourselves with this? Why not bring these tables down to the smallest possible compass, with an arrangement lucid in its character, and which should give the facts. That is what we want. We want a tabular statement; we want accuracy; we want a clear and succinct method of doing it; and that is what we desire. We do not want history.

I did not wish to say one word about this matter; but when I am called on to vote without proper information before me, I must say that I feel extremely embarrassed in giving my vote. I do not know what I am to vote for. I do not see the plan of operations. I am not able to comprehend what is to be the size and magnitude of the work. If there is anything in the suggestion which has been thrown out—I trust there is not, I am not prepared to believe it—that there is a purpose of making a job of this, it will be easy to swell it out with historical matter, as to towns and counties and States. If this is a job to be paid for by the page or by the em, by a rule which pays them according to the proportionate magnitude of the work, there will be an inducement to swell it out. Under these circumstances, I think it very clear that we ought to understand at least something about the limits of this work; something about the extent to which it is to run, in all human probability. If we have laid before us the sample of a State which exhibits the method complete, then we can form a pretty good opinion when that comes to be run through the whole Union.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, I think it must strike everybody that there is great wisdom in the suggestions which have been made by the Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. BORLAND,] and by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAVIS.] We are yet in the dark, and cannot know what we are doing until we have a sample of what is proposed to be done by the Superintendent of the Census. I understand, from the suggestions which have been made, that there is to accompany that which is, correctly speaking, the census, a historical account not only of the States, but of the counties, and perhaps of the towns in the States. I need not tell you, Mr. President, and I need not tell the Senate, that this must necessarily be very inaccurate, and but very little calculated to promote a knowledge of the condition of the country. We have seen gazetteers of several States, prepared by persons who have taken the utmost pains to ascertain the historical facts in relation to the States, and in relation to the counties, and yet we know how inaccurate all these gazetteers are, and how little of accurate history they really contain.

As has been remarked by the Senator from Massachusetts, it does seem to me that we are departing entirely from what ought to be the object of Congress in making an enumeration of the population and of those things which are properly statistical, when we go beyond the population and productions of the country, to give a history, by a gentleman competent to do the work which was originally intended, but, from the extent of the work, necessarily incompetent to give anything like an accurate history of the various States, and counties and towns in the States. I am opposed to this altogether; and before I can vote understandingly on this subject, I must be informed what is proposed. When I see the character of the work that is to be produced, I shall be prepared to say what number of copies I will be ready to vote for, what number of copies I suppose may be distributed with advantage amongst my constituents. But until I know that, I shall be voting in the dark. I therefore think this measure should be postponed for the present, until there is a sample or example of the work presented to the two Houses of Congress, in order that they may know what should be stricken out, and if there be anything that ought to be added, what it should be.

I think that the suggestions made by the honorable Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BORLAND] and the honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAVIS] contained much wisdom; and I hope that the resolution will be postponed, and that the subject will lie over until the sample shall be furnished which will enable us to vote understandingly. I repeat here that I am entirely opposed to a history gotten up in this way; for it must necessarily be a mass of trash. It is utterly impossible that a gentleman, however qualified he may be to write a history, if he had the time necessary, can give a correct history of all the States in this Confederacy, and of all the counties in those States, in the short time which has transpired since the taking of the census.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate but a very few moments. I have just had placed in my hands what purports to be a part of this work, as prepared at the Census Bureau. It appears to be the census returns for a part of the State of Maryland. It was the first knowledge I had that the head of our Census Bureau had turned historian. It was the first knowledge I had that the law we passed contemplated any such thing. Indeed the law does not contemplate any such thing. It neither contemplates such a thing, nor can you draw from it that power by any possible deduction. My friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRODHEAD] suggests that a twenty-four horse power might possibly draw it. I doubt it very much. I have turned to the law for the purpose of seeing what the law was, and comparing it with the thing which they have presented to us here for our action. The law is very plain and very clear. It prescribes, first, the duties of the marshals, and what they shall do; what information they shall collect and return to the Secretary; and then the section concludes by saying, "and further, as the returns are so made out, to cause the same to be classified and arranged in the best and most convenient manner for use, and lay the same before Congress at the next session thereof."

Is there any power given there by which this Bureau was authorized to become an Historical Bureau? I know not how it may be with other Senators here, but I should regret exceedingly to see any one individual, however qualified he might deem himself for the task, make an attempt to condense the history of all the States. I know of no individual connected with that Bureau, with whom I would intrust that power, or the duty of condensing the history of the State from which I come. Who is there there who knows intimately of its great and extended commerce? Who is there there prepared to enter into those details that we should deem essential in our own State, and which would be necessary to do justice to the State, if they are to be sent broadcast over this land, and sent to other countries? Why, it is a monstrous stretch of power; and it is a key which shows why they have had a hundred and sixty clerks employed in that Bureau—a number truly astonishing—employed for the purpose of compiling the statistics that were returned by the marshals.

How accurate the History of Maryland may be I know not. I presume it is well written, but I have not read it, and do not mean to express an opinion. I am not qualified to judge of its correctness. But I do say, that I am unwilling, as one of the Representatives of one of the States, to intrust that power, or that duty, to these men. Besides that, I do not believe that it is properly connected with the work. Congress asked for no such thing in the law, and I do not believe they will either ask or accept of it now. Why we have been accused already of turning book-makers; and now comes the next phase, and we are turning historians. We are to publish the history of the States, if this plan is to be carried out. And more than this, we are to publish the history of counties; and we will next get down to the history of municipal corporations. We want this work; and we want to make it valuable. Valuable it may be made, from the information contained in the returns.

I do not know what may be the views of other gentlemen with whom I am associated in the Committee on Printing; but this I do know—and I think it my duty frankly to express it to the Senate—if the duty, if the burden, is wrongfully placed on me, of making this contract, I say here in my place, that I will contract for printing no such matter, unless I am directed in express terms by the Senate to do so. If the Senate should deem it advisable to convert this body, or any of the committees under it, into historical bureaus, they may do so; and it will be my duty to act in obedience to their directions.

I have the sample of the Census of the State of Maryland before me. The returns of the State of Maryland, which are comprised in this sample, make twenty-eight pages.

Mr. BUTLER. That is only half of it.

Mr. HAMLIN. There are twenty-eight pages in it, as I said; but these twenty-eight pages only contain one half of the returns of the State. Twenty-one pages of these twenty-eight—more than two thirds—are devoted to the historical account, to which I have already alluded. If twenty-one pages are to be appropriated to the historical account of each State—and Maryland, at least, may be assumed to be a medium State—we would have some six or seven hundred pages of historical matter connected with the census returns.

Several SENATORS named a larger number of pages.

Mr. HAMLIN. I am not very ready in figures, but gentlemen can easily calculate it by multiplying twenty-one by thirty-one.

Mr. BUTLER. What the Senator speaks of are only one half of the returns of the State of Maryland.

Mr. HAMLIN. I am aware of that, but I judge from the appearance of that half that the concluding portion of it will be appropriate, to wit: the tables which show the population, and the various products of the industry of the State.

It might have been well, when the census was first taken, to have confined it simply to an enumeration of the people; but the law for taking the census has already been passed, and I am not, at least, for transcending that law: I am not for going beyond that. Taking the State of Maryland as a State which will average with all the States, old and new, large and small, we shall have a work which will contain some six or seven hundred pages of historical matter. I saw in the outset of this resolution, as soon as it was presented, that it would meet with these various objections, and I have deemed it advisable to say, that my view of the subject would lead the committee, appropriately, to exclude all that part relating to the history of the States and counties from any contract which they might make, and I shall so act unless the Senate shall express a different opinion, or otherwise direct.

Mr. PEARCE. Mr. President, I think the remarks which have fallen from the honorable Senator from Arkansas, and from other gentlemen, most abundantly satisfy the Senate that this discussion is premature, and that the resolution itself is premature. We really do not know what is the matter upon which we are now proposing to act. If the Senate would have a little patience; if they would wait some two or three weeks, they would be furnished with a sample of the work as the Superintendent of the Census proposes to have it done. I understand that he has prepared the returns of the State of Maryland, and that they are now in press, and are expected to be furnished to the Senate in the course of two or three weeks. When we get these returns, which will furnish a sample of the whole work, we shall understand what is his plan; and we shall not understand what his plan is until we get those returns. It is true that a brief historical sketch preceded the returns of each county. It may be true that the Senate may approve of the historical sketch; perhaps they will reject it. If they decide to reject it when they receive the returns of Maryland, nothing will be easier than to say that we disapprove of this historical sketch, and then the Superintendent of the Census may save himself the labor of making other historical sketches. In justice to the Superintendent of the Census, I must say that these historical sketches are very brief; and whether useful or not, they do not seem likely to fill such an enormous amount of space as the Senator from Maine supposes. It may not be desirable to publish them, but the calculation of the Superintendent of the Census is, that with all the historical sketches and tables, the returns will not exceed, at the utmost, two or three volumes of the size of the "American Archives." That is his calculation. But if the Senate will wait two or three weeks, until they get the sample which is being prepared, which will show what the work will be if his plan is adopted, they can have before them the information which the law contemplated. This sample is the report called for by the law. When the Senate get it, they can act understandingly. Until they do get it, they cannot act understandingly. I think it proper, therefore, to postpone the subject for two or three weeks; and I now move that the further consideration of this resolution be postponed until this day three weeks.

Mr. BUTLER. I was on the Census Committee at the last Congress, and I desire, therefore, to say a few words now. I did not hear all that was said by the Senator from Massachusetts. I have no doubt he gave a fair view of the difficulties of the subject. This is an exemplification of what I said at the time the census bill was before the Senate. I said at that time, that in my deliberate judgment, the act went beyond the scope of the Constitution. I say that the act under which the marshals have made their returns to the Superintendent of the Census, brought matters within the operation of the census which were never contemplated by the Constitution itself. I said then, that the Constitution provided that a census should be taken. What is comprehended under the word "Census?" Why, an enumeration of the population. For what purpose? To enable Congress to regulate the representation of the different portions of the Confederacy. It was also intimated, perhaps, that it might legitimately fall within the scope of such an agency to take also an estimate of property, real and personal. To that extent I was willing to go. But the act went further. It required a species of information, rather to satisfy the curious than to comply with the strict requisitions of the Constitution.

This is history, it is said. It must be regarded, according to my notions, as of the same kind of information as that to which I have just alluded. And how does it come before the Senate? We supposed that in the act which we passed for taking the census, we imposed legislative sanctions, by which the information there provided for should alone be collected. But after the act was passed, I suppose, this Superintendent of the Census, or somebody else, wrote to the marshals, voluntarily, requiring them to become historians as far as regards collecting certain materials of the history of their own counties and districts. Who, then, is to be the historian? The Superintendent himself, taking these materials and making a book of them?

I have heretofore regarded the office of a historian as one of the very highest importance, requiring a rare combination of industry, talents, and judgment; and, above all, a degree of deliberation, and extreme impartiality, and honesty in reviewing all the incidents and materials put before his mind. And here we are now proposing to add, after what has been provided by the act, a book of about fifteen hundred pages at least, composed of historical matter.

I agree with my friend from Maryland that we ought not to act upon this subject without having a sample before us. But if we leave it to the Secretary of the Interior, to the Superintendent of the Census, or to any committee of the body, we do so blindly, on faith, when they may do what perhaps we might reject. If we had committed it to the Secretary of the Interior, and he had embraced these matters, we see what an abuse it might have been. If we had committed it to the Committee on Printing, they might have undertaken to have added these as an appendix to what the law requires, and that would have been an abuse. We cannot intelligently legislate on this subject, without having before us some sample of what is to be printed; and I would be prepared to strike out rather than to add, for I think we have required a great deal of curious information to be collected under the act not contemplated by the Constitution, much of which ought to be stricken out. I shall vote, therefore, to postpone, with a very clear view of the subject in connection with what I had of it before.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. President, I desire now merely to call attention to the language of the law, to which I have several times referred.

First, however, I would correct the misunderstanding into which I find some of my friends have fallen, as to what I said of the manner in which the Superintendent of the Census has performed his duty in having the census taken. I was understood by some to indorse the manner in which he has performed that duty—to say that he had done so in strict conformity with the law. In this I was misunderstood. What I intended to say—and what I think I did say—was, that I was willing to admit, and had no reason to doubt, that he had so performed that part of his duty. Whether he has so performed the duty or not, I have no means of knowing, for I have not seen the work. I based my admission in his favor, to that extent, upon the opinion—the correctness of which I have no reason to doubt—that he is a gentleman of intelligence and integrity, who would do his duty under the law.

But to the main purpose for which I rose. I said, and repeat, that, in my opinion, this whole movement for having the printing of the census undertaken at this time is premature, and not only not in conformity with the law, but in derogation of it. I hold that law in my hand, and find this subject disposed of in the nineteenth section.

After prescribing the general duties of the Superintendent for taking the Census, and receiving the marshal's returns, it holds this language:

"And, further, as the returns are so made, to cause the same to be classified and arranged in the best and most convenient manner for use, and lay the same before Congress at the next session thereof."

Now, sir, this duty of the Superintendent has not been performed—his plan, as required by the law, has not been laid before us. We have not the matter before us which the law requires we should have before we act, and without which, in the very nature of things, we cannot make our action either sensible, practical, or useful.

This, if it were needed, would be placed in a clearer and stronger light, by quoting another and subsequent passage of the same section of the law, providing directly and specifically for this very printing. I will read it, from the Proviso, at the close of the section:

"The blanks and preparatory printing for taking the Census shall be prepared and executed under the direction of the Census Board; the other printing to be executed as Congress shall direct."

How can we execute this provision of the law—how direct this printing to be done, unless we know what, and how much is to be done? The work we are now asked to have done, is not before us, and has never been here—indeed, it has no existence anywhere; for, remember, it is the "plan" of publication upon which we are to act, and in regard to which we are to give our "direction." It is certainly our duty, then, I think, to postpone all action upon the question until we have something to act upon.

Mr. DAVIS. If the gentleman will allow me, I will recall one fact to his mind. In the original Census bill, as reported by the committee, there was a provision for printing the census returns. When the subject came to be discussed, it was found that there was so much difficulty attending the making of a provision by anticipation, that by common consent that provision was stricken out and there was substituted for it a clause that Congress should provide for the printing of the returns. It was said "We will wait until we see the returns before we make any order as to printing them."

Mr. BORLAND. The Senator from Massachusetts is correct in his recollection. I thank him for the suggestion. It was said that as we differed so much about the details of the general plan for taking the census—as the Census Board, the Census Committee, and the Senate each entertained different opinions on subjects which in all their parts were before us, we would, indeed, be acting unwisely to prescribe what should be done in matters of which we had, and then could have no knowledge whatever. So we reserved this final action to future discretion, when the only proper basis for correct action, the matter to be acted upon, should be fully and intelligibly before us. Certainly, no one, then, entertained the idea that the disposal of the main and most important point in this whole matter, that upon which the value of all the work depended, and the disposal of which we so carefully guarded, was to be left to the discretion of a single individual, no matter what might be his qualifications. The law which, after protracted discussion, and the most careful revision, we then passed, reserved this final action to ourselves, and, in my opinion, wisely so reserved it. That law, also, prescribed the basis of our action—a basis which all must admit to be indispensable to useful action, and there I think it ought to rest, and so far as my vote will influence the decision, it shall rest.

Mr. ATCHISON. Mr. President, it is my intention to move to lay this resolution on the table to effect the object intended to be effected by the Senator from Maryland, that this matter may be postponed until it shall be ascertained what it is we are to print. It is the opinion of the Senator from Maryland, and it seems to be the opinion of other gentlemen, that perhaps in two or three weeks this may be effected. Now, by laying the subject on the table, we will have a test question on whether it shall be postponed or not—not for the purpose of finally disposing of the resolution, but that it may lie on the table until the information referred to shall be received; and then any gentleman can move to take it up. I move to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. BRADBURY. If the Senator will withdraw the motion, I will renew it.

Mr. ATCHISON. I withdraw it.

Mr. BRADBURY. I understand the object of postponement to be that we may have an opportunity of examining the historical part of the document which is being prepared. The original act specifies with sufficient distinctness what is the duty of the Census Board. For one, I am totally opposed to going beyond what that act requires, and publishing anything more than that act made necessary. It has already been stated by a member of the Committee on Printing that he should not regard it as his duty to contract for the publication of any of the historical part of the work which is said to be prepared. He stated that he regarded it as no part of the census, and as having no necessary connection with the tables which should be published. I think that is the general opinion of the Senate. It is for that purpose that I am prepared to vote for the original resolution authorizing this committee to contract for the publication of the census.

I really think that it is magnifying the labor of the clerks in the Census Bureau who have undertaken, as a work of supererogation, to turn historians, that we should delay for a fortnight or three weeks in order to examine their history, and see whether we will embody it in the census returns. For one, I am totally opposed to it, and I do not think we need any delay for that purpose. I hope, therefore, that the motion, which I shall feel bound to renew, of the honorable Senator from Missouri, will not prevail, but that we shall get rid of this subject to-night. We wish to publish the census, and we wish to have the printing well done. Competent men are prepared to contract, and it is proposed that a committee, in whom we can repose confidence, shall contract with them, provided they can do it on fair terms. I see no difficulty, then, in the way of the adoption of the resolution at once. It seems to me that we shall only magnify a trifling matter by attempting to postpone our action to a future day. Time enough has already been occupied in debate on this question. We have seen resolutions of equal importance, involving an equal amount of expenditure, passed almost without debate. I presume that every Senator has made up his mind, and that we can act now as well as at any time. The difficulty that has arisen in the minds of Senators has arisen in consequence of the suggestion that the Census Bureau have gone beyond the requirements of the law, and have undertaken to give a historical detail of the States, the counties in the States, and perhaps the towns. Inasmuch as we shall not probably desire to embrace any such information in the census returns, I think we may as well act on the resolution now. According to promise, I renew the motion of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. BRIGHT. I hope the Senator will withdraw his motion, and I will renew it if he requests it.

Mr. ATCHISON. I made the motion for the purpose of getting rid of debate, but I withdraw the motion to accommodate the honorable Senator from Indiana.

Mr. BRIGHT. I find that this proposition is greatly embarrassed by a collateral question which has really nothing to do with it. This resolution is couched in very plain language. It directs the Committee on Printing to perform a certain duty—that duty is pointed out by a previous law. A previous law of Congress prescribes that a census of the inhabitants of the United States shall be taken in a certain way—that certain statistics shall be collected under proper heads, and arranged and classified. This resolution merely contemplates that the Committee on Printing be directed to contract for the printing of this work. It now appears that the Board who have been charged with the duty of preparing these tables have added some extraneous matter. This question is embarrassed by the consideration whether this extraneous historical matter shall be printed. My impression is that Senators greatly magnify the amount of this printing; but I do not wish, by any act of mine, to seek to force gentlemen to vote without having an opportunity of understanding the question in all its parts; and as the mover of the original resolution I am willing to accept the motion of the honorable Senator from Maryland to postpone its further consideration until this day three weeks, to give Senators an opportunity of looking into the matter.

Mr. PEARCE. The motion submitted by me was to postpone the further consideration of this resolution until this day three weeks.

Mr. BRIGHT. Let it be made the special order for one o'clock that day.

Mr. PEARCE. I modify my motion so as to include that.

The motion was agreed to, and the resolution was postponed and made the special order for Tuesday, February 3d, proximo.

On motion, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, January 13, 1852.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Mr. MORGAN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

On motion by Mr. DUNCAN, leave was granted to withdraw from the files, for the purpose of transmitting to the office of the Commissioner of Pensions, the petition and papers in the case of Hector Brown.

On motion by Mr. SIBLEY, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of Charles Curceno be withdrawn from the files of the House and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CLARK. I rise to ask the unanimous consent of the House to suffer the call of the States to proceed from the point where it ceased yesterday. It must be well known to gentlemen that there are many bills and resolutions to be introduced, and they cannot be introduced by right, except on resolution day, which does not occur again for two weeks. I trust the States will be called.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. If the House will consent to do what they did on Friday morning—that is, allow the States to be now called for resolutions as they would have been in order under the rules on Wednesday last, all these bills can be introduced.

The SPEAKER. Is it the pleasure of the House that this course shall be taken?

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I call for the regular order of the day.

On motion by Mr. CULLOM, leave was granted to withdraw from the files of the House, for the purpose of laying them before the proper Department, the petition and papers in the case of John Ditty and Joseph Hadaway.

[Mr. BARRERE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported as correctly enrolled the joint resolution for the transportation of the United States mail in California and Oregon; and it was then signed by the Speaker.]

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. HOUSTON, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill making appropriation for the support of the Military Academy for the year ending the 30th June, 1853; which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MACE, from the Committee of Claims, reported a bill for the relief of William Greer; which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and made the order of the day for to-morrow, and, with the report accompanying, ordered to be printed.

Mr. MACE, from the Committee of Claims, made an adverse report on the petition of J. C. Linn for damages for injuries sustained by the conduct of certain United States troops; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

On motion by Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York, the Committee on Commerce was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Lewis H. Bates and William Lacon, asking to be indemnified for losses sustained by them in consequence of a legal seizure of a quantity of iron imported by them, and that it be referred to the Committee of Claims.

On motion by Mr. SEYMOUR, the Committee on Commerce was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of William H. Topping, praying for compensation as clerk to take testimony in relation to the New York custom-house, and it was referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. SEYMOUR, from the Committee on Commerce, made an adverse report on the petition of William D. Allen and others, praying Congress to make suitable provision for extending a telegraph line from Fort Independence to the Pacific; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. FULLER, of Maine, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back, with an amendment and with a recommendation that it do pass, House bill No. 23, to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the carriage of passengers in merchant vessels," approved February 23, 1847, and "An act to provide for ventilating passenger vessels," approved May 17, 1848; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. F., also, from the same committee, reported the following bills, which were severally read a first and second time by their titles, referred to a committee of the Whole House, and made the order of the day for to-morrow, and, with the reports accompanying, ordered to be printed, viz:

A bill for the relief of Williams, Staples Williams; and

A bill for the relief of James Ferguson, the surviving partner of Ferguson & Milhardo.

On motion by Mr. WALSH, the Committee on Commerce was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of John McKee and Henry Lelf, asking for indemnity for losses sustained by the illegal seizure of the barque "Mary Teresa;" and it was referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. HALL, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported a bill further to extend the time for locating Virginia military land warrants, and returning surveys thereon to the General Land Office; which was read a first and second time by its title.

Mr. HALL moved that the bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and that it be printed.

Mr. STANTON, of Ohio. I desire to say something against the bill when it comes up for consideration.

Mr. TAYLOR. That bill relates to an unsurveyed tract of country in the district which I have the honor to represent, and I would inquire if it is not in order now to have it put upon its passage?

The SPEAKER. It will be in the power of the House to order that it be engrossed and read a third time. The first question will be upon committing it.

Mr. TAYLOR. Is it in order to submit any remarks upon the bill?

The SPEAKER. Remarks are in order upon the propriety of referring the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. TAYLOR. The object of that bill is to extend the time of locating Virginia land warrants in the district of country commonly known as the Virginia military lands. The time for locating those lands having expired upon the first day of this month, the Virginia military land office in the city of Chillicothe is closed against the entering of lands in that district, until such a bill as the present may pass. I can see no objection to the passage of the bill immediately. I will not detain the House many minutes upon the subject. But my colleague has some objection to the bill, which may be as well presented now as at any other time. It is simply a question of time for locating these warrants, two or three years—similar bills having passed this House for the last eight or ten years, with a view of closing that office. It is a singular fact, that in Ohio the only unsurveyed lands in the State are within this military district, being about eighty-five thousand acres. It is impossible to survey, locate, or appropriate them by the holders of warrants, unless we pass such a bill as this. I can see no objection to extending the time. Certainly the interests of the State of Ohio, as every other section of the country interested in these Virginia military warrants, require that this office should be kept open. We have a Surveyor General who was appointed by President —, and who keeps an office in Chillicothe, where the original records of the Virginia military district in Ohio are preserved. I do not suppose that it is the desire of my colleague to shut up that office, and prevent the location of eighty-five thousand acres of land yet unsurveyed; and I hope the House will pass the bill. I can see no impropriety in it. Congress has repeatedly had the subject under its consideration; and so far as I know, no objection has been made to extending the time. I may be asked; why I wish the time to be extended? It is because I wish the surveys to progress, that this vacant land may be entered, and to stimulate the holders of warrants to locate them speedily, so that this Virginia military district may be surveyed and settled. The time has been extended for two years at a time by several acts of Congress, all of which have now expired, and I merely ask that it may be again extended. I ask that the bill be now put upon its passage, and I hope that it will pass.

Mr. RICHARDSON. There are a number of other gentlemen who desire to make reports from committees, and as this is an important bill, and one likely to give rise to much discussion, I move the previous question.

Mr. STANTON, of Ohio. I hope the gentleman from Illinois does not intend to force this bill through under the operation of the previous question.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I want to send it to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, where it can be fully debated.

Mr. STANTON. I have no objection to its commitment. The question being taken on seconding the demand for the previous question, there were—ayes 82, noes 6—no quorum voting.

Mr. RICHARDSON demanded tellers; which were ordered, and Messrs. TAYLOR and SAVAGE appointed.

Mr. TAYLOR inquired of the Chair, what would be the effect of the previous question?

The SPEAKER stated that the effect would be to bring the House to a vote, first upon the motion to refer, and then—in case of the motion to refer, being negatived—upon the engrossment of the bill.

The question was then taken, and it was decided in the affirmative—ayes 120, noes not counted.

So the previous question received a second.

The main question was then ordered, which was upon the motion to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and order it to be printed.

The question was taken and it was decided in the affirmative—ayes 106, noes not counted.

So the bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. McLANAHAN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back a bill "authorizing the payment of interest to the State of New Hampshire for advances made for the use and benefit of the United States in repelling invasion and suppressing insurrection at Indian Stream in said State," with an amendment and recommendation that the bill do pass.

Mr. McL. moved that the bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole House, made the order of the day for to-morrow, and be printed.

Mr. STUART. It seems to me that that bill would go more appropriately to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. I move that it be so referred.

Mr. McLANAHAN. The reference of a similar bill was made last session to the Committee of the Whole House. This is a claim of very great merit, and one that should receive the action of the House at as early a day as possible.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I would inquire of the gentleman from Pennsylvania if that bill does not make an appropriation, and is not a general bill to pay money to one of the States? Now, a bill of that kind is never treated as a private claim and sent to the Committee of the Whole House, but is sent to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, where the largest latitude of debate is allowed.

Mr. McLANAHAN. In reply to the gentleman from Tennessee, I will inform the House that this is in the nature of a private claim, and that the bill and report are therefore properly referable to the Committee of the Whole House. It is not a public or general claim, but it is a claim set up in equity and justice against the United States for the payment of a certain sum to the State of New Hampshire for military services rendered by her. Similar claims have been allowed to other States, and I believe that in every instance the reference has been to the Committee of the Whole House. This bill was reported at the last session of Congress, but failed to be acted on for want of sufficient time. I think that under the rules, as well as the precedents, the motion that I make is the legitimate and proper one, and I hope that it will be adopted by the House.

Mr. RICHARDSON. As this matter is going to lead to debate, I move the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

The SPEAKER stated that the question would first be taken upon the motion to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. COBB asked for the reading of the bill.

Several MEMBERS objected.

The question was then taken, and there were—ayes 62, noes 48—no quorum voting.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky, demanded tellers; which were ordered, and Messrs. PENN and WALLACE appointed.

The question being again taken, it was decided in the negative—ayes 39, noes 19.

So the House refused to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The question recurring on the motion to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole House, it was taken and agreed to.

So the bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole House, made the order of the day for tomorrow, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. McLANAHAN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back, with an amendment, the bill "to change the time for holding the district courts of the United States in the western district of Virginia, and for other purposes;" which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MEADE, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported the following resolution; which was considered and agreed to, viz:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary inquire into the expediency of providing by law for a revision and compilation of the laws of the United States of a general nature, and for embodying in a separate volume the laws relating to the District of Columbia.

Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back House bill No. 16, "to regulate the publication of the laws of the United States, and of the public advertisements," with a recommendation that it do not pass.

Mr. STUART. That bill was introduced by a gentleman from Maine, who is confined to his room by indisposition. I hope that no action will be taken on it until he is able to be in his seat.

There being no objection, the bill was laid upon the Speaker's table.

Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back House bill No. 17, to prohibit the prosecution of claims against the Government by the Heads of Departments, and Senators and Representatives in Congress during the terms of their respective offices, with an amendment as a substitute for the bill.

Mr. H. moved that the bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and that the bill and amendment be printed; which motion was agreed to.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky, from the Committee on the Judiciary, made an adverse report on the petition of Mrs. Susan T. Randall, widow of the late district judge of Pennsylvania, asking for remuneration for certain services of her husband, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill to amend an act entitled "An act for the punishment of crime in the District of Columbia," reported back the same with an amendment and a recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was read.

Mr. MARSHALL. The amendment proposed by the committee is simply to insert the words "or outhouse." I will state to the House that as the law of this District now stands, there is no penalty attached to the burning of an outhouse, unless there is merchandise, grain, or hay in it, at the time it is consumed. For instance, if a painter's shop is burned in the District of Columbia, with whatever intention, the offence is not punishable under the existing law.

The amendment of the law proposed by this bill, is merely intended to embrace that case, and to render the willful and malicious burning of an outhouse in which there are no goods, subject to the same penalty as the law attaches to the burning of an outhouse with goods in it. I suppose there is no objection to the bill, and I move, therefore, that it be put upon its passage.

Mr. SACKETT. Would it not be better to insert, after the word "outhouse," the words "or building?" The phraseology, as it now stands, would not include carpenters' shops.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I should suppose "building" would be embraced in the term "house or outhouse?"

Mr. SACKETT. I doubt very much whether that embraces every kind of outhouse. I move to insert after the word "outhouse," the words "or building."

Mr. MARSHALL. I suppose "house or outhouse" would cover every sort of building.

The SPEAKER. The Committee on the Judiciary propose to insert the words "or outhouse" after the word "house."

Mr. McLANAHAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SACKETT] wishes to introduce into this bill a term so indefinite in its meaning, and so comprehensive in its application that it can scarcely find a place in any law or even civil act. The term "building" relates to so many kinds of buildings, and is so perfectly indefinite in its character, that a man might be indicted by it for burning anything in the shape of a building—anything that has been constructed, from a hen-coop up. The words "house," and "outhouse," are those which have a legal signification, long known in the common as well as the statute laws, as interpreted by the decisions of the judges of various States. But, as I have said, the term "building" is so perfectly indefinite in its meaning and so comprehensive in its character that it would be impossible not to indict a man for the burning of any building, however petty in its character. I hope, therefore, the House will not allow the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SACKETT] to be adopted.

Mr. SACKETT. I have no desire to alter the bill so as to extend it in any way beyond the intention of the committee who reported it. I was aware of the defect in the existing laws of the District of Columbia, in relation to the burning of certain unoccupied buildings, and that it was necessary to amend those laws by extending them so as to cover this class of buildings that are not now embraced within it. But the bill as reported to this House, in my opinion, will not entirely remove the difficulty. I think it does not cover such buildings as unoccupied mechanics' shops.

Mr. McLANAHAN. I would ask the gentleman if a mechanic's shop is not embraced in the word "house?" His shop is a house, and if a man were found guilty of setting it on fire he would be convicted.

Mr. SACKETT. I do not know what the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McLANAHAN] may think, or what construction his legal learning may put upon the word "house," but I doubt very much whether an unoccupied mechanic's shop is comprehended in that term. I do not believe it at all; and if it is intended to frame a bill here which shall cover that character of building at all, and sufficiently general in its terms to meet the wants of the community for whom it is to be framed, it must contain terms such as shall cover every class of building that it is necessary to protect.

Now I deny that the term "house" is thus sufficiently comprehensive to embrace every class which should be protected. It does not embrace the class to which I have before alluded—that of unoccupied mechanics' shops—and I think such a building ought to be protected. I am not tenacious as to the particular word to be inserted. If the word "shop," or any other which any gentleman will name, which will be sufficiently comprehensive to cover every class of buildings that need protection is more acceptable, I am satisfied.

I am not aware of the legal signification given to the term "house" which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McLANAHAN] gives it. I am not aware, especially, that in criminal jurisprudence, laws are so construed as to embrace within particular terms objects other than those which are particularly included in those terms. I am not aware of any such construction in criminal law. Upon the other hand, particular terms, such as "house," are used to designate a particular class of buildings, and none other. If this is so, and if the committee intend to embrace the class of buildings to which I have referred, then some more comprehensive term should be used.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I do not wish to detain the House with useless discussion upon this subject. The Committee on the Judiciary think that every building that should be protected will be protected by the term "house or outhouse." The bill, as originally introduced by the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. EVANS,] was drafted by a lawyer of high standing in this city. The committee have enlarged the bill, and have made no other alteration than to enlarge it by the addition of the words "or outhouse;" and they supposed that the class of buildings referred to by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SACKETT] would certainly be embraced by the term "house or outhouse;" and I must say that I do not understand what sort of a building would not be embraced by that term. The law does not provide a penalty for burning a detached shop, if it is not connected with a house. The bill which the committee reported expressly provides a penalty for the burning of that class of buildings. The conclusion which the gentleman from New York expresses upon this subject, I do not think is one which the authorities will bear out. For the purpose of terminating this discussion, however, I call the previous question.

Mr. STUART. I hope the gentleman will withdraw that call for a moment.

Mr. MARSHALL. I cannot withdraw it.

Mr. WALSH. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his call for the previous question. We had better follow the laws of Maryland upon this subject. I have just procured a copy of those laws from the Library.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Virginia. I move to lay the bill upon the table, in order that it may be taken up at some future time, when we may examine it more fully.

Mr. T. subsequently withdrew the motion.

The question now being upon seconding the demand for the previous question,

Mr. GIDDINGS demanded tellers; which were ordered, and Messrs. WALSH, and THOMPSON of Virginia, were appointed.

The question was then taken, and the tellers reported—ayes 80—noes not counted.

So the previous question received a second.

The main question was then ordered to be put, which main question was upon the adoption of the amendment to the amendment.

The question was then taken, and the amendment of Mr. SACKETT, to insert after the words "or outhouse" the words "or building," and it was disagreed to.

The question then recurring upon the adoption of the amendment reported by the committee, and, being taken, it was agreed to.

The question now being, "Shall the bill be engrossed and read a third time?"

Mr. MEADE moved to refer it to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER said that, under the operation of the previous question—which extended to ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time—a motion to refer would not be in order.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and, having been engrossed, it was read a third time.

Mr. STUART asked if it would be in order to move to reconsider the vote just taken, by which the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time?

The SPEAKER said it would be in order.

Mr. STUART. Then I submit that motion; and upon it I wish to offer a word or two. Before doing so, however, I ask that the bill as amended may be read.

The bill was then read.

Mr. STUART. I do not rise for the purpose of discussing the merits of this bill, nor the propriety of the amendment which has been introduced by the Committee on the Judiciary; for unless it be printed or placed in our hands, no profitable discussion in relation to it can be carried on without great difficulty. But, I rise for the purpose of answering the argument of members of that committee. My object in moving this reconsideration, is to have this bill referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and to have it printed, that gentlemen may examine it and be able to reach this very difficulty which these amendments are designed to reach. Now, if the construction of this term "outhouse" is such as is ordinarily given it, certainly no gentleman will pretend that it reaches the difficulty presented in the original bill. The term "outhouse" is settled by authority. As I understand the term, "outhouse" reaches only to such buildings as are pertinent to the main building—which are in the curtilage. It is not an independent building. An independent building, occupied for a different purpose, does not, as I understand it, come within that class of buildings known as outhouses. Now our judicial construction upon acts of this kind, are necessarily very close. The crime of arson is one of the very highest known to our laws, and the most rigid rule of construction is therefore always given to acts of this character. But "outhouse" or "house" being terms well known to criminal law, have necessarily received a settled and definite construction; and they do not, I repeat, reach such independent buildings as a shop, office, store, or any building of that character. I am not by any means prepared to say that this bill does not reach any difficulty which it was intended to cover; but I am prepared to say, and from my knowledge of law I do say, though with deference to every other gentleman upon this floor, that the construction that is sought to be given here to the term "outhouse," will be found not to be sustained by judicial authority. But inasmuch as I am at all times very much averse to occupying the time of this House, and especially so at this time when other committees desire to report, I hope the House will agree to reconsider the order for engrossing this bill, and refer it to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and have it printed, so that we may all read and understand it, and that we may be enabled to do justice not only to this District, but to the whole community, by so perfecting the law that it will reach every offence within its contemplation.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. My object, and, of course, the object of every member of the Committee on the Judiciary, is to cover by law, and by penal law, all classes of offences of which complaint has been made. It is of very little avail to carry on this discussion about the term "outhouse." My opinion is that every building detached from the main building, whether it is in the curtilage or not, is embraced by the term "outhouse." I have had my attention drawn particularly to the matter, but I have no pride of opinion about it. I understand that if we reconsider the vote by which this bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, that it will then be in a condition for amendment, and I suppose the insertion of the word "shop" would settle the matter, and probably cover every species of building which would not be covered by the term "house or outhouse."

Mr. THOMPSON, of Virginia. Would it cover a printing office?

Mr. MARSHALL. I suppose so. I suppose the term "house, outhouse, or shop" would cover a printing office. I trust, however, that inasmuch as this discussion has arisen, that the House will take the matter under its own charge. I hope the reconsideration asked for will be given, and if offences go unpunished while the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union is reaching it, that the House will be ready to take the responsibility of it.

Mr. TUCKER. I rise for the purpose of moving the previous question. But before doing so I wish to say that it seems to be admitted that some additional legislation is necessary for this District, in order to provide the means for bringing criminals to punishment. The proposition has been referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and they have given it their consideration. They have made a report, which was unanimously agreed in, and which was satisfactory to that committee. They propose in a certain manner, and by a certain method, to meet the exigency of the case; and they call for certain action by this House. Now, gentlemen rise here upon the spur of the moment and propose a different course. With all due respect to the gentlemen who have spoken upon this subject, I will not say that it does not comport with my notions of a proper respect to the Committee on the Judiciary, to give to this little bill, so comparatively unimportant, a direction different from that which they have unanimously agreed to recommend. But for myself, I will say that I have no sort of difficulty in supporting by my vote the proposed action of the Committee on the Judiciary. I shall vote against the motion to reconsider. I now move to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

Mr. PARKER, of Pennsylvania. I hope the gentleman will withdraw that motion.

Mr. TUCKER. I would be glad to accommodate the gentleman, but I cannot withdraw it.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I appeal to the gentleman to withdraw.

Mr. PARKER. I am in favor of this new direction—

Mr. TUCKER. The gentleman misunderstood me. I declined to withdraw the motion to lay on the table.

The SPEAKER. Then no further debate can be entertained.

The question was then taken, and the motion to reconsider was laid upon the table.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky, called for the previous question upon the passage of the bill; and, upon a division, there were—ayes 64, noes 36—no quorum voting.

Mr. M. demanded tellers; which were ordered, and Messrs. HARRIS, of Tennessee, and VENABLE were appointed.

The question was then taken, and the tellers reported—ayes 84, noes not counted.

So the previous question received a second, and the main question was ordered to be put; which main question was upon the passage of the bill.

The question was put and the bill was passed.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. BRAGG, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported the following bills, which were severally read a first and second time by their titles, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and made the order of the day for to-morrow; and, with the reports accompanying, ordered to be printed:

A bill for the relief of the executors and heirs of John Fletcher; and

A bill for the relief of James Lewis.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I wish to ask if the morning hour has not expired?

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I move, then, that we proceed to the orders of the day.

The question was then taken, and it was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Reports of committees are still in order.

On motion by Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of John G. Wilkinson, praying compensation for his services as Navy Pension Agent for the years 1836, 1837, and part of the year 1838; and also of the petition of Charles Reeder, praying compensation for services as a member of the Board of Examiners, to make experimental trials of inventions and plans to prevent the explosion of steam-boilers; and that they do lie upon the table.

Mr. S. remarked, that the two several petitions above referred to had been heretofore favorably reported upon by different committees to which they had been referred, but that the House had decided against them; and that the Committee on Naval Affairs were not disposed to revive the discussion of these matters, and therefore had instructed him to ask to be discharged from their further consideration.

Mr. S., from the same committee, also reported a bill for the relief of J. G. Pendergrast, a commander in the United States Navy; which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and made the order of the day for to-morrow, and, with the report accompanying, ordered to be printed.

Mr. GOODENOW, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported a bill for the relief of Hannah Sampson; which was read a first and second time by its title.

Mr. G. If the House will consent, I desire that the bill may now be put upon its passage.

Mr. FICKLIN. Let it be committed.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made, and it cannot be put upon its passage.

The bill was then referred to a Committee of the Whole House, made the order of the day for to-morrow, and, with the report accompanying, ordered to be printed.

Mr. TUCKER, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Peter Winifred Ashby, deceased, praying for arrears of pension, made an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Mr. T. also, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of the heirs of John Jackson; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and made the order of the day for to-morrow, and, with the report accompanying, ordered to be printed.

Mr. BOCOCK, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported two several bills for the relief of Gustavus A. De Russy, and James McCormick, assignee of Robert A. Parker; which were severally read a first and second time by their titles, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, made the special order of the day for to-morrow, and, with the report accompanying, ordered to be printed.

Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, made adverse reports in the following cases; which were ordered to lie upon the table, viz:

In the case of the memorial of Daniel Guérant, praying compensation for injuries received in the military service of the United States; and

In the case of the memorial of Tamza Smith, for relief for expenses incurred in supporting Amos F. Stillson, an officer and soldier in the Army of the United States.

Mr. MARTIN, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, made an adverse report on the petition of Charles H. Pointer, praying compensation as an invalid on account of disability by sickness while in the service of the United States; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. M. also, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of Cornelius Hughes, of Tennessee; which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, made the order of the day for to-morrow, and, with the report accompanying, ordered to be printed.

Mr. JONES, of New York, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, made adverse reports in the following cases; which were ordered to lie upon the table and be printed, viz:

The petition of Thomas Whinney, praying for compensation on account of disability from exposure and fatigue in the military service of the United States during the war of 1812; and

Upon the petition of Elijah Close, praying Congress to grant him a pension for disability occasioned by exposure in the war of 1812.

Mr. J. also, from the same committee, reported the following bills; which were severally read a first and second time by their titles, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and made the order of the day for to-morrow, and, with the reports accompanying, ordered to be printed, viz:

A bill for the relief of Francis Tribeau;

A bill for the relief of James Wright, jr.; and

A bill for the relief of John Kerbaugh.

Mr. EASTMAN, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported a bill for the relief of Ichabod Weymouth; which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and made the order of the day for to-morrow, and, with the report accompanying, ordered to be printed.

Mr. EASTMAN asked the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a bill, of which previous notice had been given; but objection being made, it was not introduced.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Ohio, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported a bill for the relief of John McIntosh; which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and made the special order of the day for to-morrow, and, with the report accompanying, ordered to be printed.

Mr. J. also, from the same committee, made adverse reports in the following cases; which were severally ordered to lie upon the table and be printed, viz:

The petition of Susan M. Sweeny, the widow of Thomas Sweeny, praying to be placed upon the pension rolls, in consequence of the death of her husband by disease contracted while in the military service during the Mexican war;

The petition of Ephraim Sharp, of Dryden, Tompkins county, New York, praying for a pension;

The petition of Jacob Shy, praying for a back pension on account of services in the war of 1812;

The petition of Samuel Butler, praying for a pension on account of disability incurred in the military service of the United States in the war of 1812; and also

The petition of Eliza Merrill, of Bangor, Maine, praying for arrears of pension due James Merrill.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. I am authorized by the Committee on Public Buildings to state, that there is a bill from the Senate now lying upon the Speaker's table, appropriating the sum of twelve hundred dollars for the purpose of fitting up two rooms to be occupied as a library, and for containing the books which shall be purchased with the money which was appropriated for that purpose by a bill passed yesterday. The Committee on Public Buildings are desirous that the bill should be passed immediately, and I am authorized by them to ask the unanimous consent of the House that it may be taken up and acted upon now.

Mr. DUNHAM. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection being made the bill cannot now be taken up.

On motion by Mr. RICHARDSON, the Committee on Territories was discharged from the further consideration of the preamble and resolution of the Legislative Assembly of the State of Iowa, on the subject of compensation to the soldiers and others, while that State was a Territory, for defending the southern boundary of said Territory; and it was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. NEWTON. I ask the consent of the House to withdraw certain papers from the files of the House, for the purpose of returning them to their owners.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I object.

Mr. DUNHAM. Are reports from select committees in order now?

The SPEAKER. They are.

Mr. DUNHAM. Then, sir, I propose to make a report from the select committee to which was referred the joint resolution explanatory of the act of September 28, 1850, entitled "An act granting bounty lands to certain officers and soldiers who were engaged in the military service of the United States," and the subject of amending and extending the bounty land bill. The report is to strike out the original bill that was referred to the committee, and to insert the following as a substitute therefor, viz:

SEC. 1. Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That all certificates or warrants for military bounty lands which have been, or may hereafter be, issued under any law of the United States, and all certificates of valid locations of the same which have been or may hereafter be made, are hereby declared to be assignable by indorsement thereon, and such assignment shall be executed and acknowledged, or proved, in the same manner and with the same formalities that deeds for the conveyance of land are executed and acknowledged, or proved, in the State or Territory where such assignment shall be made.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That from and after the passage of this act, the registers and receivers of the United States land offices shall each be entitled to receive fifty cents for his services in locating each bounty land warrant by him located, to be paid by the person or persons locating the same; but this act shall not be so construed as to allow any register or receiver to receive any greater maximum of salary and fees than by law he is now entitled.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the act of which this act is explanatory, shall be so construed as to include all commissioned and non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates of militia, volunteers and rangers who were mustered into the service of the United States for the suppression or prevention of Indian hostilities, or whose services of that character were recognized and paid by the United States prior to the passage of said act, and who served the length of time required by said act.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That in computing the term of service of the officers and soldiers of militia, volunteers, and rangers, for the purposes of this act, or of the act of which this act is explanatory, such term shall be computed from the time they were mustered into the service of and paid by the United States to the time they were discharged therefrom.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That if any officer or soldier entitled to bounty land under this act or under the act of which this act is explanatory, has died since the passage of said act, or shall hereafter die without having obtained a warrant for the same, leaving a widow, the warrant shall issue to such widow; if no widow, then such warrant shall issue to his minor heirs, if any shall survive him; and if the warrant shall have been issued before his death, then such warrant shall pass to and be vested in his widow, if he shall leave one; and if no widow, then to his minor heirs, if any.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the warrants which have been, or may hereafter be issued, in pursuance of said act, or of this act, may be located upon any lands of the United States subject to private entry at the time of such location.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That the proviso to the second section of the act of which this act is explanatory, be and the same is hereby repealed.

Mr. DUNHAM. Mr. Speaker, I have been directed to report the amendment that has just been read by the majority of the committee. The minority, however, will probably offer another amendment to the bill. The bill will stand, if amended as we propose, so as to make certificates assignable by an assignment upon the warrant in the same manner and under the same restrictions that deeds are required to be executed in the respective States where the warrants are assigned. The object of the committee in making this provision was this: they supposed with such a provision the officers and citizens of the different States would more readily understand what they had to do in making valid assignments of certificates than in any other way. Every public officer of a State understands, or can readily ascertain, what steps he has to take to execute a valid deed; and, consequently, he can take the same steps for the assignment of a land warrant. I apprehend there will be no difficulty in the Department's ascertaining what are the laws in the different States upon the subject. There can be no difficulty upon that score. They can easily inform themselves of the laws of the several States for the proper execution of a deed. No difficulty will arise in the application of these laws to the assignment of warrants.

Mr. TUCK. I rise to a point of order. I am not aware what is the motion before the House.

The SPEAKER. It is upon an amendment proposed by the committee to the original bill referred to them.

Mr. TUCK. I submit whether it is in order to do that, unless there is a motion submitted that the bill be put upon its passage?

The SPEAKER. The question is upon the amendment proposed by the committee. There being no motion to commit the bill, that is the question before the House.

Mr. TUCK. Is it in order to move to commit the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

Mr. DUNHAM. Not until the gentleman gets the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana has the floor.

Mr. DUNHAM. The second section is in reference to the payment of registers and receivers for the location of bounty land warrants. The committee have stricken out this section in the original bill, and propose to provide for the payment of these officers for locating land warrants hereafter. It may be possible that in some of the offices labor has been done for which their fees and salary have not been an adequate compensation; but it was impossible at this time for the committee to inquire into the receipts by registers and receivers throughout the United States to ascertain which had and which had not been sufficiently paid for the services they rendered. We considered it was better to leave those officers individually to prefer their claims to the Government. If their case is meritorious, undoubtedly the Congress of the United States will be disposed to grant relief. But in many of these offices they are not entitled to this privilege. They have in many instances received almost the maximum the law allows them to receive, without any payment whatever for the location of land warrants. In other places they have not received near that amount. It would be a long and tedious investigation to examine into every case to find out whether the officer has received an adequate compensation for his services or not. We did not consider it proper to load down a bill of a general character, as this is, with these individual claims for services rendered—for some of which there was no right of payment. They are left in the same situation as private claims. We provide for the future claims of officers for locating these warrants, that the register and receiver for the location of a warrant receive each fifty cents. That is the fee which they are now entitled to for locating forty acres of land at one per cent. upon the money received by each officer. They now receive, the register one per cent. and the receiver one per cent., which would make for the location of forty acres to each officer fifty cents. I submit to the House that there is no more trouble in the location of one hundred and sixty acres than there is in locating forty acres of land. We, therefore, ought not to pay any more in the one case than in the other. The committee could not conceive why there should be a distinction. The distinction is a reasonable one, if the officer has to take charge of the funds. He there incurs a responsibility, and that responsibility increases with the amount of money received. This cannot apply where lands are located by means of warrants. In this respect the committee have changed the original bill. They make the fee payable in all cases by the person who makes the location, whether he be the original grantee or not. The original bill provides, if the land is entered by the assignee, that the fee should be paid by him, and I apprehend no gentleman will doubt if the land warrant is to be sold and transferred, the transferee has to pay this additional price for locating the warrant. That enters into consideration when he buys the warrant. There can be no propriety in making a distinction in the payment of the fee, when it is located by the original grantee, or by his assignee. If it is located by the assignee, he should be made to pay the fee. I submit to every member of the House whether every business man will not take that into consideration when he buys the warrant from the original grantee, and whether there is any reason in principle or practice why there should be a distinction between the payment of the fee by the person to whom the warrant has been granted or his assignee.

The next section provides for that class of men who are called out for the suppression or prevention of Indian hostilities under the authority of the States, but whose services were recognized and paid for by the United States out of the public Treasury. We thought that this was no more than fair; no more than justice demanded. If for these services they have been paid out of the Treasury, the presumption is that they were valuable to the General Government. There is no reason why, the Government having considered these services of so much advantage as to require at their hands remuneration, they should not be put upon the same footing with persons legitimately called into the service of the United States. In this respect we have not departed to any extent from the original bill.

The fourth section provides that the time of service shall not be computed, as is now done, at the Department, but that in computing the term of service of the officers and soldiers, of militia, volunteers, and rangers, for the purposes of this act, or the act of which this act is explanatory, such term shall be computed from the time they were mustered into the service and paid by the United States to the time they were actually discharged therefrom. The object is to cover all that class of cases. I will give you an instance: In the Black Hawk war rangers were called out for twelve months service. The war closed after they had been in service only thirty days, some sixty and some ninety days; but those troops were kept in active service upon the Indian frontier for the purpose of intimidating the tribes and to keep them in order, for the whole term for which they were enlisted—twelve months. Yet the Department, because the Black Hawk war ceased within thirty, sixty, or ninety days after their enlistment, say they shall only receive a warrant for the time they served in the war.

The fifth section provides for those cases where application is upon file in the Department, and where no warrant has issued, that if any person entitled to bounty land under this act, or under the act of which this act is explanatory, has died, or hereafter shall die, the warrant shall issue to the widow in the first instance upon her application; if no widow, then to the minor heirs, in the same manner as if he had died after obtaining the warrant. It also—

Mr. FICKLIN. With the consent of my friend from Indiana, I wish to make an inquiry. The chairman of the select committee to whom this bill was referred, understands that this fifth section changes the mode of descent and transfers this warrant to the widow, and if there is no widow to the minor heirs. The widow possesses it entirely, and no benefit accrues at all to the minor heirs unless there is no widow.

Mr. DUNHAM. In that respect we follow precisely the original act. In case the soldier died before his warrant has issued, we give the warrant when it does issue, in the same manner as if he had not made his application, to his widow; and if there is no widow, to his minor heirs. If he has made application which has been acted upon, and a warrant issued but not located, and shall thereafter die, the bill provides that the warrant shall first descend to his widow, and then to his minor heirs. If the intention was originally, as the act indicates, to give it first to the soldier, and in case of his death, to his widow, or if there is no widow, to his minor heirs, is there any reason why we should make a distinction between the soldiers who die after the application and before the warrant has issued, and those who die after the warrant has been issued? We all know very well in the Western country, that when you come to divide a land warrant amongst a half-a-dozen heirs in that way, it amounts to nothing. The original intention was to provide for the widow, and then for the minor children, to help her to support and educate them until they arrived at maturity, and able to take care of themselves.

The sixth section of the act provides that the warrants which have been or may hereafter be issued under these acts, may be located upon any lands of the United States subject to private entry. In other words, this section repeals a proviso which we recollect was forced upon Congress with our eyes open, requiring these warrants to be located upon lands then in market. I allude to the proviso which was moved to the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill, by a gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. VINTON,] not now a member of this House.

Mr. LOCKHART. I wish to ask the gentleman whether this sixth section does not violate one of the general land laws—whether it does not permit these warrants to be located upon alternate sections reserved at a double price where lands have been granted to railways and other public improvements?

Mr. DUNHAM. I take it the fair construction of this law would not interfere with that class of lands. They are not embraced in the term "to be subject to private entry." I apprehend when we speak of lands open to private entry, the fair interpretation would be, lands open to private entry at the minimum price. That was the intention of the committee; and if gentlemen think the bill is not sufficiently guarded in that respect, they can amend it.

The seventh section repeals the proviso to the original bill, which prevents members of Congress, who are entitled to bounty land under the late law, and under the Mexican bounty land law, from receiving it. I have given this brief explanation, that the House may be aware of the reasons that led to the adoption of this bill.

Mr. MEADE. If the gentleman will allow me—

Mr. DUNHAM yielded.

Mr. MEADE. To bills of this character, when before the House, it is very inconvenient, if possible, to get amendments in deemed to be essential. I will suggest to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. DUNHAM] some of the defects I consider attached to this bill. In the first place, he has altered the mode by which assignments shall be made and proved, by abrogating the forms recognized by the Department, and requiring these assignments to be authenticated in the same way deeds are authenticated in the State where the holder of the warrant lives. Now, I think it is very likely that in many of the States of this Union, as in my own, it would prevent the sale of the warrants, or at least incumber them with so many difficulties, that the object of this amendment, explanatory to the act passed by Congress, would be entirely defeated. We all know that the mode by which warrants are now assignable is by assignment in blank, and they are certified in the usual way by a notary or magistrate, with the certificate and seal of the clerk of the county in which the party resides. They are passed off into the hand of some attorney, or member of Congress, to sell for the claimant, and when he sells he inserts the name of the assignee. Such an assignment as that in my State, under this provision, would not be a good one, because if the assignment was to be certified and proved in the manner deeds are in my State, it would be necessary for the certified officer there—a justice of the peace, to recite the deed, and in this case to recite the assignment. Now the object for which this law was passed would, in the case of my people, be entirely defeated, or to a great extent. This is one objection to the proposed mode of certifying assignments. I think the mode is now understood through the country; and as they usually attach the form to every warrant issued, it is a better mode of assigning than that proposed by this bill.

Another objection that suggests itself to me is, that it does not provide for cases that may happen.

Mr. BISSELL. I should like to know which of the gentlemen has the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. DUNHAM] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. MEADE. I am only suggesting the amendments the gentleman may make to save the time of the House. I have to notice but one other defect I perceive in this bill. It is this: it provides, that if the warrant shall have issued before the death of the warrantee, then such warrant shall pass to, and be invested, in his widow, if he shall leave one; if no widow, then to his minor heirs. Now suppose a man dies after obtaining his warrant, and leaves no widow and no minor heir, it would seem this bill intends to deprive his general heirs of the warrant in that case.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. That is the intention of the bill.

Mr. MEADE. I hardly suppose the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] understands me. The warrant has been issued; it is in the possession of the claimant; he keeps it for twelve months, or five years, and dies without having assigned it, leaving no widow or infant children—is it intended by this bill that this warrant shall go back to the Government, thus cutting off the general heirs? In that case, by inference, this bill would seem to involve such a result, for it says, if the warrant shall have issued before his death, then such warrant shall pass to, and be invested, in his widow; if no widow, then to his minor heirs. In a majority of cases, they have no widow and minor heirs. Many of these soldiers are so old that all of their children have grown up. In such a case as that, warrants would be dead property, and pass to nobody; but it would appear such a warrant was in existence, and so much land had passed out of the hands of the Government. It would involve great abuses.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. I hope the gentleman from Virginia will allow me to ask him a question in reference to this matter. This language seems to apply to warrants now in existence, and to cases in which the holder may have died, or may hereafter die. I ask the gentleman, whether it is possible for the Government of the United States to control the descent of that property—whether it is not controlled by the laws of the State?

Mr. MEADE. I will reply to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. STANTON] by saying that it is my opinion that it is not competent for this bill to change rights already vested, and therefore it could not apply to warrants heretofore issued. I will state another thing to the House. I have received letters from the Department, in which they have given this construction to the law of 1850: if a man makes application in his lifetime for his warrant, and dies before that warrant issues, that it cannot issue unless he has a widow and infant children. And in one case particularly in my district, a widow made application for the land to which her deceased husband would have been entitled, but before the warrant issued in her case, she also died, and the Department decided she was not entitled to it, nor her heirs. Now it seems to me, by the words of that bill, if a man be living at the time of the date of that bill, and died previous to his obtaining his warrant from the office, that it is a vested right, descendable to his heirs generally, and they cannot be divested of it by any construction given to that law by the Department. I think, if the House agree with me that if a man be living at the date of the last bill, and entitled to his warrant, he has a vested and indefeasible right to it, that such a declaration ought to be contained in this bill; for I consider the construction given to the act by the officers is entirely unwarrantable.

Mr. DUNHAM. In reference to the first inquiry by the gentleman, I will frankly state I did not, as an individual, sanction that section as it now stands; but I believe, excepting myself, the committee were unanimous for that provision. Experience has shown—at least so the officers of the Department tell me—that the mode of assigning warrants which has been practised in reference to the Mexican bounty land warrants, has resulted in very great fraud. If this matter had been left to the Department, they would have undoubtedly imposed such restrictions as would have prevented fraud. We ought now to provide a mode that will prevent fraud in assignments of warrants. If you permit assignments in blank you open the door to a great many abuses in the assignment of these bounty land warrants. For instance, a warrant has been issued to myself; I assign it in blank to A B, and make the acknowledgment that he has the warrant in his possession, with this blank assignment. He loses it, or it is stolen from him, or in any other way may get out of his hand. C, who may get hold of it, may fill up the blank assignment and may make the location, and you have no remedy. If the bill oppose obstruction to that kind of assignment, I think it will have accomplished a good end. If it is stolen, the thief might indorse his name upon it at once, and the mere indorsement transfers it from hand to hand. If the blanks were left open to be filled, all these guards we have studied to throw around them, and which the Department has endeavored to throw around them, would be good for nothing. I think experience will show the gentleman is mistaken in another thing. I understand the construction which the Department has given to the law as it now stands is, that if a soldier dies before he locates his land warrant, it does not pass to his heirs, but the warrant has to be surrendered up. If he leaves a widow, however, it goes to her; and if no widow, to his minor children. If he has no widow, he then has no right under the law. That is the construction put upon it, and the committee did not feel authorized from the action of this House, to change that construction by positive enactment. That is the answer I have to make. Now, in reference to the sixth section, I hope that by unanimous consent the amendment may be made limiting the locations upon land which may be in market at the time of the location, at the minimum price. If there is no objection, I submit an amendment, to come in at the end of this section in these words: "At the minimum price."

Mr. BISSELL. I would like to inquire of the honorable chairman of this select committee what motion he intends to make in reference to this bill?

Mr. DUNHAM. I intend to move its reference to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. I will state, that my object in doing that is, because it will be impossible to dispose of the bill to-day, and unless such a motion is made the bill will go upon the Speaker's table, and, consequently, will not come up to-morrow. I make that motion with the expectation of withdrawing it at the proper time.

Mr. BISSELL. I understand now, and I am glad to hear it, that the honorable chairman of this select committee designs to have this bill referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. DUNHAM. I supposed the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BISSELL] at the time merely rose to make an inquiry. I intended to submit that motion.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I rise to a privileged question, that will entitle me to the floor, so far as that question is concerned. It is to move to take up the business on the Speaker's table. This bill will stand as the first business in order in the morning.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour having expired, the gentleman from Arkansas, [Mr. JOHNSON] has a right to arrest proceedings for the purpose of submitting the motion he has made.

Mr. JOHNSON. I will ask if this bill does not come up the first business in the morning, if we proceed with the business upon the Speaker's table?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it will.

Mr. JOHNSON. I will make the motion to refer it to the Committee of the Whole; and that will bring it up as the first business in order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman cannot have the floor to submit that motion.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I wish to inquire if the House now pass to the business upon the Speaker's table—a motion having been made to refer this bill to the Committee of the Whole upon the state of the Union—if this bill will not go to the Speaker's table and come up as the unfinished business?

The SPEAKER. That is the course the bill will take.

Mr. DUNHAM. Then I move to refer this bill to the Committee of the Whole upon the state of the Union.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I call for the business upon the Speaker's table.

BRITISH WEST INDIA COLONIES.

The SPEAKER then laid before the House a communication from the President of the United States; which was read as follows, viz:

WASHINGTON, January 12, 1852.

To the House of Representatives:

In answer to the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 5th instant, I herewith transmit to it a report and accompanying papers from the Secretary of State.

MILLARD FILLMORE.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
WASHINGTON, January 10, 1852.

To the President of the United States:

The Secretary of State, to whom has been referred the resolution which was adopted by the House of Representatives of the United States on the 5th instant, requesting the President to communicate to that House, if not incompatible with the public interest, any information he may possess, respecting a circular which was issued by the Secretary of State for the British Colonial Department, on the 16th of October, 1850, relative to the employment in her Britannic Majesty's West India Colonies, of free blacks and liberated slaves from the United States, and particularly what action the Legislative Assemblies of the British West India Islands have taken in pursuance of the suggestions contained? in said circular, has the honor to report to the President the accompanying copy of papers, which embrace all the information possessed by this Department on the subject of the said resolution. Respectfully submitted,

DAN'L WEBSTER.

Mr. Lawrence to Mr. Webster.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
LONDON, November 14, 1851.

Sir: A few weeks since George W. Owens, Esq., of Georgia, called upon me to say that he had seen a newspaper, published in the Island of Antigua, containing a circular dispatch from the Colonial Office, recommending the British West India Colonies to enter into contracts with persons held in slavery in the United States. Soon after the interview he furnished me with a copy of the dispatch.

Mr. Owens seemed greatly annoyed at Lord Grey's dispatch, although I told him that this Government could not have the intention of meddling with slavery in the United States. He, however, was anxious for an explanation from the Government. I did not feel authorized, nor did I think it wise to make an official matter of the subject, as I believed I could accomplish the object in a more satisfactory manner by a personal interview. I accordingly called on Lord Palmerston, in the absence of Lord Grey, and received from him a verbal explanation, disclaiming any such purpose as Mr. Owens had drawn from the language of the dispatch. On Lord Grey's return to town, I received from him an informal note to the same effect. I immediately wrote Mr. Owens a note, embodying the substance of these explanations, and received from him a reply, dated at Liverpool, expressing dissatisfaction with them. Not knowing what use he may make in the United States of the circular dispatch, I deem it my duty to place you in possession of a copy of my letter to him. I have read this letter to Lord Palmerston, and have received from him an assurance that it is entirely in accordance with his own views, with the views of Lord Grey, and with those of the Cabinet Ministers.

The dispatch in question was, as you will see, sent to the West Indies some time in the autumn of 1850, and as it has never been heard of in the United States, I apprehend it was never acted upon by the Colonial Legislatures. It grew out of the action of the late Mr. Turnbull, who was, I believe, of the mixed Commission in Cuba, and an agent of this Government in matters connected with the slave trade. He was in Washington about two years since, and while there saw many persons of Maryland, Virginia, and other Southern States, respecting the free colored people of those States, and communicated the result of his observations to this Government.

I should not have thought it necessary to trouble you with this matter, if Mr. Owen had expressed himself satisfied with my letter.

I have the honor to be, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

ABBOTT LAWRENCE.

Hon. DANIEL WEBSTER, Secretary of State, Washington.

Extract from the Antigua Weekly Register, published in the city of St. John's, 26th November, 1850.

HOUSE OF ASSEMBLY,
THURSDAY, November 21, 1850.

When the House was formed, which was not before two o'clock, Mr. Speaker informed the House that he had received a message from the Governor-in-Chief, which he read, as follows:

"R. J. McINTOSH, the Governor-in-Chief, transmits, for the information of the House of Assembly, the accompanying copy of a circular dispatch which he has received from her Majesty's Secretary of State, suggesting measures to be adopted for the encouragement of emigration to the West Indies from the United States.

"GOVERNMENT HOUSE, ANTIGUA, November 18, 1850.

[CIRCULAR.]

"DOWNSING STREET, October 16, 1850.

"Sir: I have to acquaint you that it has been suggested to me that a desirable class of emigrants for the West Indian Colonies might be induced to come to them from among the black and colored population of the United States, whose arrival and location, if they choose to come, would, I have no doubt, be advantageous both to themselves and the colonies.

"I am not aware of anything which can be done by the Colonial Governments to encourage such immigration beyond showing a readiness to pass acts giving the privilege of naturalization to any such persons as might come and settle there, and providing that a bounty should be payable on such immigrants, under such arrangements as may be thought desirable.

"I could also suggest, as deserving of consideration, whether laws might not be passed rendering binding, on certain conditions, engagements to pay sums of money which may have been agreed on by immigrants, although such engagements may have been contracted in America and while the parties were in a state of slavery.

"I have, &c.,

GREY."

Mr. Lawrence to Mr. Owens.

LONDON, November 8, 1851.

MY DEAR SIR: I have just received a reply to my note to Lord Palmerston, accompanied by Lord Grey's explanation of the dispatch to which I called his attention. I am assured that he never intended to sanction or suggest entering into any arrangement with regard to slaves not first known to and approved by the masters; and that so far from supposing that any American would or could complain of the proposed arrangement, it was believed the slaveholders would receive it with satisfaction, and join in carrying it into effect.

It appears that Lord Grey has been aware for some time that the West India Colonies are suffering from the want of an adequate supply of labor. A gentleman from these colonies directed his attention to the fact that there were in some of the slaveholding States a large number of free blacks whom the whites would be glad to have removed, and who would meet to a certain extent the wants of the colonies. Knowing it to be the policy of the slave States to rid themselves of such a population, he thought a measure contemplating such a result would be favorably received by them.

He was further led to suppose, on the authority of certain American gentlemen, communicated to him through the same channel, that many slaveholders would avail themselves of such an opportunity to emancipate their slaves, if they could be assured of their being removed from the country.

He was informed that the laws forbade emancipation, unless the liberated slaves were also removed, and that the expense of this prevented persons who would otherwise emancipate their slaves from doing so. But it was said a measure would be acceptable which would enable such persons to remove their slaves from the country when liberated without expense to themselves.

With this view he prepared a plan, which should aim at the employment in the West India Colonies of free blacks from the United States; and should also offer to the planters the prospect, not only of a removal of their liberated slaves without expense, but of a recovery of a portion of their value also. He recommended this plan to the colonies, and wrote the circular in question in the belief that the want of labor would be supplied from these two sources, with the assent and co-operation of the slaveholders and the governments of the slaveholding States.

It is to be regretted that, with such an end in view, language should have been employed capable of a different construction; but this explanation appears to deprive it of its objectionable character.

With great consideration, I remain, dear sir, very faithfully yours,

ABBOTT LAWRENCE.

On motion by Mr. BAYLY, the communication was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

DEFICIENCY ESTIMATES.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Treasury Department, transmitting a statement of additional appropriations required for the current fiscal year in the bureaus of said Department, amounting to $16,500. Also, for the contingent expenses of the branch Mint at New Orleans, $12,000; and for annuities and drafts $750; amounting in the aggregate to $29,250.

On motion by Mr. HOUSTON, referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Treasury Department, transmitting statements from the War Department of additional appropriations necessary for the support of the Army for the present fiscal year; which,

On motion by Mr. HOUSTON, was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

DEFICIENCY ESTIMATES—DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Department of the Interior, transmitting estimates of appropriations necessary to meet deficiencies in the service of this Department for the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1852, amounting to some $700,000.

On motion by Mr. HOUSTON, it was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I would ask the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means if it would not be better to send that communication back to the Department of the Interior and ask them to submit their estimates according to the laws, and what has heretofore been the practice. It has always been the practice, and I believe the law requires it, that they shall submit their estimates to the Secretary of the Treasury, and he shall send them in here. Some days ago we had an estimate from the Navy Department, and now we have one from the Department of the Interior. I suppose in a short time the War Department will present one, too; and after a while the Secretary of the Treasury will also submit one. In my opinion, they should all be sent back, and made in accordance with the law and custom. I move, therefore, that this communication be returned to the Secretary of the Interior, and that he be directed to submit it according to law.

Mr. STANLY. If the Secretary of the Interior has been guilty of any neglect or duty, he has not done so certainly with any intention. I hope my friend from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] will not resort to this mode of proceeding. After the committee have had this paper under examination, they can report such resolution and send it back; but to throw it back now in the face of the Secretary, is certainly not becoming ourselves or him. I hope my friend from Tennessee will not insist upon his motion, for I think it is a little uncourteous.

Mr. JONES. The manner in which they make their reports to Congress looks a little uncourteous, to say the least of it.

Mr. HOUSTON. I made no reply to my friend from Tennessee, because I took it for granted that the remarks he had made would bring the subject to the attention of the heads of the Department, so that they would hereafter pursue the ordinary course of communicating through the Secretary of the Treasury to Congress. I believe, with the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. STANLY] that it would be, probably, too severe a rebuke to send it back. The remarks of the gentleman from Tennessee have sufficiently presented the subject to the attention of the heads of the Departments; so much so, that they will hereafter follow the law and custom upon that subject. It is certainly irregular and unusual to make this sort of communication, but still I agree with the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. STANLY] that it would probably be too decided a step for us to take, at this time, to send it back.

Mr. JONES. It certainly would not be any stronger expression of the House towards that Department than this course is, upon the part of the Department, uncourteous towards the House. The law requires, if I mistake not, that the several Departments shall submit their estimates to the Congress of the United States through the Treasury Department. The Treasury Department is required by law to make its report directly to the Congress of the United States. Since I have been here it has been the uniform practice, I believe, when the Secretary of the Treasury submits his annual estimates of appropriations to accompany them also with such estimates for deficiencies for the current year as the several Departments may report to him. If gentlemen think that the course I suggested would be too severe a rebuke towards the Secretary, I will withdraw the motion I made, and move to lay the communication upon the table, and there let it rest until it comes to us in a proper manner.

The question was then taken on Mr. JONES's motion, and it was agreed to.

So the communication was laid upon the table. Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I rise to a privileged question. I understand that there is a similar communication from the Navy Department, which has been referred to the Committee of Ways and Means. I move to reconsider the vote by which it was so referred, in order that it, too, may be laid upon the table until sent in in the regular manner.

Mr. HOUSTON. I think the gentleman from Tennessee is mistaken in regard to that communication.

Mr. BAYLY. I rise to a privileged question. The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Jones] has already submitted a privileged question.

Mr. HOUSTON. I think that the estimates from the Navy Department were sent in in the correct manner.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Then I will withdraw my motion, and move now to reconsider the vote on the motion to lay that last communication upon the table, and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

Mr. BAYLY. I hope the House will not lay the motion to reconsider upon the table. (Cries of "Order!") Gentlemen are acting under a mistake.

The SPEAKER. No debate is in order.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, demanded the yeas and nays upon his motion; and they were ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas, moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. HOUSTON. I appeal to the gentleman from Arkansas to withdraw that motion for a little while. We can then pass by this question of reconsideration, and refer the bills upon the Speaker's table, many of which have been there for nearly a month, and ought to be referred.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I withdraw my motion for that purpose.

Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee, renewed the motion that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. LETCHER, on that motion, demanded the yeas and nays; but they were not ordered.

Mr. BAYLY demanded tellers; but they were not ordered.

The question was then taken, and it was decided in the affirmative—ayes 97, noes 52.

So the House adjourned until twelve o'clock to-morrow.

PRIVATE BILL.

The engrossed bill for the relief of Thomas Snodgrass was read a third time and passed.

APPOINTMENT OF COMMITTEE CLERKS.

Mr. RUSK. I laid upon the table yesterday morning a resolution to authorize the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads to employ a clerk. I ask that it may now be considered.

The motion was agreed to, and the resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be, and they are hereby, authorized to employ a clerk.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. I suppose the fight may as well commence upon this resolution as any other. I think we have it pretty evidently shown that every committee of the Senate will, in future, have to be provided with a clerk to perform the labor of the committee in part. I apprehend that we have gone as far with that matter as we have ever gone, with the exception of the clerk asked for by my friend from Texas. We accorded a clerk to that committee at a time when it was supposed, from an amendment of the Post Office laws, there was some unusual amount of labor to be performed by that committee. I am not aware that such labor is to be performed now, and the chairman of the committee has not so stated. If a clerk is now allowed to each of these committees, they will become permanent appendages of the Senate, and will hereafter be just as regularly employed as the clerks under the Secretary of the Senate. Three are now asked for. But without consuming the time of the Senate, I ask for the yeas and nays on the adoption of the resolution.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. RUSK. I desire to say a word or two upon the subject. A clerk has been employed by this committee for the two last sessions of Congress, and he was fully employed during that time. There is not, perhaps, a committee of this body on whom more labor is devolved than on the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. The post office machinery extends all over the country; and everybody in the populous and sparsely settled portions of the country is equally interested in the manner in which that machinery is worked. The laws regulating that Department are in confusion. They run over a period of fifty years. Constant changes are required in these laws to meet the wants of our country; and it will require a vast amount of labor for the purpose of meeting those changes, which will necessarily come before and ought to attract the attention of that committee. Rules which would apply to a densely populated portion of the country will not apply where the population is sparse. There are some eighteen or twenty thousand post offices, many millions of miles of transportation of mail matter, and there are now many complaints of confusion in the machinery of the Post Office Department. Once or twice it has been recommended that we should revise all the laws relating to the Department, which are now in great confusion. It is the object of the Department to make it what it should be for the benefit of the whole community. Under such circumstances, if the labor is devolved upon us, we cannot be expected to perform it at all satisfactorily. I am very willing to labor as far as I can in the discharge of the duties which may devolve upon me as a member of that committee; but of one thing I am very sure, which is, that the Senate cannot employ a clerk with more general benefit to the community than in the service of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. GWIN. As I understand the opposition to be equally made to the employment of a clerk by any committee of this body, and inasmuch as I offered a resolution yesterday for the appointment of a clerk for the Committee on Naval Affairs, I wish to give the reason that induced that committee to ask for a clerk. I will very briefly state some of the labors which that committee is expected to perform. They are expected to prepare:

1st. "A code of laws for its energetic government and administration."

2d. "A furlough or retired list."

To ascertain what additional legislation, if any, is necessary to ensure,

3d. "A fair, stringent and active system of administration by the Secretary of the Navy, equalization and impartiality in service afloat and ashore, and a strict and positive obedience to, and enforcement of, all orders, without favor."

4th. "An invariable rule, that in the selection of officers for commands afloat, their physical abilities, morals, standing and fitness, should be first clearly ascertained before they are intrusted with the important duties attending foreign service."

Every member of the Senate must perceive that, to enable the committee to discharge the duties imposed upon them satisfactorily to the country, it must have a clerk.

Mr. HALE. I would suggest to the Senator from Texas whether it would not be better to modify the proposition. As the resolution now stands it is unlimited, and might be construed to mean that this committee should have a clerk in all time to come—forever, sir. I would suggest to the Senator to limit his resolution to the present session of Congress.

Mr. RUSK. I am quite willing that the resolution should be so modified. I will, therefore, move to amend the resolution by adding the words "during the present session of Congress."

The amendment was adopted.

The question then recurred on the adoption of the resolution as amended; and the yeas and nays having been ordered and taken, they resulted—yeas 34, nays 7; as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Bayard, Bell, Berrien, Borland, Bradbury, Cass, Cooper, Davis, Dawson, Dodge of Wisconsin, Downs, Foot, Geyer, Gwin, Hale, Hamlin, James, Jones of Iowa, Jones of Tennessee, McKee, Mallory, Miller, Norris, Pearce, Rusk, Sebastian, Seward, Smith, South, Spruance, Stockton, Sumner, Upsham, and Wade, 34.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bright, Brodhead, Dodge of Iowa, Hunter, King, Underwood, and Walker, 7.

So the resolution was adopted:

CLERK TO COMMITTEE ON NAVAL AFFAIRS.

Mr. GWIN. I now move to take up the resolution relative to the appointment of a clerk to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and I move to amend it by adding the words "during the present session of Congress."

The PRESIDENT. The question will first be on taking up the resolution.

The motion to take up the resolution was agreed to.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be authorized to employ a clerk.

Mr. GWIN. I now move to amend by adding the words "during the present Congress."

Mr. CASS. I desire to say one word, Mr. President, on this subject, and it is simply this: We are to be called upon to appropriate hundreds of thousands—nay, millions of dollars—for the estimates of the various Departments; and it does seem strange to me, that if five of our colleagues in this body, who may be appointed as a committee, come and tell you that they are not able to do their duty satisfactorily to themselves without the aid of a clerk, that we should make any objection to it.

The question was taken on the amendment; and it was agreed to.

The question then recurring on the adoption of the resolution as amended, it was decided in the affirmative.

CLERK TO THE COMMITTEE ON COMMERCE.

Mr. HAMLIN. I ask that the resolution which I submitted this morning may be taken up for consideration now, that we may dispose of all these matters at the same time.

The PRESIDENT. It cannot be taken up without unanimous consent. If there be no objection it will be taken up.

No objection was offered.

The resolution was accordingly read:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be authorized to employ a clerk, from and after the first proximo, at the usual rate of compensation, during the present session of Congress.

Mr. HAMLIN. I desire to state that I offer that resolution by the unanimous approval of the Committee on Commerce. I wish to state, in addition, that we have before that committee fully one hundred questions relating to internal improvements, connected with our harbors, lakes, or rivers, in almost every State in the Union. To act intelligently, there should be a synopsis filed, with each one of these cases, showing what has been done by the Government, and a complete and accurate statement of the cases presented, so that the committee and the Senate may act intelligently. Senators will recollect how much we were at fault at the last session, as to what was the true situation of the works alluded to. Besides this, there is scarcely a day passes when there is not some subject comes up which requires correspondence, or an interview with a Department, and to do these subjects justice is beyond the power of that committee. I believe there is no committee in this Senate which has so varied and extensive subjects committed to it as the Committee on Commerce.

The resolution was adopted.

FLOGGING IN THE NAVY.

Mr. GWIN. The memorial offered some time ago by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr.

BRODHEAD] in relation to corporal punishment in the Navy, is yet undisposed of. When the question was last under consideration, the Senator from Florida [Mr. MALLORY] had the floor. It is, as I understand it, unfinished business, and I hope it will be taken up now.

The PRESIDENT. The Senator from California is right; this is the unfinished business. The memorial was postponed to a day certain; that day has passed, and it comes up now in its order.

Mr. DAVIS. Does this take precedence of the compromise resolution? I understood the Chair that the compromise resolution followed the business to which it gave way yesterday.

Mr. GWIN. I hope the Senator from Massachusetts will permit that subject to pass over this morning. The Senator from Florida was on the floor, and had delivered a portion of his speech when the question was postponed until last Monday. This matter has been postponed from day to day, and I hope it will now be taken up and disposed of.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that the first special order is the resolution offered by the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. FORTRE], which was postponed to Monday, the 5th of January. The question in relation to the memorial presented by the Senator from Pennsylvania, was postponed until January 12th, and can now be taken up on motion, if the Senator from California thinks fit to make that motion.

Mr. GWIN. Then I make that motion, and hope the Senate will sustain it.

Mr. DAVIS. I am not impatient to address the Senate. All I desire to say is, that I have a few remarks to make on this compromise resolution. If it is more agreeable to the Senate to hear them at another time I am quite willing to postpone them for the present. I perceive that the Senator from Florida has a number of books and papers on his desk, and appears to be ready to address the Senate. I would not, therefore, be willing to keep him in suspense, for I know that it is a very painful condition to be in. I am not in that state myself; but if I can only understand from the Senator from California—that is, if he knows—when this resolution can come up, and not be in the way of other business, I will move to postpone it till that time.

Mr. GWIN. Very well; say next Monday.

Mr. DAVIS. Why not say to-morrow?

Mr. GWIN. Because for to-morrow there is a special order.

Mr. HUNTER. The special order for to-morrow is the bill making land warrants assignable.

The PRESIDENT. This resolution will be the first special order, to the exclusion of the bill making land warrants assignable.

Mr. DAVIS. I do not speak for myself altogether in this matter, or rather, I should say that I do speak with regard to my own views. But then I know that the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. McRAE] is anxious to address the Senate on this subject, and I would be glad to have the thing put in such a shape as to accommodate his feelings and wishes as well as my own. If it can be taken up to-morrow morning, I am content to have it postponed till that time; but I would be glad to have it understood by the Senate that it may come up to-morrow morning.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair will state to the Senator from Massachusetts that it comes up as a matter of course, being the first special order, unless it should be postponed to take up some other subject. The question now is on taking up the memorial from citizens of Pennsylvania on the subject of flogging in the Navy.

The question was taken on the motion to take up the memorial, and it was agreed to.

Mr. MALLORY. Let the memorial be read.

Mr. BRODHEAD. Oh it is unnecessary; it has already been read three or four times.

The PRESIDENT. The Senator from Florida asks for its reading, and it is obliged to be read.

The memorial, as it has already appeared in the columns of the Congressional Globe, page 218, was then read.

Mr. MALLORY then addressed the Senate until the hour of adjournment, in favor of a restoration of corporal punishment.

Without concluding, Mr. M. gave way to a motion to adjourn,

And the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

WEDNESDAY, January 14, 1852.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. BUTLER.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

AFFAIRS IN UTAH.

Mr. BERNHISEL. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. I find that the report (as printed) communicated to this House by the President of the United States, containing the report of the three United States officers returning from Utah, is not the same as the copy furnished me from the Department of State. I was as much surprised at the appearance of the official printed report, as I was at the publication of a like report a few days before in the New York Herald, both of which are different from the report furnished to me, or a copy thereof, from the State Department, though bearing the same date. I must protest against the change or alteration of an official report, containing such serious charges against the Governor and people of the Territory which I have the honor to represent; and without saying more at this time, I now move the House, on presenting the copy of that report which was furnished to me by the Department of State, that the same be printed and laid before this House. I have not carefully compared any of the reports, and know not which to rely on as authentic, and official, except it be the one on file at the State Department and furnished me by that Department. I shall hold this to be the true copy of the indictment, and trust that this House will so order it after it shall be printed and laid before the House.

Mr. CARTER. I rise to a question of order. I do not think that this matter can be considered a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is unable to perceive any question of privilege. The gentleman from Utah can only proceed by the unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. CARTER objected.

Mr. ORR. I move that the gentleman from Utah [Mr. BERNHISEL] have leave to proceed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that this is not one of those cases which would allow the gentleman to proceed on a motion of that character. If the gentleman had been called to order on the ground of irrelevancy in debate, or for other disorder, it would then have been in order for the gentleman from South Carolina to submit a motion that the gentleman from Utah be allowed to proceed in order. But, in the opinion of the Chair, the gentleman from Utah is not entitled to the floor, and therefore the gentleman from South Carolina cannot submit the motion which he proposes. The Chair decides that the gentleman from Utah cannot proceed without the unanimous consent of the House.

ESTIMATES FROM THE DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR.

The SPEAKER then stated that the first business in order was the proposition to reconsider the vote by which the communication from the Department of the Interior was laid upon the table. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] had moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table, and upon that motion the yeas and nays had been ordered.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. By the consent of the House I desire to withdraw my motion to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table. I will also state—though it is not strictly in order—that I hope the motion to reconsider will prevail, and that this question may be fully examined. It is a new one, and is, at least, worthy the consideration of the House.

There was no objection, and the motion to lay on the table was accordingly withdrawn.

The question then recurred upon the motion to reconsider the vote by which the document was ordered to lie upon the table.

Mr. HOUSTON. If this question is not likely to give rise to additional debate, and it is the intention of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] to merely refer it to some committee, I am willing that it should be reconsidered.

The SPEAKER. It is not now in order to debate the question.

Mr. HOUSTON. I understand that it is not debatable now; but if the reconsideration takes place, it will then be debatable. I desire to say that I have a matter of interest connected with the public printing, to bring before the House at the earliest opportunity.

The question was then put, and the House agreed to reconsider the vote by which the message from the Secretary of the Interior was ordered to lie upon the table.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. The motion now pending is one made by myself on yesterday, to send this communication back. I will, if there be no objection, withdraw that motion; and then the motion made by the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. HOUSTON], to refer the message to the Committee of Ways and Means, and to have it printed, will be in order.

The SPEAKER. The recollection of the Chair is, that the gentleman from Tennessee yesterday withdrew the motion to which he has referred, and substituted the motion to lay upon the table.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Then I propose to withdraw the motion to lay the document on the table.

There was no objection, and the motion was accordingly withdrawn.

The question then recurred upon the motion submitted by the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. HOUSTON], to refer the document to the Committee of Ways and Means, and to print.

Mr. HOUSTON. Does the gentleman propose to debate it now?

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Yes; but I will not occupy the time of the House more than five minutes.

I made the motion yesterday to lay this communication upon the table because it is an infraction of custom and a violation of the law. So far as my opinion goes, and so far as I have been able to investigate the question, it is the first time any Department, other than that of the Treasury, has submitted to this House estimates for appropriations and asked for the enactment of laws to make those appropriations.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I rise to a question of order. The question now before the House is the disposition of the Executive documents upon the Speaker's table; and the rule says they shall only be taken up in regular order. The only opportunity for debate would have been upon the privileged motion to reconsider. But that motion having been withdrawn, of course the communication lies upon the Speaker's table, and can only be taken up in its regular order.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. This question comes legitimately before the House this morning, upon the motion to reconsider. This leaves the question to refer it to the Committee of Ways and Means just where it was yesterday, when that motion was made.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee is correct.

ASSIGNABILITY OF LAND WARRANTS.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business during the morning hour, is the call of committees for reports. The first business in order, therefore, in the opinion of the Chair, is the report of the select committee on the joint resolution explanatory of the act of September 28, 1850, entitled "An act granting bounty lands to certain officers and soldiers who were engaged in the military service of the United States," and the subject of amending and extending the bounty land bill.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. There is another question why this matter is before the House. I know that it was uniformly held by the Speaker of the last House, that when any proposition was before the House at the time of adjournment, and an amendment pending to refer it to any committee, it kept it off the Speaker's table, and brought it up as the unfinished business.

The SPEAKER. The Chair admits that it is unfinished business to come up in its order. The call of committees for reports being first in order, the unfinished report of yesterday will take precedence of the other unfinished question.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I am very certain that is a change of the practice of the House.

The SPEAKER. The first business in order is upon the motion to refer the report made by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. DUNHAM] to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. BISSELL. Upon that question—

Mr. HOUSTON. I appeal to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. BISSELL,] and ask that he will permit me to bring to the attention of the House the condition of the public printing.

Mr. BISSELL. I am sorry to disoblige the gentleman, but I cannot yield the floor for that purpose.

Mr. HOUSTON. I hope the gentleman will allow that subject to be brought now before the House, as the subject upon which he proposes to speak will consume the balance of the day.

Mr. BISSELL. I should be glad to oblige the gentleman, but it strikes me that this question of printing will consume not only this day, but many days in succession, if we lay aside other business to attend to it.

Mr. HOUSTON. I rise to a question of order. It is this: Whether I have not a right, under the rules of the House, to make a report from the Committee of Ways and Means, stating the reasons why the appropriation bills have not been reported within thirty days from the announcement of the Committee of Ways and Means by the Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The Chair knows of no rule of the House giving the gentleman that right.

Mr. BISSELL. Mr. Speaker, upon the question of referring the report submitted yesterday by the chairman of the select committee upon the bounty land question, I wish to say a few words. I was gratified that the chairman of that committee made the motion to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, but I regretted very much that he afterwards announced to us that he had made that motion with the view of subsequently withdrawing it, and of putting this bill upon its passage here, under the operation, as I suppose, of the previous question. Now, sir, I hope no vote will be taken upon this bill under any such strategy. It will be most manifest to every man who will pay the least attention to the provisions of this bill, that it is one that requires, perhaps more than any other one that has been before us during this session, that deliberation and attention which it can only receive in Committee of the Whole. Sir, he is a bold man who, understanding the provisions and foreseeing the operation of this bill, votes to-day that it become a law. And he is a rash one, who votes for it without that understanding and foresight. No, sir; this bill should go to the Committee of the Whole; and I hope the members of this House are prepared at once to reject it altogether, or, at least, that they will see the propriety of letting it take that course which bills of far less importance than this generally do. To some portions of the bill I have no objections whatever. To other parts of it, I think a large majority of the members of this House will object. Of some portions of it I have no language sufficiently strong to express my disapprobation.

The first section proposes to make land warrants assignable. That is very well; but I think, upon mature reflection, that the mode of assignment provided for in this first section is by no means the best one; and my reasons for thinking so can be given in very few words. The section provides that these warrants shall be assignable, the assignment to be executed and acknowledged, or proved, in the same manner and with the same formalities that deeds for the conveyance of land are executed, acknowledged, or proved in the State or Territory in which the assignment may be made. Now, at first blush, that seems very well; and I am not so much opposed to that mode of assignment as that I would go against the bill on account of it if it suited me in other respects. But I think the bill must be essentially modified in nearly all of its provisions; and, while we are about it, I am for having this one perfected also. Look at the effect of providing this mode of assignment. A land warrant is assigned, for instance, in Florida; executed and acknowledged there in accordance with the laws of that State regulating the execution, acknowledgment, and proving of deeds for the conveyance of land. Now, how is the register or receiver of a land office in Oregon expected to know, when the warrant is presented at his office, what are the laws of Florida upon that subject? and, without such knowledge, how can he know that the assignment is legal or valid according to the provisions of the law we are now about to enact? Another one is assigned in Maine according to the mode in which deeds are executed and acknowledged there. How is this same register in Oregon, ninety days afterwards when the warrant is presented to him, to know what are the laws of Maine in relation to deeds conveying land? And further still, how is any register or receiver expected to know the laws of all the States and Territories and of the District of Columbia, regulating this subject, so that he may know, when the warrant is presented to him at his office, whether the assignment upon it is legal or not? Why, it would require a lawyer, indeed, and one of much reading, too, to be enabled to act understandingly under such a law as you propose for the guidance of registers and receivers.

Mr. DUNHAM. Has the gentleman always been of that opinion, or has he recently embraced it, and since the committee acted upon it?

Mr. BISSELL. Personally, I have always preferred a different mode of assignment from that provided by this first section, yet I did not object to this mode in committee, willing, if the balance of this bill should suit me, to indorse the whole; but as I have said before, when I came to see the frightful disproportion of the other parts of the bill, I was disposed to have it nearly all modified—this section as well as others.

Now a far more simple, better, and wiser plan, is that which was provided for in the bill before us originally; and I now call the attention of gentlemen to that better mode. The first section of that original bill provides that the warrants for military bounty lands, which have been, or may hereafter be, issued under any law of the United States, shall be assignable in such form, and pursuant to such regulations, as may be prescribed by the Commissioner of the General Land Office. Now the Commissioner has constant communication with all these local offices, and the moment you may pass this original bill, he will send his circular containing this law and the prescribed form to each of the registers and receivers, and they will have all the required information before them in plain and simple language, directly from the Department here. Thus that provision of law regulating the assignment of warrants, will pass into all the local land offices, and all other public offices where business of that kind is transacted by officers or individuals. Every man may then see and easily understand, what is necessary to constitute a legal assignment of a bounty land warrant. Now, which of these plans is the better one? Nay, I would ask, indeed, if the one reported by the majority of this select committee is not almost utterly impracticable? So much for the first section of the bill, which is to be forced through the House under the operation of the previous question.

The second section of this bill—and I ask those gentlemen who have not given it particular attention to attend to it now—provides, that for locating warrants hereafter, registers and receivers shall receive fifty cents upon each one located. Now, gentlemen, you are all aware that the location, by these warrants, commenced some three or four years ago. Since that time so many locations have been made under them, that probably not one fourth part of those originally directed to be issued now remain unlocated. The officers who have located them, have never received one single cent, except a small pittance, originally provided for locating such as had been assigned. The subject of compensating these officers for their services comes before this House; is referred to a select committee, and they report in favor of compensating such officers as may render the same services hereafter, and wholly neglect to provide the same equal and just compensation, or any compensation at all, to those who have performed these services up to this time. Is there justice in that? If the location of these warrants hereafter to be made is a service, fairly and justly entitling the registers and receivers to compensation, why not compensate those who for three years have devoted nearly all their time to that labor without receiving so much as one hundred dollars, over and above clerk hire, office rent, and other necessary expenses? Why, the very fact that the committee proposes to pay for locating these warrants hereafter, shows them to be aware of the fact that there is justice in the claim of those who ask compensation for having located them heretofore. Why provide for payment only to future officers? Let us see how this matter is got over by the chairman of the select committee, [Mr. DUNHAM.] After providing in this comprehensive bill for paying officers who shall hereafter locate these warrants, he tells you that those who have been engaged in locating them heretofore, can come to Congress, each with his individual claim, and get a bill through here for his compensation. Is not that a most extraordinary proposition? Is it not a most unreasonable one, so far as the present, and late incumbents of these offices are concerned? This bill provides for paying officers who perform these services hereafter, and invites those who have performed them heretofore—some of whom are in office now, and some not—to come to Washington by dozens, and scores, and hundreds, and present to Congress, each his individual claim, in the form of a private bill, for the purpose of obtaining his pay, as register or receiver, for locating these land warrants heretofore. That, sir, is an improvement upon the General Land Office system, which is as ingenious as it is just to retiring land officers. Why, the land office system is designed to be, and should be, complete and perfect in itself. The claim of these officers for compensation should be adjusted, now and always, not by Congress but by the head of that Department here. If, pursuant to the invitation of the chairman of this committee, fifty or a hundred of these land officers come up to Washington and present their claims to Congress, I should like to know when they may reasonably expect their bills to be all got through? How much of the time of Congress would be consumed in passing them, and how much of the money of these honest claimants be expended, in employing agents and in personal attendance, session after session, till their bills are passed? How simple, how sensible, how right would it be, to provide in preference for those who have already located these warrants, just as we do for those who shall locate them hereafter? Provide that those registers and receivers who have heretofore located these warrants shall receive a certain percentage on each warrant so located by them, under regulations of the Department, the whole amount allowed to any one in no case to exceed the maximum of compensation now allowed by law. There is no difficulty in regulating this, none at all. The head of the Land Office Department here knows how much pay each land officer has received, year by year—

Mr. DUNHAM. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BISSELL. Certainly.

Mr. DUNHAM. I should like to know, in settling those accounts at the Land Office, how you are to ascertain the amount they are entitled to for locating Mexican land warrants?

Mr. BISSELL. In the easiest possible way, I assure the gentleman. I will turn to the records of the General Land Office here, or introduce that gentleman to a clerk who will do it, and show, in less time than I have been speaking, precisely how much each land officer has received for each year, during the whole time in which entries have been made by these warrants.

Mr. DUNHAM. The gentleman will find himself very much mistaken, or else my inquiries have resulted in a wrong answer, for my—

Mr. BISSELL. The books of the General Land Office show whether a warrant was located by the original holder, or by his assignee. If by his assignee, the Department knows that the register and receiver has received fifty cents. If by the original holder, the Department knows that the local land officer has received nothing. Therefore it is entirely practicable to obtain the necessary information on this point. When that information is obtained, the Department should be authorized to allow each register and receiver a percentage upon entries by warrants, under the restriction or limitation as to amount, which I have already suggested. This is exactly what the majority of the select committee propose to do for registers and receivers who may perform this service in future. Is there any more difficulty about the past? This whole thing ought to be settled in this bill. We want no future legislation on the subject. We do not want these registers and receivers—nor their widows and children—here in mournful procession with their private bills for compensation, year after year, till our patience and their spirits shall be worn out. Regulate the compensation to which they are entitled now, when it can so easily be done; and save to them the time and the money they may otherwise expend hereafter in successful or unsuccessful efforts to obtain delayed justice. Let not the honorable chairman of this select committee say they are not entitled to anything, for by the fact of proposing to compensate officers for the same services hereafter, and by the further fact of virtually inviting the retiring registers and receivers to come here and present their claims to Congress, he is estopped from denying the justness of their claim.

Now the fact is, that some of those officers have not received more than one or two hundred dollars in the last year, over and above their clerk hire and other expenses, because nearly all the entries in their districts have been made by these warrants; whereas in other districts in which most of the entries have been made in money and in which not one fourth as much labor is required as in the case of entries by warrants, have received very nearly or quite the maximum sum allowed by law. Is this equal justice?

There is another argument upon this subject, which I address to the exclusive consideration of my Democratic friends round about me, and I know they will appreciate it. My friend from Indiana [Mr. DUNHAM] proposes to pay officers who shall locate these warrants hereafter; and proposes, in the same bill, to issue a very large batch of new warrants to another class of our citizens; but, to those who have been engaged in locating warrants without pay for the last three years he has nothing to say, except that they had better come up to Congress at some future time, and get the pay allowed them, each by a separate bill. Now, we Democrats all know very well who will hold these offices for the next four years. We know—do we not, my Democratic friends?—that there is to be a change in the Administration, and that, after a little time, good Democrats will fill these offices for some years to come. Well, these Democratic registers and receivers to be are provided for—very properly, of course—in this bill. They are to receive pay for each warrant they may locate. But these poor Whigs, who have performed the labor of locating all these warrants—for I believe they have all been located since the commencement of General Taylor's administration, and who are about to retire, I mean at the incoming of the next Democratic Administration—are to be turned off without pay. They are told to whistle for their pay, or, which is the same thing, to come up and apply to some future Congress for it. Now, I ask my Democratic friends if this is just? I do not say we ought to be magnanimous to our Whig friends who are to go out of office, but we ought to be just to them. If it is just to compensate Democratic officers, who will fill those places during the next Administration, I think it equally so to compensate those Whigs, who, by an extraordinary streak of good luck, have been in office for the last three years. I admit, very cheerfully, that our Whig friends, in the general, deserve a good deal of scourging, but let it be visited upon them in a different way—by keeping them out of office. But in pecuniary matters, let us not fail to give them their full dues.

Now, I have proofs before me, but I will not detain the House by reading them, showing that the necessary, unavoidable labor of locating a tract of land with a military bounty land warrant, is more than four times as great as in locating the same tract with money. There is proof, also, that in some of the land districts nearly all the land has been located for the last year or two with these warrants. As a consequence, the percentage which officers receive upon cash sales, has been lost to the receivers and registers in such districts. This quadrupled their labor and diminished by three fourths their pay. There is proof, also, that in other land districts the sales have mostly been made for cash, and the officers in such districts, though performing comparatively little labor, have, through the percentage to which they are entitled on cash sales, realized more than four times the compensation received by the less fortunate class I have already referred to. Now I ask the majority of this select committee—for I would have the House bear in mind that it is composed of five, and that it was by a bare majority that this bill was reported—if there is any principle of even-handed justice discernible in their whole proceeding? If any gentleman is of opinion that the salaries of land officers are too high, let him move to cut them down. Perhaps I will go with him; but let us make them equal. If you reduce the pay of one man, reduce that of all others; and at any rate do not put additional labor upon one and give him less compensation than another gets for his labor.

Again: this bill provides that a man entering one hundred and sixty acres of land with a land warrant shall pay fifty cents to the receiver and register. Do we consider how much the Government pays for having that same one hundred and sixty acres of land entered with cash? It pays two dollars. A speculator appears, loaded down with land warrants which he has purchased at sixty to ninety dollars each, and with each one of which he buys one hundred and sixty acres of land. For entering that one hundred and sixty acres which really has cost him less than a hundred dollars, he pays to the register and receiver fifty cents, and no more. A poor emigrant who has managed to raise two hundred dollars in specie, goes to a land office in Minnesota, Iowa, or Illinois, purchases one hundred and sixty acres of land with that two hundred dollars of genuine Jackson currency. For receiving his money and giving him a certificate of entry the register and receiver are allowed each a dollar. Such inconsistencies will every day arise under the operation of this bill. It is considerations of this character that compel me to say the bill ought not to pass. It should go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and be there thoroughly investigated and essentially modified. It ought not to become a law unless entirely changed in nearly all its essential features.

[A message was here received from the President of the United States, informing the House that he had attached his signature to certain bills.]

I think, Mr. Speaker, that I have dwelt long enough upon the monstrous injustice and inequality proposed by this bill in reference to the compensation of land officers. That it will work the grossest injustice I think I have shown. I think I have also shown that this proposition, taken in connection with the remarks of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. DUNHAM], on yesterday, proposes a change in the land office system which members of this House will be slow to sanction, to wit, in the mode of compensating land officers for entries heretofore made with warrants.

Mr. DUNHAM. The gentleman misunderstands me upon that point. I stated on yesterday, that I considered, as a general thing, they had been amply paid for the services they rendered in the location of land warrants; but that there might possibly be instances where their compensation was inadequate. In such cases their claims should be presented to Congress.

Mr. BISSELL. Then I ask, if as a general rule they have been amply paid, why provide additional payment to those who shall perform the same services hereafter? That will not do. If they have been amply paid under that system, those who shall come into office after them, and render the same service, will be paid in the same way. If the compensation is sufficient for those who are about to go out of office, why not for those who may succeed them? Why not strike out the provision compensating officers in future? The plan that we, the minority of the committee, propose, will prevent those who have received compensation already from getting any more, as it authorizes the Department here to pay those who have not received what they are entitled to by law, (their maximum salary and percentage)—so much as will make up that amount, and no more; so that if any officer has received ten dollars less than he was entitled to, he will be paid by the Department that amount (if his locations by warrants would entitle him to so much) on the adjustment of his accounts here. Or, if another has received $1,300 less than he would have been thus entitled to, he may, on the same principle, receive that amount from the Department, when his accounts are adjusted. We see how perfectly that equalizes the matter, dispensing even justice all around.

I will now ask the attention of the House to the third section of the bill. It reads as follows:

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the act of which this act is explanatory, shall be so construed as to include all commissioned and non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates of militia, volunteers and rangers, who were mustered into the service of the United States for the suppression or prevention of Indian hostilities, or whose services of that character were recognized and paid by the United States prior to the passage of said act, and who served the length of time required by said act.

I like this section very well, and, in view of its comprehensive grasp, I am very much inclined to suggest that the title of the bill should be "An act extending," instead of "amendatory" "of a previous act." I will ask the chairman of the select committee, if he will allow me, whether he has any approximate knowledge as to the number of persons who will be embraced in this section?

Mr. DUNHAM. As a reply to the gentleman's interrogatory, I might refer to his own knowledge of the matter. On certain occasions he has manifested considerable anxiety upon the subject, and it was mainly through his efforts that this section was introduced into the bill.

Mr. BISSELL. Do not misunderstand me. I am for the section; and I am also in favor of the bill of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JOHNSON], which proposes to give land to every actual settler who will live upon and cultivate it. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. DUNHAM] and I cannot be at issue on this section. I thought it right, however, that the House should have some information as to the number that will be embraced under this section. It provides for all those who have been mustered into service for the suppression or prevention of Indian hostilities, or whose services of that character have been recognized and paid by the Government. I am for the section, but wish that it was still more comprehensive. So, as I said before, I am in favor of the bill of the gentleman from Tennessee, which one of these days I hope to help him to pass—so far as my vote goes at least. I think that it is a sensible and equitable bill, and I think this would be an equitable and sensible section were it carried further. But I suspect that the House will not vote it a law until they have more information than I possess as to the number and class of persons embraced by it.

Ever since the settlement of California there have been rumors of Indian disturbances there and expectations of Indian outbreaks. Are all those who may have been mustered into the service to prevent these outbreaks provided for by this section? I read in this morning's paper an item of news brought by the last steamer from California, to the effect that Major Jack Hays, whom we all recollect and admire, had proceeded towards San Diego with volunteers to prevent an apprehended rising of the Indians. Are he and his men included in this section? If they are not I insist they shall be. I have also a petition in my drawer from citizens in New Mexico, asking for land for a battalion of four companies raised there in 1849, by Colonel Washington, who are excluded by the present law. I would like to know whether that class of our New Mexican citizens—for I believe they were all New Mexicans—are embraced under this section. They served some six months, and so far as I learn their services have not been recognized and paid by the Government. If they are not embraced in this third section I will have none of it. A section so comprehensive as that might be extended a little further, so as to do justice all around. How many does it embrace of those who were called out by State authority, at various times, to prevent Indian hostilities in the Creek country—in Florida, and elsewhere in the South and West? The more that is included, I say the better, and yet I should like to have some knowledge as to the number whom we might finally embrace. A more general bill, a friend near remarks, would be more equitable.

Such important provisions as those contained in this bill, I repeat, should not be adopted by us without mature deliberation—to receive such deliberation the whole subject should go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

To the 4th section of the bill I have no objection. The 6th section is the only other one to which I will direct the attention of the House. It provides:

"That the warrants which have been, or may hereafter be issued, in pursuance of said act, or of this act, may be located upon any lands of the United States subject to private entry at the time of such location."

I will tell you what I think will be the practical operation of this section as indicated by past experience.

These warrants which are now issued, and which by this bill you are to issue, depend upon it, will very soon pass into the hands of speculators. Those who hold them for their own purpose, enter their land immediately or very soon. But I suppose that about nine tenths of the whole number sell their warrants for cash to speculators. Those who have money and disposition to speculate in lands buy these warrants for from $80 to $100, say at an average of about $90. These speculators will horde them up. When the poor emigrant wants a piece of land to live upon he takes the first piece of good land he reaches, lays his warrant, settles and cultivates it. The speculator, with his scores of warrants, lies back until a new and rich district is opened for sale. Before the day of sale comes on, he is there, by himself or his agent, with his warrants. He selects out the best lands in advance, and covers in a day thousands of acres with his warrants. Then he holds these lands—which instead of being entered at $200 for a hundred and sixty acres have cost him less than half that sum—till surrounding cultivation and improvements by actual settlers have enhanced their value fourfold. Then, for that enhanced price he sells them out for cash to emigrants desiring them for settlement. His ultimate profits are so great that he can well afford to retain his warrants for a long time before locating them, and hold his lands up from sale for a long time afterwards.

I think, therefore, that this section should be stricken out, and that you ought to place those who may hold these land warrants now proposed to be issued upon the same footing with those who took warrants under the acts already in force. Let them lay their warrants upon lands which were in market at the time the original bill was passed, or, if you please, upon those lands which are new in market. But do not extend their privileges in this particular any further.

There are lands enough already in the market, and good lands too, upon which these warrants can be laid. Why give so many, such accumulated advantages, to those who may speculate in these warrants? They are advantages which will rarely inure to the soldier, or original holder. No, no; restrict these locations by warrants to lands already in the market. It is no hardship to the warrant-holder. The soldier will never regard it as an injustice; and, as for the speculator, we care not for him.

In conclusion, I desire to say, that my friend from New Hampshire [Mr. Tuck] and myself, who constitute a minority of this committee, propose that this bill shall be sent to the Committee of the Whole, as I trust it will. We propose to make a counter-report in the shape of a bill, embracing all that we conceive to be good or desirable in the present bill, and free from its most manifest defects. Let it go to the Committee of the Whole, and when it has been there examined and discussed, with the aid of such information as we may get from the Departments, let us pass a better one in lieu of it.

Mr. TUCK. Mr. Speaker, I propose to—

Mr. HOUSTON. I would inquire if the morning hour has not expired?

The SPEAKER. It will expire in one minute.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman from New Hampshire had better let us pass to the unfinished business now, as there is but a moment left to him of the morning hour. I intend to move, as soon as the morning hour has expired, that we proceed to other business. This is a most unnecessary debate, because it proposes a reference of the bill at last.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Take the vote first upon the reference.

Mr. TUCK. I wish to inquire if I can be interrupted in my remarks?

The SPEAKER. It will be competent for gentlemen to arrest proceedings and call for the orders of the day.

Mr. HOUSTON. I will suggest to the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. Tuck] that he holds the floor for to-morrow morning upon this subject. There are bills upon the Speaker's table which it is very important should be referred to committees; and if the House will consent to pass to the orders of the day, and refer these bills, I would like it.

Mr. TUCK. I intend to proceed in the discussion of this subject, if it is the sense of the House to examine it. I have but little to say upon the greater part of this bill; but there is a proposition contained in it, which upon its face purports to be an act explanatory of an act, which deserves to be thoroughly considered by this House. I believe the only way in which this bill can ever be passed through the House, is to have it passed under circumstances that will give it a thorough examination. I notify the friends of the bill that it is my belief, if this bill should go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and is there discussed, that it will be killed dead, as it deserves to be. I believe that all, except a sectional portion of the country, would be satisfied to have this bill receive its quietus in Committee of the Whole, because there are propositions before the Senate which are sure to bring it up in a manner which will give us the opportunity of passing any enactment upon any subject embraced in this bill, which deserves our approbation. Gentlemen will not be committed by the loss of this bill—they will find other measures and other opportunities of procuring such enactment upon the subject as ought to pass this House—

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I now move—the morning hour having expired—that we proceed with the business upon the Speaker's table.

The question was then taken, and it was agreed to.

On motion by Mr. WILCOX, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of J. P. Montgomery, praying for compensation for services performed in the war with Mexico, be taken from the files of the House, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

DEFICIENCY ESTIMATES FROM THE INTERIOR DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER. The first business in order is the proposition to refer the report of the Secretary of the Interior, of estimates for deficiencies, to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and that it be printed.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. On yesterday, when this question was before the House, I moved to lay that report upon the table, because it had come here, as I believed then, and as I now believe, contrary to the law, and in violation of the uniform practice and custom of the Government and the Departments thereof. To show that I was not mistaken, I now propose to investigate that question for a short time, to see how these estimates for appropriations should come before the House of Representatives. By the act establishing the Treasury Department, approved September 2, 1789, it is provided by the second section: "That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to digest and prepare plans for the improvement and management of the revenue, and for the support of public credit; to prepare and report estimates of the public revenues, and the public expenditures."

Here is the first act passed by the Congress of the United States, establishing the Treasury Department. It is made the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to prepare his estimates of revenue and estimates of expenditure. There is no distinction made in them. It does not speak of one or another Department of this Government preparing and reporting estimates of the public revenue and expenditures. We find that another act, supplementary to an act entitled "An act to establish the Treasury Department," approved May 10, 1800, provides that "It shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to digest, prepare, and lay before Congress, at the commencement of every session, a report on the subject of finances, containing estimates of the public revenue and public expenditures, and plans for improving or increasing therevenues from time to time, for the purpose of giving information to Congress in adopting modes of raising the money requisite to meet the public expenditures."

Here is again the second act passed upon this subject in May, 1800, declaring it to be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to report directly to Congress upon the revenue and estimates of expenditure necessary to be made; and upon reflection, it will be seen, I think, that it was founded in wisdom and sound policy. Suppose that each and every one of the Departments shall make their own estimates, and submit them to Congress, either directly or through the President, how will the Secretary of the Treasury arrive at anything like a correct knowledge of the amount of revenue necessary to be raised in order to meet the expenditures of the Government? Is the Secretary of War to make his estimates and submit them to Congress, and the Secretary of the Interior and of the Navy are to come here separately, what will the Secretary of the Treasury base his estimates upon as to the amount of revenue necessary to meet the expenditures of the Government? But when they submit their estimates to him to be transmitted to the Congress of the United States, he has before him the amount which will be required. He then makes his estimates of the revenue to be received by the Government for the year. If there appears from his estimates of the revenue to be received that there is a surplus, he reports the fact. If there should appear to be a deficiency in his estimates of revenues to be received, then it is his duty to suggest plans and recommend the means by which the revenue shall be increased; or if he cannot present any plans satisfactory to himself which will raise the necessary amount of revenue, then it becomes his duty to recommend loan, and to what amount. I believe it was the uniform practice, from the act of 1800 down to 1846, for the Secretary of the Treasury to report his estimates with his annual financial report at the commencement of each session. And this has been the practice from the commencement of the Government to 1842, I believe. The fiscal year commenced upon the first of January, and ended upon the 31st of December of each year. If I mistake not, it was in 1842 that an act was passed altering the commencement and termination of the fiscal year, declaring that it should commence upon the first of July of each year, and end upon the 30th of June thereafter. The act approved August 26, 1842, provides "that on and after the first day of July in the year of our Lord 1843, the fiscal year of the Treasury of the United States, in all matters of accounts, receipts, expenditures, and appropriations, shall commence on the first day of July in each year; and the report of estimates required to be prepared and laid before Congress at the commencement of each session by the Secretary of the Treasury, in obedience to the acts of Congress of the 2d of September, 1789, and of May 10th, 1800, shall be a report of estimates for each fiscal year commencing as aforesaid and terminating on the 30th day of June in the succeeding calendar year." It is also made the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury, by the second section of this act, "to submit to Congress, at the commencement of the session, his annual report upon the state of the finances and estimates of appropriations required for the support of the Government for the half calendar year ending on the 30th day of June next, and particular and distinct estimates for the fiscal year ending on the 30th day of June, 1844."

It is again made the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury here in this act altering and fixing the commencement and termination of the fiscal year, to prepare his estimates of the revenue to be received and the expenditures to be made. In obedience to that act, they have continued to make these estimates and submit their annual report to the head of that Department up to the year 1846. If I am not mistaken, it was under this change of the fiscal year, that these large and uniform estimates for deficiencies commenced; and here it may be said that these laws requiring the Secretary of the Treasury to submit his estimates, apply to annual estimates and not to deficiencies. If that distinction be made, it will be found that the law contemplates no deficiency. It contemplates that the Secretary of the Treasury would have sufficient knowledge to make his estimates large enough to meet the expenditures of Government, and that they would be made accordingly. But we see here, when this fiscal year was changed, that there were at every session reported with the annual estimates, large estimates for deficiencies; and accordingly, in the annual report on the 4th of December, 1845, there were deficiency estimates submitted of $1,290,526 25. In the next estimate submitted on the 19th of November, 1846, being the first year of the war with Mexico, there were deficiencies of $5,459,700 72. In November 24, 1847, the deficiency estimates were $10,061,844 57. In November 16, 1848, the deficiency estimates were $3,744,903 69. In November 16, 1849, the deficiency estimates were $1,696,851 47. In November 23, 1850, the deficiency estimates were $2,575,305 64.

In each of these years the deficiency estimates were submitted at the same time that the annual estimates were for the then next fiscal year, and it was by the resolution of the 7th of January, 1846, that the Secretary of the Treasury was directed and required to make his estimates, have them prepared and printed, ready for delivery to members of Congress at the assembling of the body. The resolution reads:

"That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to cause his estimates of appropriations, which he is by law required to prepare and submit to Congress, to be printed, and copies of the same to be delivered to the Clerk of the House of Representatives in time for distribution at the commencement of each session; and that the Clerk distribute the said estimates in the manner in which documents printed by Congress are directed to be distributed."

There is another resolution of Congress relating to the acts of 1789 and 1800, directing that the estimates which the Secretary of the Treasury is required to prepare and submit to Congress shall be printed by him before the meeting of Congress, and that he have them ready for delivery when the members shall assemble. Now, the fiscal year having been changed, and not commencing until seven months after the session of Congress for which these estimates are submitted, why was it necessary to require that these estimates shall be printed and ready for delivery upon the assembling of Congress? It was that the members might have them at the earliest day, that they might investigate, report, and pass upon these appropriation bills in time. Then, if the reason would apply in the case of the estimates of appropriation for the year—not to commence until seven months after these estimates shall have been submitted—will it not apply with tenfold force for estimates required for the current fiscal year in time of the assembling of Congress? For instance, at the meeting of this session of Congress, we had the estimates required for the year commencing upon the 1st day of July, 1850, and terminating upon the 30th of June, 1852. Here was seven months to operate upon before one dollar of the estimates of the appropriation here submitted would be required for expenditure; and here is the present year terminating upon the 30th of June next, in which we have not one dollar of estimates required in addition to those heretofore submitted and appropriated for at the last session.

I say the reasons are tenfold stronger why we should have estimates submitted for deficiencies at the commencement of the session, than those which may be required for the succeeding year. I find it was the uniform practice, as I have before shown, from the time they were required to make these estimates and submit them. Here is the construction given to this joint resolution requiring these estimates to be printed. What does the present Secretary of the Treasury? In his estimate submitted to Congress at the last session, he tells you this—which he had printed and placed in the front of the volume which contained the annual estimates for this year—"that agreeably to the joint resolution of Congress of the 7th of January, 1846, I have the honor to transmit, for the information of the House of Representatives, printed estimates of additional appropriations proposed to be made for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1851, amounting to $2,575,305 64."

Here he informed us, at the last session, that it was agreeably to this joint resolution that he submitted the additional estimates for deficiencies which would be required for the year ending the 30th of June, 1851. Then, after he gave them, having received them doubtless, as these estimates show, from the various Departments, he, in obedience to the same resolution of the 7th of January, 1846, submits to Congress estimates for the fiscal year commencing the 1st of July, 1851, and terminating on the 30th of June next. The present, I believe, is the first instance in which the Secretary of the Treasury has failed to submit those deficiency estimates with the estimates for the succeeding year. Why is it done upon this occasion? I am wholly at a loss to see what has influenced the officers of Government to take this course of separating their estimates, and sending them in here, each upon his own individual responsibility. But it must be for one of two reasons—either that this Administration has no unity, or that the heads of the Departments under this Administration are not upon such friendly terms and intercourse, that they can harmonize, and that each one sets up for himself. It must be that they are not inclined to let them come in together, and show the amount at one view.

Now, what have we exhibited to us at this time? No estimates for deficiencies were submitted by the Secretary of the Treasury at the commencement of the session. Some weeks after we have been in session, the Secretary of the Navy comes in with estimates for deficiencies required in his Department, of $219,000. He sent that report here, and when it was read at the desk—the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means being confined to his room—I moved to refer it to that committee, and to have it printed.

The irregularity and illegality of its introduction into the House did not occur to me at the moment. Yesterday we received a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, enclosing estimates for deficiencies in his own Department, and another enclosing estimates for deficiencies in the War Department. The Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of the Navy have not sent in their estimates through the Treasury Department, but have, I believe, for the first time in the history of the Government, sent them directly to this House. I have been unable to find any law which authorizes either of those officers to communicate directly to either branch of Congress, upon the amount of money which may be required to defray the expenses of their several Departments.

Now, what is the amount of the deficiencies for the present year? Why, as I before said, the Secretary of the Navy, some days ago, submitted his estimates to the House, asking for $219,000 to meet the deficiency in the appropriations for the current year ending June 30th, 1852. Then the Secretary of the Treasury submits estimates for his own Department, for $29,250, and he also submits estimates for the War Department to the amount of $2,516,012—making altogether the aggregate amount of $3,428,338 70 asked for by these various Heads of Departments for deficiencies.

When we look to the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury, submitted to Congress a few days since, we find that he estimates the receipts and expenditures for the fiscal year ending June 30th, 1852. He estimates the receipts for that time from all sources and the money in the Treasury, at $62,411,645 68 cents. He then estimates the expenditures for the year—giving the actual expenditure for the first quarter of the fiscal year, and estimating the expenditure for the three remaining quarters—and shows that, according to his estimate, the expenditures for the current year will be $50,952,902 59. Now, he must have had the estimates from the Secretaries of the Interior and Navy by him before he could make this estimate with such exact nicety, with such precise particularity, as to come even to the odd cents in a sum of over fifty millions of dollars. If he had them at the time, why did he not send them to us with the other estimates? If he did not have them, how did he come to his conclusion as to the precise amount, to a cent, that would be required during the year? If he did not have the estimates from those Departments, but made out his estimate without the deficiencies which we are now told are required by the Secretary of the Interior and by the Secretary of the Navy, then, instead of this report of his being correct, it will require over a million of dollars more for the year than he has estimated for. And if that state of the case is correct, how does he know for what amount of revenue to estimate? The estimates of the Secretary of the Interior, submitted on yesterday, amount to $693,327, and those of the Navy Department, sent in a few days ago, amount to $219,000—making altogether estimates for over $900,000, which have come in here, as far as we know or have a right to presume, without the knowledge of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Now this question is, I think, of more importance than would perhaps strike a person at first blush. This is, I believe, the commencement of this thing; it is the first step, and if we tolerate it now, it will go on and get the finances of the country, and the business of the Treasury Department into such inextricable confusion that, in the course of a few years, it will be impossible for the head of the Department, or anybody else, to understand anything about the state and condition of the Department, and of the finances of the country. That is, in my opinion, the soundest and best policy, which requires the Secretary of the Treasury to estimate for all the receipts and all the expenditures of the Government. The other heads of the Departments have nothing whatever to do with estimating how the revenues are to be raised, and where the means are to come from to meet the expenditures which they propose, and it is therefore only through the Treasury Department that these estimates can legitimately, legally, and properly come before the Congress of the United States for their action. I hope the House will take such a course as will have this thing corrected now at the very threshold, so that we may have no more of it.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Bissell] told us to-day, that he believes there will be a change of Administration next March twelve months. It may be so, and I hope it will, and for that reason, I do not want any of these wrong and illegal precedents set to be followed by the Democratic party when it shall come into power. I want them to have no such footsteps as these to tread in, but to have things done according to law, according to custom, and according to sound policy and wisdom. Now is the proper time to check this practice, when it is first attempted to be commenced in the Congress of the United States. Let us go in the good old way. If we cannot improve upon it, for God's sake, do not let us make it worse.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. I shall not follow the gentleman from Tennessee—

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee, (interposing.) With the permission of the gentleman from Virginia, I wish to make a suggestion. A few days since we had a bill before us to appropriate $3,000,000 to meet the Mexican indemnity; and it was urged upon us that we ought to pass that bill before we adjourned upon that day. I would merely suggest, therefore, if it would not be better for us to go into Committee of the Whole now, take up that bill, and pass it. The gentleman's remarks can as well be made at any other time. He himself urged upon us the other day the necessity of immediately passing the bill to which I have referred, and I hope therefore that he will not now delay that bill merely for the sake of making a speech.

Mr. BAYLY. I am not going to follow the gentlemen from Tennessee [Mr. Jones] through the whole course of his remarks. I have very little to say, and that little I can say in a few minutes; and then the House may take such action with reference to its business as to the House may seem best. With respect to the remarks made by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Johnson] about my having—when the Mexican indemnity bill was last up—urged the importance of its immediate passage, he will recollect that I made that statement in deference to the chairman of the Ways and Means. That gentleman, for reasons which he stated, said that the passage of this bill would be delayed—and it has turned out so—unless it was passed then, and I yielded to his suggestion.

I will say further, with reference to that Mexican indemnity bill, that I understand a memorial is to come before Congress in relation to it; and for one—as a few days will not be a matter of very great consequence—I would prefer, if it suits the convenience of the chairman of the Ways and Means, that that memorial should come in before the bill is taken up again. There are a good many things in connection with that bill that require to be explained, so that this House and the country may understand it better than they now do.

Mr. HOUSTON. In reply to the suggestion of the gentleman from Virginia, I will merely say that it is my purpose, at the earliest possible moment, to move to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and take up that bill. From the indications in all parts of the House, there is to be a long debate upon it, and during that debate the memorial to which the gentleman refers can come in if it comes in at all.

I do not intend to endeavor to press the bill to an immediate vote; but as there must be a debate upon it, I desire that it shall be progressing.

Mr. BAYLY. I desire to say to the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. Houston,] that during the whole Congress, he will not find me disposed to object to any course he may suggest in respect to the business of this House which he has especially in charge, because I know the indispensable necessity that he should, to a very great extent, have his own way. But I shall not detain the House ten minutes, for, as I have already said, I do not mean to go over the ground that has been occupied by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES.] What little I have to say, I propose to say at once.

It will be recollected that, on yesterday, when the communication came from the Secretary of the Interior, submitting the estimates of deficiencies, the gentleman from Tennessee got up and said it was a violation of law, and moved to return the communication to the Secretary. As that course had not been pursued with any of the other Secretaries, I thought that it was designed to show official discourtesy to the Secretary of the Interior. Now, although he and I have differed as politicians, from the time that we were class-mates at College to this hour, yet we have always been upon terms of the most intimate personal relations, and when, therefore, I saw the House disposed to select him out from the others as an object to whom indignity was to be shown, under a mistake, as I stated at the time, I felt it due to him, and due to the State of which we are both sons, that I should suggest that in this matter there had been no violation of law and nothing unusual.

This morning, when I found that the gentleman from Tennessee was disposed to press this matter, I suggested to him that the matter had better be dropped—saying that I had no disposition to vindicate the statement I had made, that there had been no violation of law. My friend declined the overtures I made to let the matter pass without debate; and since he has gone into the subject, there is no alternative left me but to reply to him, or let the statement I made go unvindicated.

I shall confine myself to the single point that, in sending these estimates here, the Secretary of the Interior has done nothing illegal or unusual, and that therefore there is nothing which would justify this House in offering an indignity to him. As to all the other matters of which the gentleman from Tennessee has spoken, some political friend of the Secretary of the Interior may defend him, if he supposes a defence necessary—which I do not.

In 1846, the Congress of the United States passed a joint resolution, the title of which is as follows:

"Joint Resolution relative to the printing and distribution of the annual estimates.

"Resolved, &c., That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to cause the estimates of appropriations, which he is by law required to prepare and submit to Congress, to be printed, and copies of the same to be delivered to the Clerk of the House of Representatives in time for distribution at the commencement of each session; and that the Clerk distribute the said estimates in the manner in which documents printed by Congress are directed to be distributed.

"APPROVED January 7, 1846."

Now, the gentleman from Tennessee says that in the eye of the law, there is no distinction between casual estimates for deficiencies and annual estimates. Let us see how that matter is. The gentleman has already read to you the law of 1789, organizing the Treasury Department. That law referred to the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury, and not what we now refer to as estimates; but let us see how it is in the subsequent legislation of Congress. On the 10th of May, 1800, Congress passed the following law:

"That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to digest, prepare, and lay before Congress at the commencement of every session, a report on the subject of finance, containing estimates of the public revenue, and of the public expenditures, and plans for improving or increasing the revenues, from time to time, for the purpose of giving information to Congress in adopting modes of raising the money requisite to meet the public expenditures."

That law also refers to the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury required to be made by law. Now let us look to the still subsequent legislation.

The next law upon the subject is the act of 1820, in the 8th section of which it was enacted:

"That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to annex to the annual estimates of the appropriations required for the public service, a statement of the appropriations for the services of the year which may have been made by former acts, and also a statement of the sums remaining in the Treasury or in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury as the agent of the War and Navy Departments, from the appropriations of former years, estimating the amount of each sum which will not be required to defray the expenses incurred the previous year, and showing the whole amount which will be subject to the disposition of the executive Government in the year to which the estimates apply."

By the act of 1842 it was enacted—

"That it shall be the duty of the several heads of Departments, in communicating estimates of expenditures and appropriations to Congress or to any of the committees thereof, to specify as nearly as may be convenient, the sources from which such estimates are derived, and the calculations upon which they are founded; and in so doing to discriminate between such estimates as are conjectural in their character, and such as are framed upon actual information and application from disbursing officers; and in communicating the several estimates reference shall be given to the laws and treaties by which they are authorized, the dates thereof, and the volume, page, and section, in which the necessary provisions are contained."

Now, here you will observe is the first law which contemplates anything else than the annual report from the Treasury Department. It will be observed that the law of 1842 contemplates the submission of estimates by any of the heads of the Departments, not only to the Secretary of the Treasury; but to Congress or any of the committees thereof. The law of 1846 changed the law in that respect; but it changed it only in relation to the annual estimates, and not to casual or unforeseen estimates. Since 1846, all the annual estimates have been made from the several departments to the Secretary of the Treasury. Since then the annual estimates have been sent in by the Treasury Department. And it ought to be so, for the reason that the gentleman from Tennessee has assigned, that when the Secretary of the Treasury was asking Congress for appropriations for a year yet to arrive, he could not estimate properly for the amount of revenue to be raised, unless he was informed of the amount which it was contemplated would be expended. But that reasoning does not apply to deficiencies, because the revenue for the current year has already been ascertained to a great extent, and there is no necessity, therefore, of going to the Secretary of the Treasury for these estimates, because we have before us the precise state of the Treasury; we know whether the condition of the Treasury, as reported by the Secretary, will bear these appropriations asked for the services of the fiscal year, and if the state of the Treasury will not bear it we must accompany the appropriations for deficiencies either with a tax or with authority for a loan.

But, sir, what has been the practice? It is true that at the last session of Congress, when there were very large deficiencies known to exist before the meeting of Congress, the Secretary of the Treasury did send in an estimate for the deficiencies bill. But does not the gentleman from Tennessee know—I will not even put the question in that form, but assert the proposition positively, because I know such to be the fact—the gentleman from Tennessee knows, that after the Secretary of the Treasury had sent in that estimate for deficiencies, there came, addressed to the Committee of Ways and Means, additional estimates for deficiencies from the heads of other Departments, not through the Secretary of the Treasury at all. We received such additional estimates from the War and Navy Departments, the Interior Department, including the Pension Bureau, the Indian Bureau, and, indeed, from nearly all the Departments and the Bureaus. The gentleman knows that he and I complained during the whole session that we could never know when they had done asking for appropriations. Day after day, during the whole session, additional estimates were coming, directed not to this House, but to the Committee of Ways and Means; and such has been the case ever since I have been in Congress, which is not quite so long as the gentleman from Tennessee has been here.

Why is it, this House may ask, that this estimate has been sent to the House, through its Speaker, rather than in the usual and ordinary mode—to the Committee of Ways and Means, through its chairman? I have not seen Mr. Stuart; but my colleague, [Mr. LETCHER,] who represents the district in which that gentleman resides, has informed me this morning that Mr. Stuart had authorized him to say, that it had been sent to the Speaker of the House rather than to the Committee of Ways and Means—which is the usual course of proceeding—at the special instance and request of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. HOUSTON. I intend to reply to the remarks of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. BAYLY,] if I can get the floor when he is through. I will, however, upon this point say that there must be some mistake. I have never exchanged a single word with the Secretary of the Interior since I came here, until last night.

Mr. LETCHER. I think I can explain this matter. Being the immediate representative from the county from which the Secretary of the Interior comes, I went to him this morning for the purpose of ascertaining something about this matter which had raised such a disturbance in the House yesterday. While there, he sent for Mr. Harrington, the Chief Clerk in the Treasury Department, and that gentleman stated to Mr. Stuart that the Committee of Ways and Means had instructed them to send their estimates directly to the House, instead of sending them to the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. HOUSTON. I desire to make a single explanation in connection with the point now presented here. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LETCHER] and the House will see that the statement made by him is wholly incorrect—is entirely unfounded. A few days since I was at the Treasury Department, when the Acting Secretary of the Treasury told me that he intended to send estimates to the Committee of Ways and Means from the Treasury Department, asking that committee to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to build or purchase six revenue-cutters. The Acting Secretary and the Chief Clerk of the Treasury Department (Mr. Harrington)—who had come in—insisted that the legal mode was to communicate with the Committee of Ways and Means and to send the estimates, for those things, there. I told them that the only regular course was to send their estimates directly to Congress, and not to that committee. Now, that conversation applied solely to the action of the Secretary of the Treasury. It had no reference to the head of any other Department. The gentleman from Virginia and the House will, therefore, see that the Secretary of the Interior and the Chief Clerk of the Treasury Department are entirely mistaken in making any such statement.

Mr. LETCHER. One word more. I imagine that when that communication was made by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means [Mr. HOUSTON] to the Secretary of the Treasury and his Chief Clerk, that the various Departments of the Government connected with the Treasury Department were probably—

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman is mistaken. Our conversation was confined to one point exclusively, and that point had reference to the Secretary of the Treasury alone, and not to the head of any other Department. I requested the Secretary of the Treasury to send his communication directly to the House, and not to the Committee of Ways and Means. But the point was not brought up at all, as to whether the head of any other Department, or the head of any bureau, should communicate through that Department or directly to the House, or to the Committee of Ways and Means. That is my explanation.

Mr. LETCHER. Well, it seems there was a conversation in relation to the mode of communicating between the Treasury Department, and of course between the various other Departments connected with that Department and the House.

Mr. HOUSTON. Not the various Departments. It related to none but the Treasury Department.

Mr. LETCHER. It has been contended in the whole course of this argument, from the commencement of this controversy to the present time, that the Secretary of the Interior was under the control and management of the Secretary of the Treasury, so far as these communications in regard to estimates of the expenditures of his Department are concerned. Now, I can very readily see how it might occur upon this occasion, in the conversation between the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means and the Secretary of the Treasury, and his Chief Clerk, that the conclusion might have been drawn precisely as it has been drawn by Mr. Stuart, and those in his Department connected with him. Every gentleman knows, I apprehend, because most gentlemen here have been in Congress longer than I have, that as far as these communications from the Departments to Congress are concerned, they are generally made through a clerk in each of the Departments, who are well acquainted with the proper forms to be used. They are prepared by the clerks, and are sent to the Secretary of the Interior or Secretary of the Treasury, or the head of the Department to which they may belong for their official signatures, and to receive the proper legal sanction.

Now, in relation to this matter about which so much disturbance has been raised. I understand the whole amount of it is this: A clerk in the Department of the Interior prepared this communication for the Secretary of the Interior, and he, under the belief that there was nothing disrespectful or improper in it, sent it to this House.

There is another point of view which I desire to notice, if my colleague [Mr. BAYLY] will indulge me for a moment. The argument of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES,] this morning, goes to show that the estimates of the revenues and expenditures of the Government shall annually come from the Secretary of the Treasury to the Speaker of this body. Now, were not these very deficiencies, which is the subject of this complaint now, estimated for in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury last year? Did not he present his estimates then, not only of the incoming revenue, but of the expenses of the Government, at that very time; and did not those estimates and these expenditures cover this matter now the subject of consideration? I understand that at the last session of Congress appropriations were not made for the sums asked for by the Secretary of the Interior, through the Secretary of the Treasury, and these deficiencies may have occurred in that way. It seems to me that the whole thing came here properly enough, and knowing Mr. Stuart, as I do, and regarding him personally, as I do, to be a most excellent man, I have no idea that he would send a communication here in a manner not authorized by this House.

Mr. STANLY. I think this matter has already consumed more time than it is worth. I have no doubt that the explanation given by both the gentlemen from Virginia will satisfy the House in regard to the course taken by Mr. Stuart. I move the previous question.

Mr. HOUSTON. I hope the gentleman from North Carolina will withdraw the call for the previous question. I do not wish to occupy much time.

Mr. STANLY. Will the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means be responsible for the delay?

Mr. HOUSTON. If I had not been improperly drawn into this debate, I should have had no cause for asking its withdrawal.

Mr. STANLY. I will withdraw it for the chairman, as I am only his lieutenant on the Committee of Ways and Means. I only desire that we should get along with the public business.

Mr. HOUSTON. I do not intend to occupy much time in the remarks I have to make upon the subject, and shall confine myself to the point now directly before the House. I said in my remarks yesterday, that I did not believe the Secretary of the Interior had pursued the course which he had done with any purpose of acting in violation of the law. I said further, that I did not think he deserved the rebuke which was intended by the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES.] I believe I put it upon proper grounds. What I censure most is, that he is endeavoring to shift the responsibility from himself, and place it upon me.

Mr. LETCHER. Will the gentleman give way for one moment?

Mr. HOUSTON. Certainly.

Mr. LETCHER. The gentleman entirely misapprehends me. I did not understand, nor did I desire to be understood by this House, that Mr. Stuart wished to make up an issue with the Committee of Ways and Means. I called upon Mr. Stuart this morning and inquired into this matter, when the conversation related by me occurred. If the gentleman supposes that the Secretary of the Interior desires to place him in any difficulty, he entirely misapprehends me; as did the House, if they so understood me.

Mr. HOUSTON. While I am in favor, as I was in favor on yesterday, of referring this communication to the Committee of Ways and Means, and having it printed, yet I cannot subscribe to the doctrine that has been advanced by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. BAYLY.] I understand that gentleman to place his defence of the Secretary of the Interior upon two leading points. One of which is, that it is no violation of law; the other is, that it is in strict conformity with the usages of the House. Upon these points, I take issue with the gentleman from Virginia; and to sustain my position I have but to refer to the law of 1789, creating the Treasury Department, referred to by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES.] It goes on to make it the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to prepare and submit to Congress, estimates of the appropriations needed by the Government. Then the amendatory act passed in May, 1800, reiterates, substantially, all that was contained in the law of 1789, making it the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to prepare these estimates, and submit them to Congress. But the gentleman says that the law of the 10th of May, 1800, applied exclusively to estimates for expenditures, of which the Secretary became apprised before the meeting of Congress. This could not be otherwise. He must have time to form his opinions and digest his plans, in order to arrive at his conclusions of what the expenditures will be. This law reiterates, substantially, all in the law of 1789, which created the Treasury Department, and makes it the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to make these reports; and in doing so, gives the reason why he is required to do it. The law says he must do it, that he may be enabled to prepare his estimates to correspond with the means he has on hand, and the estimates of the revenue to be derived from all sources. That is a good reason, and I ask why it does not apply as well to deficiencies as to the annual estimates? I think the remark of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES,] that the law creating this Department never contemplated any deficiencies, is a very true one. It was expected that the Secretaries of the Treasury would, in their respective reports, present estimates amply sufficient to carry on the Government for the ensuing year, and that no deficiency would be called for; hence, there is nothing said in the law upon the subject of deficiencies. But let us illustrate this subject still further. We say that the Secretary of the Treasury must prepare and digest his plans, and submit his estimates of the expenditure and of the revenue. And for what reason? It is that he may make the expenditure and means correspond. But here, after he does that—after he submits his estimates of receipt and expenditure—we are called upon to make appropriations of which he has no knowledge—which we have received from other departments and bureaus of the Government, and which, as a matter of course, must disarrange all his plans and estimates. It is the duty of that officer of the Government at least to make the receipts balance the expenditures, so that the receipts shall not fall below the expenditures, and that the Government shall not, in times like these, become involved and embarrassed with debt. How, then, can he make the estimates, how adjust the plans, how know what amount of revenue is necessary to be raised, unless all this information comes through him, and is communicated to him? The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BAYLY] refers to the law of 1842, read by him, which speaks of communicating with Congress, or with the heads of committees. Now the object of that law is very plain. It was to enable the committees of Congress, when estimates had been submitted to them, to have communication with the heads of Departments, and to obtain from them the necessary explanations of the appropriations sought.

[Cries of "Read the law!" "Read the law!"]

Mr. H. continued: Gentlemen say, read it, and I have but to read it to sustain the views and the position I have taken. It is thus:

"And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the several heads of Departments, in communicating estimates of expenditures and appropriations to Congress, and to any of the committees thereof, to specify, as nearly as may be convenient, the sources from which such estimates are derived, and the calculations upon which they are founded; and, in so doing, to discriminate between such estimates as are conjectural in their character, and such as are framed upon actual information and application from disbursing officers," &c.

Now, Mr. Speaker, you must see at a glance that the object of that law was to enable the committee to obtain the precise information they might desire, of the subjects upon which they had to act, and to enable them, without coming back to the House, to go directly to the Departments and ask them for the necessary explanations, in reference to the appropriation sought.

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BAYLY] says that the Secretary of the Interior, in sending his estimates directly to this body, has done nothing unusual. In that I also differ with him. I presume if he should endeavor to furnish us with a precedent, he would find it quite difficult to do—I think I could venture to say, impossible to do. I am sure he could not make it appear to be usual. Mr. Speaker, so far from this being in conformity to the usage of the heads of Departments, the very reverse is the case. The Secretary of the Treasury reports directly to Congress, in pursuance of express law. The other Secretaries do not. Even their annual reports are made to the President of the United States, and by him sent to Congress; so I lay it down as true, that there is no case in which the other Secretaries report directly to this body, except, perhaps, they might do so in reply to a resolution calling upon them, and even that is acknowledged by all to be very irregular and unusual. But again: The Secretary of the Treasury is responsible for the estimates of all the Departments, and when furnished to him by the other Secretaries, he can refuse to send them to Congress. He can increase or diminish them as he may see fit. And why is this so? It is so because of his duty and responsibility under the law. It is made his duty, as I have before said, to prepare and submit to Congress plans of raising revenue, and also estimates of the public expenses. It is given him to manage the finances of the Government. The law makes it his duty, and devolves upon him the responsibility; and how can he, or why should he, be justly held accountable, if you deprive him of the control, in whole or in a material part, of the subject? If this Government, in time of peace, should be so managed as to contract a large debt—I mean in its ordinary fiscal operations—public indignation would be aroused, and the condemnation would be loud; but would the bad management be charged upon the Secretary of the Interior? Surely not. He is not our financial officer; he has no control over the revenues, nor has the other Secretaries, except the Secretary of the Treasury. So he is the one who would be censured, because he has full control over all estimates to be submitted, and they all should, in pursuance of law and usage, undergo his supervision and action.

Mr. Speaker, it was not my intention to have occupied much of the time and, especially as I see indications from all parts of the House of a desire to proceed to business at once, I do not feel at liberty to occupy any more time.

[Cries of "Call the previous question!" from several members.]

Mr. H. Gentlemen say I must call the previous question. Although I dislike to make a speech and then move the previous question, still, in accordance with the general wish, I will do so. I will say, at the same time, that I am, as I was yesterday, in favor of referring the report to the Committee of Ways and Means. I do not think any wrong was intended on the part of the Secretary of the Interior. I have made these remarks merely that this Department may know what my views are, as one of the humble members of this body.

The previous question then received a second, and the main question was ordered.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I move to lay the communication upon the table.

Upon this motion the yeas and nays were demanded, and ordered.

The question was then taken upon the motion of Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, to lay the communication upon the table; and there were—yeas 56, nays 111; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Aiken, Willis Allen, Averett, Bissell, Bocoek, Bragg, Bushy, Joseph Cable, Critter, Chastain, Churchwell, Daniel, John G. So the House refused to lay it on the table.

The question recurring on the motion to refer to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, it was put and decided in the affirmative.

THE PUBLIC PRINTING.

Mr. HOUSTON. It is so late that I will not move that the House go into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of taking up the Mexican indemnity bill. I desire now to make a statement to the House, and shall not occupy much time. I have drawn up a resolution upon the subject. It is a matter in which the House ought to do something immediately, and for that reason I must trespass upon their patience for a few minutes. The Committee of Ways and Means are required to report a portion of their appropriation bills within thirty days after the committee has been appointed by the Speaker. The present committee has not complied with that rule, and I may say that no other preceding committee has complied with it. I desire to give the House the reasons why we have not done so, and that of itself will bring the subject to the attention of the House. The Committee of Ways and Means at this session of Congress would have had in all the appropriation bills which the rule requires reported within the thirty days, if the public printer had furnished them with the printed reports of the heads of the Departments and bureaus necessary to enable them to act. We have reported several days since all the bills that the Committee of Ways and Means can possibly act upon with any degree of understanding, or any degree of satisfaction, either to themselves or the House, until the public printer shall furnish the House with the President's message and accompanying documents. We have been laboring upon a portion of the bills yet behind. We have made personal calls upon the heads of bureaus and departments, in order to obtain that information which will enable us to act, and we find our labors will be interminable if we pursue that course. Hence we have determined to bring the whole subject before the House, that it may take such action as it sees fit in the premises. For instance, take the Navy bills, in which there are large expenditures involved. The Committee of Ways and Means are called upon to make large appropriations—unusually large—for the various navy-yards, and these estimates are printing and as yet we have not one solitary word of explanation before the Committee of Ways and Means. If we had seen fit to adopt the estimates submitted to us by the heads of the Departments, and committed to that committee by this House, we could have had the bills here; but we preferred to examine those estimates, and have done so, so far as we have acted. The bills now not acted upon by the Committee of Ways and Means contain many items that require explanation from the departments or bureaus of the Government. These explanations are in the hands of the public printer, and have been ever since the reference of the President's message. We have, as yet, received no copy of them. Now it is impossible for us, under these circumstances, to act upon the appropriation bills which are behind. It is impossible for the committee to discharge any additional duty devolved upon it in connection with these appropriation bills until the House shall do something that will enable us to obtain the information upon which we can act.

It may be said, possibly, that the President's message and accompanying documents are larger than usual. Within the last few years I know, as well as other members of this House who have paid any attention to this subject, that the size of that document is largely increased; but that should not prevent its coming to us in the usual time. The usual time for laying that document upon the tables of members has been from two to four weeks after the commencement of the session. I understand that has been the practice. If the number of pages and amount of matter and labor necessary to be bestowed upon the work are largely increased, then it is proper that the public printer should increase his force to correspond and keep pace with the increase of work and labor, so that the documents should be placed upon the tables of members within the usual time. I intend to introduce a resolution to instruct the Committee on Printing to inquire into the condition of the public printing, and report to this House the character of the work.

The resolution was then read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Printing be instructed to examine into, and report to the House, the condition of the public printing—whether the public printer is not acting in violation of his contract, not only as to the time of delivering the printing to the House, but also in the character of his work, and the quality of the material used in said work.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. STANLY. I object.

Mr. HOUSTON resumed. I was only about to say, that as far as the printing obtained from the public printer is concerned, the paper is inferior, and the execution of the work is infinitely below the style demanded by his contract.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. STANLY. I objected to that resolution distinctly, a few minutes since.

Mr. HOUSTON. I will not insist upon it, if there is any objection to it.

The SPEAKER. The resolution proposed by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Houston] is objected to.

Mr. DUNHAM. I submit whether the objection does not come too late, as the Chair had propounded the question to the House?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has no disposition to deprive the gentleman of his privilege under the rule, and he has no doubt the objection was made.

Mr. HOUSTON. I will briefly respond to the suggestion of the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. Stanly], that in a conference with members of the Printing Committee, they say that they will report back a resolution at once, recommending prompt action.

The SPEAKER. Discussion is out of order.

Mr. CLARK. I beg leave to introduce a joint memorial of the Legislature of Iowa and Minnesota, with a bill for the benefit of the Territory of Minnesota and the State of Iowa, and I move their reference to the Committee on Public Lands.

There being no objection, the bill was introduced, read a first and second time by its title, and referred, with the accompanying documents, to the Committee on Public Lands.

On motion, the House then adjourned.

NOTICES OF BILLS.

By Mr. SMITH: A bill supplemental to the act entitled "An act to enable the State of Arkansas and the other States, to reclaim their swamp lands."

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. M. BUTLER.

PETITIONS.

Mr. MORTON. I have been requested to present the memorial of George D. Fisher, one of the assistant marshals of the United States, employed in taking the Seventh Census in the State of Florida. He states, in a communication addressed to me and which I beg leave to present with the memorial, that while he was engaged in taking the census of Santa Rosa county, he traveled more than fourteen hundred miles, and was assiduously and laboriously engaged for upwards of three months; and he says that whether he estimates his compensation by the square root of the miles, or the cube root of the families, it amounts to but little more than a hundred dollars. He asks, therefore, for additional compensation.

The memorial was referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. MORTON. I also beg leave to present a memorial, signed by many citizens of Apalachicola, in the State of Florida, asking that remuneration be made to Samuel Bray, for losses in a gale which prevailed on that coast, on the 21st, 23d, and 24th days of August last. It appears that Mr. Bray was the keeper of the light-house on Dog Island, and that that terrific gale swept away the light-house and the residence of the keeper; that he lost all of his effects, even to his clothing; that five members of his household were swept away by the tornado, and perished, and that one of his children perished in his arms. The citizens of Apalachicola in this petition, numerous signed, ask that Mr. Bray be remunerated for the loss of his property. It is a case which appeals to the kindly sympathies of our nature, and I hope it will receive the favorable and liberal action of the Senate. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

It was so referred.

Mr. CLARKE. I am requested to present the petition of the assistant marshals of the State of Rhode Island, asking additional compensation. They state that the compensation awarded them by the act of Congress, is wholly insufficient. I have a letter from the marshal himself, stating that the compensation is much less, according to the labor done, than the compensation for taking the census of 1840. And with that, he has given a statement of the census returns, giving the statistics required by law, which shows that an immense amount of information has been secured by these returns, and that the assistant marshals had a vast amount of labor to perform in order to obtain it.

The memorial was referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. DOUGLAS presented the memorial of Samuel H. Kettlewell, lately attached to the commission for running and marking the boundary line between the United States and Mexico, praying pay and traveling expenses; which was referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. BORLAND presented the petition of William Field, clerk of the United States district court for Arkansas, praying payment for services in making statements of the proceedings under the bankrupt law, made in pursuance of a resolution of the House of Representatives; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. FELCH submitted a joint resolution of the Legislature of Michigan, recommending the payment of a balance due, under the treaty between the United States and the Ottawa and Chippewa nations of Indians, concluded at Washington on the 28th March, 1836; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. FISH presented the memorial of Edward K. Collins and his associates, praying additional facilities in transporting the mail between New York and Liverpool; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. FOOT presented the petition of Thomas Cowperthwaite & Co., proposing to furnish the Government with copies of the reports of the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States for distribution; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa, presented the petition of Stephen P. Yeomans and others, praying that certain arrears of pension due Zachariah S. Conger may be paid to his widow; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. STOCKTON presented the petition of Thomas Copeland, praying compensation for improvements in machinery at the Gosport navy-yard; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. PEARCE presented the petition of Charles Fletcher, praying that a charter may be granted to him and his associates, for the construction of a railroad from the District of Columbia to the Point of Rocks, in Maryland; which was referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

ALABAMA ON INTERVENTION.

Mr. CLEMENS presented two enrolled joint resolutions, expressive of the sense of the General Assembly of Alabama in relation to the policy to be pursued by our Government in its intercourse with foreign nations; which were read as follows, and ordered to be printed:

Enrolled Joint Resolutions, expressive of the sense of the General Assembly of Alabama in relation to the policy to be pursued by our Government in its intercourse with foreign nations:

Whereas from many indications of popular feeling in some of the States of this Government, and from the speeches and acts of many public men, high in the confidence of their own constituents, and in that of the people of the United States, we are led to the belief that a spirit of interference in the political affairs of the European continent prevails to so great an extent as to induce the fear, that for the want of calm reflection we may be involved in all the troubles and difficulties of the political affairs of nations and people far removed from us:

Be it therefore resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Alabama in General Assembly convened, That we hold it to be the duty of the Government and the people of the United States to cultivate relations of amity and good will with all the nations of the earth; in peace to treat all as friends—in war enemies; and to have entangling alliances with none, and to practice literally the doctrine of non-intervention.

Resolved, That the Governor be requested to forward these resolutions to our Senators and Representatives in Congress, with a request to lay the same before their respective bodies.

JOHN D. RATHER,

Speaker of the House of Representatives.

CHARLES MCLEMORE,

President of the Senate.

H. W. COLLIER.

Edwards, reported a bill to provide for placing certain medical officers of the Navy, who rendered service on land in Mexico, on the same footing with medical officers of the Army for similar services; which was read and passed to the second reading.

He also submitted a report on the subject; which was ordered to be printed.

NOTICE OF BILL.

Mr. SEBASTIAN gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill to release from reservation, and restore to the mass of public lands, certain lands in the State of Arkansas.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. BORLAND, agreeably to previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill granting to the State of Arkansas the right of way and a portion of the public land, to aid in the construction of the Arkansas Central Railroad from a point on the western bank of the Mississippi river, opposite the town of Memphis, Tennessee, via Little Rock, to a point on Red river, on the border of Texas; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. FELCH submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

BILL PASSED.

The bill to admit a certain vessel to registry was read the third time, and passed with an amended title.

BINDING OF CONGRESSIONAL DOCUMENTS.

Mr. BORLAND. I am directed by the Committee on Printing, who a few days since reported a House resolution on the subject of binding the public documents, and which was laid upon the table, to ask that it be now taken up for consideration. It is a joint resolution of the House, and was referred to the Committee on Printing, and reported from that committee, and on motion, I believe, it was laid upon the table.

The PRESIDENT. The joint resolution to which the Senator from Arkansas refers is on the general orders. The proposition must be to postpone the general orders, and to take up that resolution.

Mr. BORLAND. My supposition was that it was laid upon the table.

The PRESIDENT. No, sir; it is on the general orders.

Mr. BORLAND. Then I move to postpone all the prior orders and to take up that resolution.

Mr. MALLORY. I do not know how much time will be occupied in the consideration of this resolution; but with the permission of the Senator from Arkansas, I would observe that the hour of one has arrived, and that I should like to finish the remarks which I commenced yesterday, and I will not detain the Senate long.

Mr. BORLAND. I do not suppose that this resolution will occupy any time, for I am not aware that there is any disposition to discuss it. I am opposed to its passage myself, but I believe it will be favorably considered by a majority of the Senate.

After some further conversation the motion was withdrawn.

FLOGGING IN THE NAVY.

Mr. MALLORY rose and concluded his remarks commenced on yesterday. He read from the report of the Secretary of the Navy and letters of naval officers, showing the consequences that had resulted from abolishing corporal punishment, and expressed a belief that nineteen-twentieths of the whole Navy would be in favor of the restoration of the lash, and maintained that no officer of the Navy would be in favor of flogging if he thought its honor and interest could be maintained without it. [His speech will be found in the Appendix.]

Mr. HALE. I had intended to say a few words on this subject, though I see the Senator from New Jersey has arisen. If he wants the floor I will yield it to him, as he can treat the subject much better than I can.

Mr. STOCKTON. I would desire that the honorable Senator from New Hampshire should go on. I should prefer to close this discussion.

Mr. HALE. I was going to say, that, knowing something of the history of the legislation of Congress upon this subject for some eight or ten years past, and something of the modes by which the act abolishing flogging has been secured, I had intended to address the Senate. I am not prepared at this moment to go on in full, but I would, by way of introduction to the subject, remark, that I am not at all anxious in regard to anything that we may do, so far as the sailor is concerned. I feel the fullest confidence that that battle has been fought, finally fought, and the victory has been won. I look upon it as morally impossible for the country to retrace that step. I know, sir, that when the prophet of Israel was sent to the King to announce to him that he should recover, the King asked of the prophet some sign, and it was, whether the shadow should go forward upon the dial ten degrees, or backwards ten degrees; and the King says it is a small thing for the shadow to go forward ten degrees; nay, says he but let it go back; that will be a miracle of which all the world will take notice. That is the attempt now. It is to put off the advancing shadow that the sun of humanity has cast upon the darkness of this dial-plate back ten degrees, and more than that.

Now, sir, able and eloquent as the honorable Senator from Florida is, and speaking as he says for the whole Navy, if I understood him, I tell him that this cannot be done. My only anxiety now is, for the character of the Senate; I am not at all anxious about the sailor. If I may be indulged in a figure of speech, I look upon all the efforts of the cat-o'-ninetails to restore itself, only as the floundering of a whale after he has been thoroughly harpooned. They are the mere struggles and throes of death. I do not suppose, I never have supposed, that such a monstrous evil as that, and one that was as old as that was—one that, as the honorable Senator from Florida says, dates away back as far as we have any acquaintance with profane history, would submit at once. I did suppose that efforts would be made, feebly to be sure, though I did not expect so serious an effort as this—to revive, and revivify, and reestablish the barbarous custom which received its death-blow by the late act of Congress. There never was any great power that had a pitched battle with another power and got vanquished and overthrown, but that after the great battle little parties were organized which kept up a guerrilla warfare. The same is to be expected in every moral and every political conflict. It has been so, and probably will continue so.

But the honorable Senator has gone into some details. He has alluded to some reports in answer to inquiries which have been made by the Secretary of the Navy, which require examination—which require some facts to be brought up to meet them. I wish to tell the honorable Senator at the outset, however, that the censure which he throws on the origin of this measure does not fall just exactly where he thought it would fall. I am not mistaken in my recollection that one of the efficient friends of this legislation, a man who gave it very potent aid and helped to embody it into the legislation of the country, in the general appropriation bills year after year, in the House of Representatives, was a late member of that House—General McKay, of North Carolina. We have the honor of claiming him as one of those individuals who came from a section of the country where I do not suppose the honorable Senator thought he was dealing his censures when he spoke of this matter. If I may be permitted to refer to another individual, who is not now living, but who is not obnoxious to the censures which the honorable Senator attempted to cast on the friends of this measure, I will mention an honored colleague of yours, Mr. President, now no more—the honorable Dixon H. Lewis, who did me the honor on one occasion, while he dealt out in a kindly spirit his censure at what he termed my vagaries and fanaticism, of saying, "but upon this matter you are right, and have my sympathies, and I will go with you."

Before I leave the subject, and then I shall move to postpone it to a day certain, I wish to tell the honorable Senator that there is one point which he brought up to illustrate his view, which

I think he might as well have left out, because it will come up again, and I wish to discuss it independent of all other considerations. The honorable Senator thought that if he could, in pushing his favorite views, make at the same time an attack on the Abolitionists, there would be at least that point gained. Therefore he said, by way of illustrating his position, that in the country which he represents, they look upon negro stealing as the very meanest sort of crime which can be committed. I have the honor to tell him that in the country which I represent, my constituents look upon it in the same light. So far as that went, no censure fell where he intended it should. I agree with him fully and entirely as regards that. Therefore if it illustrates his side of the argument, it also illustrates mine, for we both look upon it in the same light; we will have no controversy about that. When he rose in his seat, and for the purpose of illustrating his position, told me that his people look upon negro stealing as the meanest kind of crime, I tell him that I entertain the same view, and that that has been the conviction of the people whom I represent ever since they have read that command of Inspiration, which says, "He that stealeth a man and selleth him shall be put to death." I believe the text used to read, "if he be found in his hands;" though I do not know but that the Bible has been expurgated. But I leave that subject. I am sorry that the honorable Senator forced me thus far.

This matter is one that commends itself to the humanity of the age. The honorable Senator from Florida [Mr. MALLORY] thinks that the Navy is disorganized—that it is approaching a state of total disorganization and disgrace, and that the honorable men who used to enlist in it will not go into it now. And why? Because, owing to the legislation of Congress, they are deprived of the luxury of having their backs scourged with the cat-o'-ninetails! The honorable Senator stands up, with a serious face, and tells the Senate and the country that the Navy is getting into disrepute, that the recruiting service is languishing, and we cannot get men to enlist, because, in the spirit of a "false philanthropy," Congress, led away by some mistaken notions that have been imposed upon them by some feeling philanthropists, who do not understand what true economy is, have enacted, in their wisdom, that the skins of their own sons shall not be tortured, and mutilated, and cut to pieces by a cat-o'-ninetails. And then an eloquent appeal is made to the pride, the patriotism, and the ambition of the country, to come up to rescue this drowning Navy, which is at its last gasp for want of the restoration of this humane institution. I cannot believe—yes, I can believe—that the honorable Senator is in earnest; but if he had not said a good many other things which astonished me, I could hardly believe that he was in earnest in this. As I said before, I do not believe that we are in any danger of restoring this punishment. Not at all. I do not believe there is the least danger that the vote of the Senate will ever be recorded—I do not think there is the least danger that the vote of the other branch of Congress could ever be obtained for restoring it, at least at the present time, until we have had some demonstration that it is impossible to maintain the Navy without it. I, for one—and I speak only for myself—am free to confess that if the issue was presented to me of a navy with a cat-o'-ninetails, or no navy without it, I would, with as much alacrity, and as much zeal and earnestness as I ever expressed a conviction in my life, say, if the Navy cannot be maintained without the cat-o'-ninetails, let them both go down together, and let no resurrection-trump ever call up the Navy if it has to bring the cat-o'-ninetails with it. These are my sentiments. They may be esteemed fanatical. I do not think they are. I do not suppose that such are the sentiments of a majority of the Senate.

I think the honorable Senator is exceedingly mistaken when he says that the sentiments of the officers of the Navy are so unanimous in favor of the restoration of this inhuman practice. I think he is exceedingly mistaken in it. I know he is mistaken when he undertakes to tell me that the sailors themselves want it restored. I know better than that. If I did not know it in any other way, I know that the sailor is a man, and that I am a man; and knowing these things, it would be enough to demonstrate to me that the sailors do not want it. But I have better proof than that: When this proviso that was attached to the appropriation bill of 1850 became a law, I happened to have had some agency in bringing it about, and I had some reports from the sea as to how it was received. One of the first things that one of the finest officers who ever trod the deck of an American vessel (who was then in command of a vessel in the Mediterranean squadron) did, was to go down to his cabin, while in command, and write to his humble individual as myself, his hearty and earnest thanks for the agency I had in doing away with this infernal custom. That was not all: When one of the best ships of your Navy, which was on her way to this country, came near enough the shore to get the news of what Congress had done in their behalf, the men belonging to her, with the consent of their officers, called a public meeting on board the ship, and passed resolutions unanimously thanking the humble individual who is now addressing the Senate for his agency in the matter, and dispatched a man of their crew to Washington as soon as the ship came to shore to deliver, with his own hand, the resolutions to me. These are facts which I would not have mentioned had not the honorable Senator from Florida undertaken to say that, from his experience and knowledge of the Navy, both officers and men were in favor of the restoration of this punishment. Sir, if you should go aboard a vessel with all the officers about you, and call up the men and take a vote upon the question of the restoration of flogging, I suppose that nine hundred and ninety out of a thousand would be for restoring it. But send the officers ashore—send them out of the way—do not let them be there—introduce among the sailors what the Democracy of Massachusetts introduced into their election, the first result of which was the election of my friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER],—the secret ballot—and the majority will be the reverse. There will be nine hundred and ninety-nine against restoring it, and the thousandth man who is for it will not be found. It is idle to tell me that the seamen are in favor of its restoration. But I find that I am trespassing upon the time of the Senate, and as I am not prepared to say at this time what I propose to say, and as I desire to present to the Senate some facts, I move that the further consideration of the subject be postponed for a week.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion by Mr. ATCHISON, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned to Monday next.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, January 15, 1852.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m.

Prayer by the Rev. C. M. BUTLER, Chaplain of the Senate.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ASSIGNABILITY OF BOUNTY LAND WARRANTS.

The SPEAKER stated that the first business in order was a motion to refer the report of the select committee on the bounty land bill, to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and upon that motion, the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. TUCK] was entitled to the floor.

Mr. SIBLEY asked the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a bill, of which previous notice had been given, with a view to reference.

INTRODUCTION OF BILLS ON LEAVE.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I would suggest to the House, that by unanimous consent the States be called, so as to enable gentlemen to introduce bills which will not give rise to discussion. There are a great many gentlemen who wish to introduce bills, and I do not think the call of the States would occupy half an hour.

The SPEAKER. Is it the unanimous consent of the House that the States be called for the introduction of bills of which previous notice has been given, and upon which no discussion shall arise?

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. Will that order include resolutions?

The SPEAKER. The proposition as submitted by the gentleman from Georgia would not include resolutions.

Mr. STEPHENS. My object is simply to allow gentlemen to introduce bills of which previous notice has been given, and upon which no debate shall arise.

Mr. HOUSTON. I have no objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Georgia, but I desire to know from the Chair whether that order will supersede the morning hour?

The SPEAKER. It will not.

Mr. HOUSTON. As soon as I can, do so, I desire to move to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and take up the Mexican indemnity bill.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour will not be superseded, unless so ordered by the House.

Mr. HOUSTON. I should like the morning hour to be dispensed with, as I want to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the suggestion of the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. TUCK. If it is the intention of the chairman of the Ways and Means—if the House unanimously consent to this arrangement—to propose to take up other business to the exclusion of the morning hour, I shall object.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has already announced that this proposition will not supersede the morning hour.

Mr. TUCK. Very well; then I make no objection.

No objection being made, the Speaker proceeded to call the States.

Mr. COBB. I wish the gentleman from Georgia would extend his motion, so as to include resolutions upon which no debate might arise.

Mr. STEPHENS. I cannot do it.

On motion by Mr. STANLY,

Ordered, That the papers of Elizabeth H. Willis be withdrawn from the files of the House and referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. JACKSON. As I am not in the habit of occupying much time here, I hope the House will indulge me on this occasion, by permitting a bill to be now referred which I introduced upon Wednesday week last, and the reference of which could not be ordered in consequence of the pressure of the time for the introduction of the Hungarian exile. The bill to which I refer is a bill for the improvement of the Savannah river, in the State of Georgia, and for the removal of obstructions therein; and my motion was that it be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

No objection being made, the bill was taken up and ordered to be so referred.

On motion by Mr. MURPHY,

Ordered, That the papers relating to the claim of Andrew Smith be withdrawn from the files of the House and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary; and that the papers relating to the claim of M. P. Robinson be withdrawn from the files of the House and referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. FOWLER objected.

On motion by Mr. BROWN, the bill was then referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

[A message was here received from the Senate, by their Secretary, ASHLEY DICKINS, Esq., informing the House of the passage by that body of certain bills.]

Mr. PENN asked the unanimous consent of the House to take up a Senate bill upon the Speaker's table to change the register of a vessel.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, objected.

Mr. MOORE, of Louisiana, introduced a bill, of which previous notice had been given, making an appropriation for the removal of the raft in Red river; which was read a first and second time by its title.

Mr. M. moved that the bill be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York, moved that it be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SCURRY. I hope the House will not refer that bill to the Committee on Commerce.

The SPEAKER. If debate arises, the bill must lie over.

The question was then taken on Mr. MOORE's motion, and it was agreed to.

So the bill was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

On motion by Mr. BELL, leave was granted to withdraw from the files of the House the petition and papers of William Flinn, for the purpose of reference to one of the Executive Departments.

Mr. CARTTER asked the unanimous consent of the House to offer a resolution.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, objected.

Mr. CARTTER asked that his resolution might be read for information.

Mr. STEPHENS objected.

On motion by Mr. NEWTON,

Ordered, That leave be granted for the withdrawal from the files of the House of the petition and papers in the case of the heirs of Thomas Johnson and James Hacklay.

The SPEAKER. The Chair feels it his duty to state, that by the order of the House nothing is in order except the introduction of bills and joint resolutions.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Illinois, introduced a joint resolution, of which previous notice had been given, authorizing the location of military bounty land warrants on public lands now subject and hereafter to be subject to entry at private sale, under existing laws; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. YATES introduced a bill, of which previous notice had been given, making an appropriation for the improvement of the navigation of the Illinois river; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. Y. moved that the bill be referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York, moved to refer it to the Committee on Commerce.

The question being first put upon referring it to the Committee on Roads and Canals, upon a division, 65 rose in the affirmative.

Mr. SEYMOUR demanded tellers; which were ordered, and Messrs. SEYMOUR and ROBINSON were appointed.

The question was then taken, and the tellers reported—ayes 78, noes 41.

Mr. WALSH asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered; and the question being put, there were—yeas 113, nays 70; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abercrombie, Willis Allen, Ashe, Barre, Bell, Bibbhaus, Bissell, Bragg, Breckenridge, Brenton, Brooks, Albert G. Brown, George H. Brown, Bu-by, E. Carrington Cabell, Lewis D. Seymour, Origen S. Seymour, Stanly, Sweetser, Thurston, Townshend, Walbridge, Walsh, and Wells—70.

So the bill was referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Mr. STUART. I move to reconsider that vote; and inasmuch as I propose to debate it, I suppose it goes over.

Mr. CARTTER. I move to lay that motion upon the table.

Mr. STUART. You cannot do it. I propose to debate it.

The SPEAKER. The motion gives rise to debate, and consequently the bill goes over.

Mr. PORTER introduced the following bills, of which previous notice had been given; which were read a first and second time by their title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands, viz:

A bill granting to the State of Missouri the right of way and a portion of the public land for the purpose of aiding in the construction of a railroad from St. Charles, on the Missouri river, to the northern limits of said State.

Also, a bill to relinquish to the State of Missouri, on certain conditions, the two per centum of the net proceeds of the sales of public lands in said State since the first day of January, 1821, and reserved by the act of Congress of the sixth day of March, 1820.

On motion by Mr. PORTER, it was Ordered, That leave be granted to withdraw from the files of the House the discharge and note, together with the petition, of Stephen Spalding, heretofore referred to the Committee on Pensions, for the purpose of being returned to the petitioner.

On motion by Mr. CONGER, it was Ordered, That the petition of C. A. Trowbridge and 200 others, for the construction of a canal around the Falls of St. Mary's, and for improvement at Ontonagon river and Eagle Harbor, be withdrawn from the files of the House, and referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Mr. CONGER introduced a joint resolution declaratory of the law of nations, in reference to the doctrine of non-intervention, and the right of every nation to establish for itself such form of government as the people thereof may think most suitable to their own condition, and best adapted to promote and secure their own prosperity and happiness; also declaratory of the view entertained by the Government and people of the United States of the conduct of Russia, by the armed intervention of that Power in the late contest between Austria and Hungary; which was read a first and second time by its title.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I ask if there has been any notice given of its introduction?

The SPEAKER. Notice has not been given.

Mr. JONES. Then I object to its introduction.

The SPEAKER. It is objected to, and must go over.

Mr. CONGER. Then I propose to give notice of my intention hereafter to introduce the resolution just read.

The SPEAKER. The notice will be entered.

Mr. CABELL, of Florida, introduced a bill, of which previous notice had been given, to revive and continue in force, for a limited time, the provisions of the act relative to suspended entries of public lands; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. HENN. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a resolution of inquiry of the Secretary of War; and as a lady is interested in the matter, I hope the gallantry of this House will allow it to come in. It is as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to furnish this House information as to what, if any, depredations have been committed by the Indians on the property of white settlers in the western portions of the State of Iowa, during the last two years, and particularly the facts connected with the recent capture, by the Omaha or Pawnee Indians, of Mr. Carpenter and his wife, on Boyer river, in said State.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made, and the resolution cannot be introduced.

Mr. CLARK introduced a bill, of which previous notice had been given, for the survey and construction of a military road in the State of Iowa; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. C. Will it be in order to ask that a bill and memorial, introduced by me yesterday, be printed?

The SPEAKER. Not without the unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. CLARK. I move, then, that the bill and memorial which I had the honor to introduce yesterday, for the benefit of the Territory of Minnesota and State of Iowa, and which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, be printed.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I object.

Mr. CLARK. I believe joint resolutions are in order?

The SPEAKER. Yes; but only those of which previous notice has been given.

Mr. EASTMAN introduced the following bills, of which previous notice had been given, which were severally read a first and second time by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands, viz:

A bill granting the right of way and making a grant of land in aid of the construction of a railroad in the State of Wisconsin, from the northern line of the State of Illinois to Lake Superior;

A bill granting certain lands in the State of Wisconsin in aid of the construction of a plank road from the Wisconsin river to the mouth of the Willow river, on Lake St. Croix; and

A bill to grant a quantity of land in the State of Wisconsin, to aid in the improvement of Black river.

On motion by Mr. EASTMAN, it was Ordered, That leave be granted to withdraw the papers accompanying the petition of William Butler from the files of the House, for the purpose of having them referred in the Senate to the appropriate committee.

Mr. DOTY introduced the following bills, of which previous notice had been given; which were severally read a first and second time by their titles, and referred as indicated below, viz:

A bill to authorize the State of Wisconsin to locate certain lands granted for the improvement of the Neenah and Wisconsin rivers; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands;

A bill to provide for the protection of commerce on Lake Michigan; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce; and

A bill to grant a certain quantity of land to aid in the construction of a railroad from Manitowac to the Mississippi river; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

[A message was here received from the Senate, by ASBURY DICKINS, Esq., their Secretary, returning a bill entitled "An act to admit a certain vessel to registry," with an amendment, and asking the concurrence of the House therein.]

Mr. PRICE introduced a bill, of which previous notice had been given, giving further remedies to patentees; which he moved to refer to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CARTTER moved that it be referred to the Committee on Patents.

The question was first taken on the motion to refer to the Committee on the Judiciary, and it was not agreed to.

The question was then taken on the motion to refer to the Committee on Patents, and it was agreed to.

Mr. PRICE. I ask leave to introduce a resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will be compelled to rule it out of order, in accordance with the express order of the House.

Mr. SIBLEY introduced a bill, of which previous notice had been given, to grant to the several States of this Union the proceeds of certain public lands, for the relief and support of the indigent insane therein; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. LANE introduced a joint resolution, of which previous notice had been given, for the relief of Elizabeth F. Thurston, of the Territory of Oregon; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. WEIGHTMAN introduced a bill, of which previous notice had been given, authorizing the Governor of New Mexico to call an extra session of the Legislative Assembly of said Territory, should the same be deemed necessary and expedient; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Territories.

RIGHT TO THE FLOOR.

Mr. HOUSTON. The call of the States is now completed, and I move the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The first business in order is upon the proposition to refer to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union the report of the select committee on the joint resolution explanatory of the act granting bounty lands to certain officers and soldiers, &c., and upon which question the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. Tuck] has the floor.

Mr. HOUSTON. That is very true, but I am entitled to the floor now; as the business of the morning hour has not been taken up, and the hour has expired.

The SPEAKER. The Chair apprehends that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Houston] cannot take the floor from the gentleman from New Hampshire.

Mr. HOUSTON. If that be true, it sets aside the rule which says that it is always in order to suspend the rules to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. I am entitled to the floor now because—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Houston] rose before, to submit a privileged motion. The Chair thinks, under the circumstances, that he is entitled to the floor.

Mr. TUCK. I submit that he cannot have the floor for that purpose. I refer not only the Speaker, but the gentleman himself, to the circumstances under which this matter has intervened, and under these circumstances he has not, and ought not to have the floor. I obtained the floor as soon as we had got through the call for bills, and he has no right to take it from me.

Mr. HOUSTON. More than the morning hour has now expired.

The SPEAKER. The Chair decides that the morning hour has just commenced.

Mr. HOUSTON. But I stated to the House, when the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Stephens] made the proposition to the House to call the States for bills, that I desired, as soon as the morning hour should elapse, to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. That is my object. The morning hour has been occupied with other business, and that is the reason why I make the motion.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. These subjects, in my opinion, stand exactly as they stood this morning after the Journal was read; for everything done since has been by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. Precisely the same.

Mr. HOUSTON. I do not controvert that at all. I have no doubt about that, but—

The SPEAKER. The question is whether the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Houston] can deprive the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. Tuck]—who is certainly in order, and entitled to the floor—of the floor. The Chair decides that he cannot.

Mr. HOUSTON. I shall not appeal from the decision of the chair; but that decision unquestionably prevents the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means from availing himself of that rule.

The SPEAKER. Not at all.

Several Voices. "Not at all!" "Not at all!"

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's motion will be in order, when he shall have obtained the floor to make it, but he cannot deprive another gentleman of the floor when he is entitled to it.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. Unless the gentleman appeals from the decision of the Chair, I maintain he is out of order.

Mr. HOUSTON. That is a communication to the House, for which I am very much obliged to the gentleman.

Mr. BAYLY. The gentleman is perfectly welcome.

The SPEAKER. The Chair decides that the question is not debatable.

Mr. HOUSTON. I was going to propound this question to the Chair: Suppose that in the morning, before the business of the morning is taken up, or before the Speaker has stated that the business of the morning was the calling of the committee for reports, I, or any gentleman, should obtain the floor and move that the rules be suspended, with a view of the House going into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—

The SPEAKER. The Chair would decide as he has in this particular case.

Mr. HOUSTON. Then I could not do it during the whole day.

BOUNTY LAND BILL.

The SPEAKER. The question pending is the motion to refer to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union the report of the select committee on the joint resolution explanatory of the act of 1850, granting bounty lands to certain officers and soldiers who were engaged in the military service of the United States.

Mr. TUCK. I feel I ought to make an apology to the House, for attempting to occupy the time which I deem it my duty, upon the present occasion, to do, and that apology is this: The chairman of the select committee, who reported this bill, has made a motion to refer it to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, with the avowed purpose of presently withdrawing that motion, and to ask the House to put the bill upon its passage. Inasmuch as the previous question will in such case be called early, and that free discussion be presented, which ought to be given to this bill somewhere, I have concluded to present my views at the present time upon this very important question. In asking the House to put this bill upon its passage, the chairman of the select committee [Mr. DENHAM] is bound to do two things: First, to show to the members of this House that the bill deserves their approbation; and in the second place, to demonstrate that it is more deserving than any of the other laws before this body; for otherwise, it is not expedient to allow this bill to take precedence of all others—to be exempt from those checks and the common routine of enactment to which all other laws are subject. For the extraordinary course proposed, there can be no apology, unless, as I have said before, the gentleman can show that this is the most important subject that can be presented to us, and one which demands our immediate attention, to the exclusion of everything else. I shall not expend much time in examining what I consider comparatively unimportant parts of this bill; but I will, nevertheless, as I progress in my remarks, notice the several sections briefly.

The first section provides for the assignability of land warrants. Well, this is a proposition against which few, if any, have objections. I call the attention of gentlemen to the fact, that the proposition to make bounty land warrants assignable has already received our consideration and our sanction. We have already, dispensing, by common consent, with the rules of the House and the ordinary routine of business, passed a law for that purpose, which was sent to the Senate, and is now under consideration in that body, and I have been assured, within a few hours, that there is no question but the Senate will give it their approbation. Why, then, I ask, is it that another provision to accomplish the same object is incorporated in this bill? I know of no reason for it, unless it is to make a proposition which receives the universal approbation of this House, the medium by which to impose upon the country and upon us a measure which, if considered in its own merits alone, would receive our condemnation. I know of no other reason. There seems to be some want of concert among those who have planned this magnificent scheme, by which the proposition for the assignment of land warrants was permitted to get the start, pass the House, and go to the Senate, without having attached to it the obnoxious propositions tacked to it in this bill. I submit that it is derogatory to the dignity of the popular branch of the Legislature, to reenact this bill again. The Senate will attend to our action without this repetition of legislation. I do not object to the principle of the assignability of land warrants, proposed in this first section; but since this matter was considered in the committee; since conversing with the Commissioner of Pensions upon this subject, and since hearing the unanswerable argument of my friend from Illinois, [Mr. BISSSELL,] who addressed the House on yesterday, I am forced to the conclusion that the method of assignment, pointed out in this section, is impracticable—that it cannot be administered by the officers of the Government.

We now come to the second section, which I believe is intended to give currency to other parts of the bill more obnoxious. This clause provides for the payment of certain sums to registers and receivers of the General Land Office for locating bounty land warrants. This proposition has many friends upon this floor, and I wish those friends to understand that their scheme is likely to be defeated by being connected with the third, fourth, and sixth sections of this bill. Nothing can kill it sooner than its attachment to these propositions. Their interest lies in laying this whole bill on the table, and bringing up their proposition upon its own merits. Now, in regard to the paying of these registers and receivers, I do not design to detain the House long: the subject has been discussed by others. I recognize the force of the argument used on yesterday. This section provides that registers and receivers shall be paid a certain amount for locating land warrants hereafter; the fault found by my friend from Illinois [Mr. BISSSELL] was, that it does not provide for the payment of those who rendered service heretofore. I am in favor of low salaries for public officers, but I do not support or profess any doctrine that compels men to work for nothing. I understand that many of these registers and receivers of the land offices have done a great deal of labor in regard to these land warrants for nothing. It seems to me that the question is, whether we shall pay moderately and fairly for services performed or pay nothing. I am in favor of the former alternative. These registers and receivers went into office prior to the passage of the bounty land bill of 28th September, 1850, when by the sale of the public lands they were entitled to a certain percentage. It was enacted by the act of 1850 that land warrants should take the place of cash in the disposition of the public lands, and that they should be located by registers and receivers for nothing. Now, the very fact of making a provision that those who shall hereafter perform these services shall be compensated, constitutes an admission that payment should be made to those who heretofore have performed similar and greater services. The registers and receivers have already entered the great mass of these warrants, and by the provisions of this bill they shall have nothing—not one cent for doing nine tenths of all the work, while for the driblet of services hereafter to be performed in disposing of the few warrants outstanding and to be issued, we recognize the propriety of payment. Now, if we enact any provision let us do substantial justice, not only to those who shall hereafter fill these offices but to those who, for no pay at all, have done the chief part of the labor.

I come next to the third and fourth sections, which embrace the great scheme of this bill—a scheme to squander away a large, indefinite, and unknown quantity of the public domain. It comes here under the most innocent title imaginable—a title that gives you no clue whatever to the character of the proposition, or the extent of land that is to be appropriated under its cover. The title of it is: "An act explanatory of an act approved 28th September, 1850, entitled 'An act granting bounty lands to certain officers and soldiers who were engaged in the military service of the United States.'" Instead of merely explaining, it contains new propositions unconnected with and as entirely independent of that act as it is possible for one act to be independent of another. It creates a new class of bounty land warrants, the extent of which no gentleman—not even the chairman of the select committee, who ought to understand it, and who several times has been called upon to state it—can give us any idea. Does he rely so much upon the rashness of this House as to expect we shall pass a bill in relation to which we have no knowledge? I trust our action will disappoint him. If the bill shall reach an engrossment, the first act of the chairman of the select committee will be to move that the title be amended, as it is now entirely inadequate to give any idea of the character of the bill.

I shall, before proceeding further in the consideration of the subject, say a few things in regard to the public domain. I believe we are introducing a new method of disposing of the public lands, and are changing the general policy of the Government in respect to the same. I believe this change will be hazardous to the best interests of the country, and that we ought to resist the change that is taking place. The Government disposed of the public domain at first in large tracts to individuals and companies, but it was early discovered that this policy was not only injurious to the Government, but that it retarded the settlement of new States, and was also disastrous to those who became owners of these large tracts. Some thirty-five years ago, the Government changed its policy and adopted the present excellent system, by which every individual, who is desirous of laboring, and who is fit to be the owner of an acre of land, can, by his own industry, become a freeholder. We have prospered under this system beyond parallel. Of late, we have been departing from this system; and so eager have many become to squander the public domain, that a great part of our labor here is to attend to the various claims which come up in a thousand ways for grants of land. When I examine the records of Congress, and peruse the counsels and opinions of wise statesmen who have gone before us, and who have given their views upon this subject, I am confirmed in my disposition to oppose the struggle now going on among corporations, private companies, and individuals, to get possession, under one pretence and another, of the public domain. We have prospered as a nation, beyond all parallel, under the policy heretofore existing; and for one, I say that policy shall not be abandoned without my opposing vote.

I wish to call the attention of the House to the fact, that the proceeds of the sales of the public lands have been pledged, as security for borrowed money, by the action of Congress, and that this land cannot be given away, as proposed in this bill, without a violation of the public faith.

I send to the Chair, and wish that it may be read, the 19th section of a law passed in 1847, entitled "An act to authorize the issue of Treasury notes, loans, and for other purposes." This law was passed in reference to a proposed loan of $23,000,000, with which to carry on the Mexican war. The section reads as follows:

"And be it further enacted, That for the payment of the stock, which may be created under the provisions of this act, the sales of the public lands are hereby pledged, and it is hereby made the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to use and apply all moneys which may be received into the Treasury from the sales of the public lands, after the 1st day of January, 1848; first, to pay the interest on all stocks issued by virtue of this act; and secondly, to use the balance of said receipts, after paying the interest aforesaid in the purchase of said stocks at their market value, provided no more than par shall be paid for said stocks."

Now, by that act it was obviously intended that the receipts from the sales are all sequestered, set apart and pledged for the payment of this debt and interest. Secondly, after the interest is paid, the remainder is to be kept as a fund to pay that debt now outstanding as it becomes due, or as it can be purchased at par before it becomes due. And thirdly, after paying interest annually in the purchase of stocks, the remainder will be an accumulated fund, to redeem the debt when it becomes due. Now that is a pledge of the faith of this country, which we are bound to regard, no matter what may be the ability of this Government, as we think now, to meet the payment of this loan when it shall become due. We have pledged these public lands—we have pledged the faith of the country to those who have invested in these stocks, that we will maintain and preserve the moneys to be received from the sales of the public lands, to meet that payment. I have had the curiosity to look over the yeas and nays recorded upon the passage of that bill, in order to see who of those now in this House aided by their votes in pledging the faith of the country. Before I read the names, I will say, that I do not assume that all those whose names I shall read are now ready to violate that pledge. I would rather assume the contrary—that they intend to keep it.

I find in this list of yeas and nays, the names of Messrs. Thomas H. Bayly, Linn Boyd, Armistead Burt, Orlando B. Picklin, Meredith P. Gentry, George S. Houston, Andrew Johnson, George W. Jones, and Alexander H. Stephens, who all voted for this sequestration.

Mr. DUNHAM. I would like to ask the gentleman one question, and that is, whether he has not upon this floor taken ground in favor of donating land to actual settlers, and whether he is not now in favor of it?

Mr. TUCK. I will answer these questions when they come up. I defy the gentleman to show any act of mine in violation of this pledge. I recorded my vote in 1850, against the bill of the 28th of September of that year.

I have reason to believe that my neighbor from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS,] who was on the select committee that reported this bill, will support it, and yet I have read his name in favor of pledging the faith of this Government to preserve this fund sacred. If the honorable chairman of the committee could detect me in any inconsistency, or willingness to violate this pledge, which he cannot do, I ask him, if it would be a good excuse for violating it on his part?

Mr. DUNHAM. Do I understand the gentleman to say that he is not now in favor of granting land to actual settlers? Did he say no to that question?

Mr. TUCK. I am surprised that the able chairman of this select committee should expect me, or any man, to give an answer to a proposition—a most important proposition—imbodyed in the indefinite language which he has used. He knows that I am willing to record my vote and express my opinions upon any proposition that may come up, which I will do at the proper time. But I shall desire to express my propositions for new laws, in more guarded language, and in less sweeping terms than those presented to me in the gentleman's question.

In considering this proposition to dispose of another portion of the public lands, so soon after the act of 1850, we shall do well to remember the vast extent of that law. We are informed by the Secretary of the Interior, that by the law of the 28th of September, 1850, there will be about two hundred and fifty thousand land warrants issued, and that twenty millions of acres of land will be appropriated. This land is worth $25,000,000, a sum large enough for bounty to soldiers at present. Confident as we may be of the ability of this country to meet all its engagements, we ought to leave these lands sacred to the purpose for which they were intended. This bounty land bill of 1850, I opposed; and state this fact in order to assure gentlemen that when I come to speak of the sectional character of the bill now under consideration, they will not suppose me to be actuated by any sectional interest in opposing it. I opposed the bounty law when it was general, as in the act of 1850, and I oppose it now, when it becomes sectional and special. Although on many points I have the misfortune to differ with my neighbor from Georgia before me, [Mr. STEPHENS,] yet in reference to this bill of 1850, I am happy to find, by examining the Journal, that gentleman, and also his colleague, [Mr. TOOMBS,] on the same side with myself, opposing it. I assume that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] could not find it in his conscience to vote for the bill of 1850. He was aware that the faith of the Government was pledged, and it was not in him to violate that pledge. I do not see how he can now support this bill, and I call his attention to his vote in 1850, against the bounty land bill, because if he supports this bill, as I infer from his action on the committee with me, he will do, I wish the matter to be explained. If the friends of this bill ask us to create a new class of bounty land warrants, I wish them to explain their past opposition, and clear away all the obstacles that they possibly can, in order to enable us to go with them, if we can, and save all the self-respect possible in such a course.

The 3d and 4th sections of the present act read as follows:

"Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the act of which this is explanatory, shall be so construed as to include all commissioned and non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates of militia, volunteers and rangers, who were mustered into the service of the United States for the suppression or prevention of Indian hostilities, or whose services of that character were recognized and paid by the United States prior to the passage of said act, and who served the length of time required by said act.

"Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That in computing the term of service of the officers and soldiers of militia, volunteers, and rangers, for the purposes of this act, or of the act of which this act is explanatory, such term shall be computed from the time they were mustered into the service of and paid by the United States to the time they were discharged therefrom."

I call the attention of the House to this fact: The Commissioner of Pensions, in his annual report to the Secretary of the Interior, states that in administering the law of the 28th of September, 1850, he has come to the conclusion that there are some meritorious claims which ought to be further provided for by this Government. He has specified those claims in his report; but the provisions in this bill for a new class of warrants does not touch any of the meritorious cases which the Commissioner has thought alone deserved his recommendation.

I would also direct the attention of the House to another fact, and that is, that the propositions contained in the third and fourth sections are brought up as a spontaneous act of giving away the public domain. I do not recollect of any petitions or memorials addressed to Congress asking us to do any such thing as this. It is a magnificent work for gentlemen to bring forward, upon their own motion, such a proposition as this, unasked for and unrecommended. It will be quite another thing to pass it, I trust. What is the amount of land to be appropriated by this bill? Nobody can tell, and nobody knows. I have asked the Commissioner of Pensions if he would communicate to me some information in regard to the extent of land to be taken by this bill, to be laid before the House, in order that we might all know what we were about when called upon to vote upon the bill. He said: "I cannot tell, nor can anybody tell." The bill is very comprehensive, and will embrace a vast number of claims. It is requisite that gentlemen should read over with care the third section, in order that they should understand what may be the effect of that proposition. It provides that all are to be allowed land who have been mustered into the service of the United States since 1790, or whose services in suppressing or preventing Indian hostilities have been recognized and paid for by the United States. There have been a vast number of persons paid for services in respect to the Indians since 1790, and not one of them will fail, if this bill passes, to be claimed as serving to suppress, or prevent, Indian hostilities.

The law of 1850 gave bounty land to those engaged in time of war in the military service of the United States. This bill gives land to those who have performed military service in time of peace. The beneficiaries of this act, from 1790 to the present time, may not have seen danger, or the enemy. If only they have had the art to make the Government pay for services, supposed to be rendered to suppress or prevent Indian hostilities, they are to be put upon the list of patriotic heroes, and be presented with a portion of the public land, in token of a nation's gratitude. Those who have seen other enemies than Indians are of no sort of account; it is no merit to have served to suppress or prevent other hostilities. Those who have harassed the Indians are only remembered in this bill.

The claimants under this act will be those who have lived in the vicinity of the Seminoles, Creeks, and Cherokees, and a few engaged in the Black Hawk war, and Winnebago disturbances. Those who served in any war with these tribes have already been provided for in the act of 1850; and the present bill is to give bounty to those who hung upon the skirts of these tribes in time of peace, and who have had the good fortune to make the Government pay them well for so doing. There is not a sixth part of the country that can have any interest in this bill if it passes; while it is proposed to take what belongs to the whole country to bestow upon a few who have already been paid all or more than they ever earned or deserved. I have never seen so sectional a proposition brought before Congress. If we must squander the public lands, we shall find more meritorious persons in the offices in Washington, where men have become incapacitated for other business by serving the public for good pay in clerks' offices.

The Commissioner of Pensions has recommended the flotilla men in the war of 1812, under Commodore Barney, the marines who did duty on shore, and the men who were in battle, but not out long enough to receive land by the law of 1850. Why has the majority of this committee passed over all that the impartial Commissioner recommended, and included such a multitude whom he did not and could not in conscience recommend? I invite the attention of the Representatives of the people around the Chesapeake and Delaware bays, whose citizens have been overlooked in this law, to examine the subject and look after their rights. I invite the Representatives of the old States, generally, to determine whether it becomes them to tolerate an enactment of this sort, when their own citizens in the war with Great Britain are denied bounties for services much more important and hazardous than the services of those who helped remove the Cherokees, or watched the Seminoles and Winnebagoes. The men of the whole northern border of the country are forgotten or despised in the proposed enactment of this bill. Why are they left out of this bill, and no merit recognized except in those who have seen Indians?

Mr. DUNHAM. I will ask the gentleman from New Hampshire, whether, if they are left out, all that class of men who were called out in the last war, do not receive their bounty land under the law passed last year? In every case where the Government has recognized services upon the Northern frontier, it has paid for them.

Mr. TUCK. The gentleman is mistaken; and in order to correct his error, as well as to present the views of the Commissioner of Pensions upon other parts of the gentleman's bill, I will present the following letter which I have received, and send it to the Clerk's desk to be read:

PENSION OFFICE, January 10th, 1852.

SIR: In accordance with your request I have the honor to present the following views in relation to the bill entitled "An act explanatory of an Act approved September 28th, 1850," &c.

The first section proposes to make land warrants assignable, and to require that those assignments shall be executed and acknowledged, or proved in the same manner, and with the same formalities that deeds for the conveyance of land are executed and acknowledged, or proved, in the State or Territory where such assignment shall be made.

It is suggested that it would probably facilitate business to have uniformity in these assignments, and that the object of the bill could be obtained by requiring that the justice of the peace or notary shall certify that the party assigning is well known to him, or that his identity has been proved by the affidavits of A B and C D, known to him as respectable persons and credible witnesses.

Most of the persons now claiming are living among their friends or acquaintances, and hence their identity can be readily established, and thus many of the frauds practiced under the act of 1847 can be prevented.

The second section provides for compensating the land officers for their services in locating these lots.

The third section is somewhat ambiguous in its provisions. It would seem to embrace all the militia, volunteers, or rangers, whose services in suppressing or preventing Indian hostilities, had been recognized and paid by the United States, and who had served the length of time required by the act of 1850. The doubt is in relation to the scope and extent that should be given to the term "prevention," in the bill, unless indeed it be the intention of Congress to grant bounty land to all the militia, volunteers, and rangers, whose services had been recognized and paid since 1790, and who had served the length of time required by the act of 1850. If such be the fact, it would be well so to express it; and such expression would obviate the necessity of enacting the fourth section.

The rule now is to allow all claimants for the time they served in any war since 1790, except of course those in the Mexican war, for whom provision was made by the act of 1847. If, however, the duration of service in war as prescribed by the act of 1850, is not to be regarded as the measure by which these claims are to be decided, but the length of time for which their services have been recognized and paid by the United States, of course the fourth section is unnecessary, as its provisions are involved in those of the third section.

The provisions of the 5th section of the bill are identical with the construction given to the first section and last clause of the third section of the act of 28th September, 1850, and hence there is no necessity for enacting it.

The sixth section of this bill, after authorizing the location of warrants or lands subject to private entry at the time of such location, directs that warrants issued prior to the death of the soldier, and which were not located or assigned by the warrantee, shall inure to the benefit of his widow, if he left one; and if not, to his minor heirs.

This is contrary to the uniform construction given by this office to the act of 28th September, 1850. The first clause of the 3d section of that act provides that those warrants "shall be located by the warrantee or his heirs at law." Under this it has been held that wherever a warrant issued before the death of the warrantee, it was his property and inured to his heirs at law or devisees, who could locate the same as thus provided by law.

In the 7th section there is an error, as there is no provision to the 2d section of the act of 1850.

I have thus given you my views frankly on the provisions of this bill, as requested by you. The 3d section of it, as thus construed, would materially extend the provisions of the act of 1850, and require the review of many cases, especially in the Black Hawk, Seminole, and Creek wars, where warrants have already been issued, and require the return and cancellation of those warrants, and the issue of others for greater quantities of land, or of new warrants for deficiencies, where those issued have been located or disposed of. It would also introduce new classes of cases, where troops had been called out to prevent or suppress Indian hostilities, as in the Cherokee and Winnebago disturbances, &c., which have not been regarded as wars, and for services in which bounty land has not been allowed.

There are, however, some meritorious classes of cases, which are not provided for by this bill, as the flotilla men under Commodore Barney, in the war of 1812, who rendered efficient and valuable service in the defence of the coast, and on land whenever required. Marines, also, on several occasions served on land. The militia and volunteers in several of the States were required to drill, and to be subject to call at any moment. These men were allowed only for the time they were actually in the field, as that was the period for which they were paid by the Government. Others were in actual battle, but not having served a month are not entitled.

I would also suggest, that preceptors be authorized to locate the land actually improved by them, with these warrants, even where it is not subject to private entry, and that where the minimum price is more than $1 25 per acre, that the party locating shall pay the increase in cash.

The early settlers on the public lands are entitled to the fostering care and consideration of the Government. It was through the sufferings, privations, and toil, of those hardy pioneers, that the fruitful lands of the West have been opened up to the enterprise and industry of the teeming millions who now people them. And it is but a small privilege that they shall be permitted to enter their improvements with these warrants.

Whether it would be expedient in this bill to exclude the lands in California and Oregon from location by land warrants is respectfully submitted. Those lands are not now subject to private entry, but when they are made so by law, the locations of these warrants might seriously interfere with claims and inchoate rights arising or which have arisen under existing laws, and thus long and harassing litigation be induced.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. E. HEATH,

Commissioner of Pensions.

Hon. AMOS TUCK, House of Reps.

I commend to the gentleman and to the whole House, a careful examination of the foregoing letter. I could hope, that the Commissioner, aided, I doubt not, by the intimate knowledge of this subject and of the operations of all laws affecting the public lands, possessed by his excellent chief clerk, Mr. Wilson, might have some influence in inducing even the gentleman from Indiana to abandon his bill. But I fear he will still urge it. Although it is obnoxious to criticism in every part, and is besides of an entirely sectional character, he knows, and I know, it affects the interests of those who will fight earnestly for it. It is their habit. I can already foresee the zealous support which it will call forth from the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] and others. I only wish that we could have the benefit of the denunciation which he would pour out upon this measure, if he were differently situated and could be affected by the bill, and see its enormity, as we do, who live in other parts of the country.

I will now proceed to a few remarks upon the 6th section of the bill, which is in the following words:

"Sec. 6. And he it further enacted, That the warrants which have been, or may hereafter be issued, in pursuance of said act or of this act, may be located upon any lands of the United States subject to private entry at the time of such location."

My objections to this section I stated some weeks since, and will not now repeat at much length. I believe it to be wise policy to preserve the lands that are now being put into market in Minnesota, and which are soon to be put in market there and in Oregon, California, and elsewhere, exempt from control by these warrants. The reason is this: the infant settlements, and men on the frontier just beginning improvements, are incapable of bearing up against the incubus resulting from these warrants. It is well known that most of them find their way very soon into the hands of speculators, who take up the choice lots in the neighborhood of improvements, and by means of these warrants, here in the villages, and refuse to improve or to sell their land, except at exorbitant prices, which the actual inhabitants are unable to give. The holders of the warrants stay in their comfortable palaces of the Atlantic cities, and wait for their land to be enhanced in value by the labors of the hardy and humble pioneer. The evil is an almost intolerable annoyance in the new settlements of the West, and we shall aggravate by passing the sixth section of this bill. The States of the West, wherein there is abundance of land to satisfy the warrants already subject to them, have an ability to defend themselves, having passed the period of their infant existence. But such is not the case with Minnesota, western Iowa, Oregon, and California.

It should be remarked, that it would be particularly bad policy to pass the sixth section, so as to open Oregon and California to these warrants, as soon as land is offered for sale there. Where the arable land is confined to valleys and gorges, the location of a few land warrants will prevent the settlement of large tracts. New mines may be discovered, and other inducements not now anticipated spring up to induce speculators to cover over the better parts of these new countries. It seems to me there can be no doubt of the wisdom of the policy of refusing any new privileges to the holders of these warrants.

In speaking of Oregon, I am reminded that the claimants in that Territory, for bounty land under this bill, should it pass, (and there will be many claimants there,) will have more land than they know what to do with, having already secured to them from three hundred and twenty to six hundred and forty acres each. The seventh section of the bill in the following words, is of trifling importance, but is a mistake, as is stated in the letter of the Commissioner of Pensions.

I only call the chairman's attention to the fact, to show him how much his bill requires to go to the committee for amendments, and how little he is prepared to urge, as he intends to do, its passage at once.

I was disposed to vote that the bill go to the committee; but being requested by many to move at a proper time that it lie on the table, and believing that the House will not hesitate to give a summary quietus, I shall probably make that motion, unless some other person does so before me. But at present I wish it to be discussed.

Mr. FITCH next obtained the floor.

Mr. DUNHAM. Will my colleague yield me the floor for a moment? I merely wish to offer an amendment to one of the sections of the bill.

Mr. FITCH. I will yield the floor for that purpose, and for that only.

Mr. DUNHAM. I hope my colleague will allow me also to explain the motives which operate upon me in offering that amendment. It is but just to myself that I should do so.

Mr. FITCH. I suppose I must yield the floor to my colleague.

Mr. DUNHAM then moved to amend the first section of the bill by striking out all after the word "assignable" therein, and inserting the following in lieu thereof:

Under such rules and regulations as shall be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. D. said: I hope I may be indulged in making a very few remarks in connection with that amendment, for it will perhaps seem singular that it should come from me at this time; but I assure the House that before I get through it will not strike them with so much astonishment that such an amendment should come from me, as will some of the remarks that have been made by gentlemen who were associated with me upon that committee. I think that it will not be out of place for me to say here, that at the time that first section was passed upon in the committee, I did reserve to myself the right to submit the amendment which I have just sent to the table, stating that I was opposed to the section as the committee proposed to report it. I will not state what took place in the committee, except hypothetically. But we will suppose there was a committee raised upon an important subject of this character, and that the chairman of that committee offered a section which would have been as that section will be, if my amendment is adopted—urging in its favor the very reasons which fell from the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BISSELL] on yesterday, and from the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. TUCK] to-day—every one of them, with all the ability which he possessed; and suppose that, after he had urged those reasons, every member of the committee had voted against him; and then, when the bill was reported to the House, those same gentlemen had come in here and opposed the bill on account of that provision which was inserted in opposition to the chairman of the committee, and by their own votes! I submit this matter to the House, and I ask if it does not show that there were motives operating there, and that an effort may have been made to defeat the bill. I will not say that such an effort was made; but it does seem to me, that if I had been disposed to defeat the bill, I might have endeavored, by my vote in committee, to get a provision put in the bill which I believed was odious to a portion of this House; and then, when the bill came into the House, have made war upon it on that very point. I do not say that the gentlemen have pursued such a course as that; but I can imagine that I might have done it if I had been disposed to defeat the bill.

Mr. TUCK. Will the gentleman yield me the floor for a moment?

Mr. DUNHAM. Certainly.

Mr. FITCH. I must object to my colleague giving away my time.

Mr. DUNHAM. I want to add but a single word.

Mr. TUCK. Will not the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. FITCH,] who is entitled to the floor, yield it to me for a moment?

Mr. FITCH. I must decline to do it, or all my time will be consumed.

Mr. DUNHAM. The only additional remark that I wish to make is this: That it does seem to me that the course pursued here by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. BISSELL,] indicates that he wants to fasten a rider upon this bill; that he is not disposed to let it go through by itself; that if it cannot be made to carry his rider through, the bill itself is to be defeated here, and that rider is a provision for the back remuneration of registers and receivers.

Mr. BISSELL. I ask the gentleman to yield me the floor for one moment.

Mr. DUNHAM. I have no right to yield it without the consent of my colleague, [Mr. FITCH.]

Mr. BISSELL. Well; I ask the gentleman if I did not state in the committee that I should oppose this bill in the House?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois is not in order, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. FITCH] having refused to yield the floor.

Mr. DUNHAM. I understand the gentleman's question to be, whether he did not, when in committee, avow his purpose to oppose this bill. Well, as he has thus referred to what took place in the committee, it may not be improper for me to reply to him. I answer, that he did; and I cannot make that answer without going a step further and adding—for the reason that, unless the bill could be made the horse on which this favorite rider of his was to go through the House, the horse itself might go down.

Mr. BISSELL. Will the gentleman now allow me to make a remark?

Mr. DUNHAM. I have only this further remark to make upon the subject of the registers and receivers—

Mr. BISSELL. After what the gentleman has said, he will surely have justice enough to permit me to make a remark.

Mr. DUNHAM. I cannot do it; I only hold the floor by the courtesy of my colleague.

Mr. BISSELL. Then I appeal to the gentleman's colleague to allow me to say a word.

Mr. FITCH. I have already refused any extension of the leave to my colleague, to the gentleman on the other side of the House, [Mr. TUCK,] and I cannot certainly make a distinction between him and another gentleman. I therefore feel constrained to refuse the gentleman from Illinois any portion of my time.

Mr. BISSELL. I think it very fortunate for his colleague, that the gentleman will not yield the floor. That is all I have to say about it. [A laugh.]

Mr. DUNHAM. All I wish to add is, that the amendment which I have sent to the Chair, embodies my sentiments. It is not necessary that I should go over the arguments in favor of that amendment, because they were very forcibly put by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BISSELL] on yesterday. I think he borrowed them, but I will not say that he did. I know one thing—that those very arguments—as the gentleman will himself admit—had been urged by another individual on a previous occasion, and that other individual was myself, although I do not mean to say that I could have presented them with so much force and ability as the gentleman did yesterday. I only hope that the House gave them due consideration. I believe this matter should be left to the Secretary of the Interior, because I believe that that section of the law, as it now stands, would be almost impracticable, and because I also believe that if left under the control of the Department, the Secretary of the Interior would be able; when frauds were discovered, so to alter the rules and regulations as to avoid a repetition of those frauds.

With reference to the back pay of the registers and receivers, I will not travel out of the scope of the amendment I have offered, to say anything upon that subject now, but I do hope that before this matter is definitely settled, I shall be heard, and I will then exhibit to the House, in the fullest manner, and from statistics, how much merit there is in this proposition to pay the registers and receivers.

I want now to make an inquiry of the gentleman from New Hampshire, and of the gentleman from Illinois. They have made inquiries of me with reference to the probable extent of the operation of that section of the bill which provides for the granting of land to certain soldiers who were called out for the suppression of Indian hostilities. I am not able to answer that question exactly, but I would ask if any gentleman upon this floor, who voted for the original bounty land bill, knew or could have found out by the utmost industry, what would be the precise extent of the operation of that bill? Now, I am not exactly a Yankee, but I am a sort of a first cousin to it, and I will answer the gentlemen's question by asking them another, and that is, whether they can tell this House how much money will have to be appropriated out of the Treasury to give back pay to these registers and receivers?

Mr. BISSELL. Yes, I will answer it in three minutes, if the gentleman will engage then to support the bill.

Mr. DUNHAM. I hope my colleague [Mr. FITCH] will permit the gentleman from Illinois to answer the question.

Mr. KING, of New York. I desire to inquire of the Chair whether, under a motion to refer, it is in order to discuss the general merits of the bill?

The SPEAKER. They may be examined in order to ascertain the propriety of the reference of the bill.

Mr. DUNHAM. One interrogatory which I desire the gentleman to answer is with reference to the amount of this back pay; and the other is whether he can give any information as to how much has been received by these registers and receivers under the law, of which there has been no report? That question I do not propose to discuss now; but if I have an opportunity before the subject is disposed of, it is my intention to give the facts of the case in reference to this matter.

Mr. BISSELL. As I have been appealed to so directly by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. DUNHAM,] I trust his colleague [Mr. FITCH] will now allow me to reply.

Mr. FITCH. I must put a stop to this kind of discussion.

Mr. BISSELL. I trust the gentleman will, at least, give me an opportunity to answer the last question.

Mr. HOUSTON. I rise to a privileged question. As the morning hour has expired, I suppose I have the right to move that we now proceed to dispose of the business on the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. That motion is in order.

Mr. HOUSTON. There are many bills upon the Speaker's table—

Mr. FITCH. This, I suppose, is the effect of courtesy. I will yield to the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. HOUSTON;] but it is the last time I will yield for the purpose of explanation. I had no sooner yielded to my colleague [Mr. DUNHAM] than he commenced a warfare upon the other members of the same committee—

Mr. DUNHAM. The gentleman is mistaken.

The SPEAKER. This discussion is out of order. The gentleman from Alabama has moved to proceed to the consideration of the business upon the Speaker's table; which motion is in order.

The question was then taken, and carried in the affirmative.

So the House proceeded to the consideration of the business on the Speaker's table.

REPORT FROM THE TREASURY.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Treasury Department, transmitting copies of additional estimates, and accompanying papers, submitted by the Secretary of War, and which that officer requests may be considered as supplementary to the estimates transmitted under date of the 12th instant; which communication was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Also, laid before the House a communication from the Clerk of the House, accompanied by a statement of the clerks and other persons employed in his office during the year ending December 31, 1851, and showing the amount of their pay and the time employed; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

BILLS ON THE SPEAKER'S TABLE.

The House then proceeded to consider House bill No. 47, being "An act to admit a certain vessel [brig Etta] to registry," which had been returned from the Senate with an amendment.

Mr. WALSH. I move to concur in the amendment of the Senate. I will state to the House the substance of the amendment. When this subject was first before the House, the committee to which it was referred thought the evidence sufficient to show that it was an American vessel, having been substantially rebuilt at Charleston, South Carolina, and the House at once directed the collector to admit her to registry. The Senate thought proper, however, to refer the whole matter to the Treasury Department, which I think is a more proper direction. I hope the House will concur in the amendment.

The question was then taken, and the amendment was concurred in.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

The SPEAKER then laid before the House a Senate bill, to provide compensation to such persons as may be designated by the Secretary of the Treasury to receive and keep the public money under the fifteenth section of the act of the sixth of August, 1846, for additional services required under that act; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Also, Senate bill to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to issue a register to the brig Ada; which was read a first and second time by its title.

Mr. PENN. It will take but a moment to dispose of this bill, and I move that it be put on its passage.

The bill having been read through, it was ordered to a third reading. It was then read the third time and passed.

Senate bill granting to the State of Mississippi the right of way and donation of public lands for the purpose of locating and constructing a railroad from Brandon, on the eastern border of said State, in the direction of Montgomery, Alabama, was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Senate bill for the relief of Mrs. A. M. Dade, the widow of the late Major T. L. Dade, Major in the United States Army, was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Senate bill for the relief of Richard Chaney and others, having been read a first and second time by its title,

Mr. CARTTER moved to refer it to the Committee of Claims, as he believed it was a private claim.

Mr. HENN moved that it be referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and made the order of the day for to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Ohio move to refer the bill to the Committee of Claims?

Mr. CARTTER. I understand that it originated with the Committee on Public Lands. I now move to refer it back to that Committee. My only object is to dispose of the bill.

Mr. HENN. I will state to the gentleman that the same bill has been up once before the Committee on Public Lands. The committee have acted upon it. I can therefore see no advantage in referring it back to that committee. I move that it be referred to the Committee of the Whole, and that it be made the order of the day for to-morrow.

The question was then taken, and the bill was referred to a Committee of the Whole House.

The following Senate bills were severally read a first and second time by their titles, and referred as indicated below, viz:

The bill for the relief of Charles Melrose, referred to the Committee of Claims;

The bill for the relief of Sidney S. Alcott, referred to the Committee of Claims;

The bill for the relief of the heirs of Judith Worthen; referred to the Committee of Claims;

A bill to authorize Victor Morass to relinquish certain lands, and to enter the same quantity elsewhere, referred to the Committee on Public Lands;

The bill for the relief of William Darby, referred to the Committee of Claims;

The bill for the relief of William B. Greene, referred to the Committee of Claims;

The bill granting relief to John A. McGaw, of New York, referred to the Committee on Commerce;

The bill for the relief of the personal representatives of William A. Slacum, deceased, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs; and

The bill for the relief of Mrs. Margaret Hetzel, the widow and administratrix of A. R. Hetzel, late an assistant quartermaster in the Army of the United States, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The bill from the Senate for the relief of Adjutant General Roger Jones, was read a first and second time by its title.

Mr. BOCOCK moved that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. GORMAN. I ask the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. BOCOCK,] who made the motion to refer that bill to the Committee on Military Affairs, to withdraw it. I apprehend that this bill need not be referred to any committee. It has passed the Senate three several times unanimously, and has met with favorable reports three several times from committees of this House; and it passed the Senate a few days ago with one single dissenting voice, after having had its whole merits spoken of and reported upon by a committee. I ask the gentleman from Virginia, therefore, to withdraw his motion, and let the bill be put upon its passage.

A Voice. What is the bill?

Mr. GORMAN. A bill for the relief of General Roger Jones—

Mr. CARTTER. To pay him for an office he did not hold.

Mr. BOCOCK. I have no objection to the bill being put upon its passage if the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GORMAN] desires it. I have examined into its merits and am satisfied that it ought to pass. If, in the gentleman's opinion, there is any chance of its being passed if now put upon its passage, I will with great pleasure withdraw the motion to refer. But I did not suppose at the time I made the motion that the House would be willing to put the bill upon its passage without examining it. I will, however, withdraw the motion at the suggestion of the gentleman.

Mr. CARTTER. I renew the motion.

Mr. GORMAN. Do I understand that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CARTTER] makes the motion to refer it?

The SPEAKER. He does.

Mr. GORMAN. Very well, I will upon this occasion ask the House to refuse to refer it, for the reason that there is no necessity for it. Two minutes will satisfy the House, I apprehend, of that fact.

Mr. CARTTER. Is the question debatable?

Mr. GORMAN. It is.

Mr. CARTTER. Very well, and I shall take the liberty to reply.

Mr. BISSELL. I would suggest to my friend from Indiana, [Mr. GORMAN,] that the bill will pass quite as speedily by referring it. It is a bill of manifest merits, and that a committee cannot but report favorably upon it.

Mr. GORMAN. I will withdraw.

Mr. CARTTER. I do not want this bill to go before the House with this manifest advantage. I think I have some knowledge of it; and if I correctly comprehend it, it is nothing more nor less than a naked proposition to pay a military officer a salary, covering a period of time when he did not hold the office. It strikes me that bill was before the Committee on Military Affairs at the last Congress.

Mr. GENTRY. I hope my friend from Ohio [Mr. CARTTER] will allow me to correct him in a misapprehension. I feel confident that he would not wish to prejudice the House against the bill if he comprehended the facts. He is in error in the facts which he states.

Mr. CARTTER. I will say to my friend, that I made these remarks merely with the view of bringing the attention of the House to this fact. They will find, when they investigate the bill—if my memory serves me right in regard to the investigation of it during the last Congress—that it is a proposition to give him pay, in imitation of pay given to certain other officers—pay outside of the provision for his payment in the office that he held during the time.

Mr. GENTRY. My friend is entirely wrong upon the subject.

Mr. CARTTER. I hope the House will investigate it.

Mr. GENTRY. It is to give him pay for an office which he held legally and constitutionally—that fact having been decided by authorities competent to decide it—but an office from the duties of which he was excluded for a time by what has been decided to be an improper exercise of Executive authority. The bill proposes that which is in conformity with the practice of the Government in all similar cases. When the Army was reduced in 1817, if I remember right—there being two adjutant generals—the President of the United States did not retain either, but displaced them both, and appointed another man de novo. The Senate of the United States took the matter into consideration, and decided that, under the law, the President had no right thus to act, and refused to confirm his nomination. It was made the subject of a formal communication to the Senate by the Executive of the Government, arguing the question at length, and was taken under consideration by the Senate, and ably discussed and reported upon, and still the Senate refused to confirm the nomination thus made; and so, in the Army Register for several years under President Monroe's administration, this office was reported as vacant, while legally it was not vacant. General Jones was the adjutant general de facto, and by the law; but by this act of the Executive he was not permitted to perform its duties. When Mr. Adams came into power, knowing fully the facts of the case, instead of issuing a general order to the Army to recognize General Jones as adjutant general, and not wishing, I suppose, to cast any censure upon his predecessor, he reappointed him, and the Senate confirmed that appointment. This was founded upon the previous act of the Senate, which had refused to acknowledge the vacancy, and constantly recognized him as the legal adjutant general of the United States Army. This bill proposes to give him the pay he would otherwise have drawn through this period of time.

Mr. CARTTER. I wish to inquire of the member from Tennessee [Mr. GENTRY] whether he did not receive the pay of adjutant general during the whole time?

Mr. GENTRY. He did not. This bill proposes to correct that deficiency, and nothing more.

Mr. CARTTER. What pay did he receive?

Mr. GENTRY. He received pay as lieutenant of artillery.

Mr. CARTTER. Was that his rank?

Mr. GENTRY. That was his lineal rank before he was promoted to Adjutant General.

Mr. CARTTER. Then he is paid.

Mr. GUDDINGS. I would be willing that this bill should pass, out of courtesy to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. GORMAN,] but it is a practice against which I must be allowed to enter my protest. We have time to investigate every bill that is brought before us, if gentlemen will sit in this Hall and do our duty to our constituents, ourselves, and our country. We can examine them fully in the regular routine, but the manner we are now adopting, of taking up certain favorite measures and passing them through, is doing injustice to the great mass of bills upon the calendar. Now I propose that this bill shall take its regular routine, go to a Committee of the Whole, and be taken up as it should be. We should adhere to the uniform practice of this House in former times. Now, we are giving certain favorites the opportunity of getting their measures through, while we are neglecting others of equal merit. I have nothing more to say upon this subject, except that I know nothing of the merits of this bill. I do not speak upon the merits of it. But I say: it should go to the Committee of the Whole, where it can be fully and freely examined and understood, and passed in the ordinary routine.

The question was then taken on the motion of Mr. CARTTER, to refer the bill to a Committee of the Whole House; and it was agreed to.

The following bills from the Senate were then severally read a first and second time by their titles, and referred as indicated below:

The bill for the relief of the representatives of Joseph Watson, jr.; referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The bill for the relief of Rufus Dwinell; referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

The bill for the relief of Allen G. Johnson; referred to the Committee of Claims.

The bill to extend a patent heretofore granted to John Shly, of the State of Georgia; referred to the Committee on Patents.

CONGRESSIONAL LIBRARY ROOMS.

The bill from the Senate to provide a room for the Congressional Library, was read a first and second time by its title.

Mr. STANLY. If there is no objection, I suggest the propriety of putting that bill upon its passage.

[Cries of "Read it!" "Read it!"]

The bill was then read, as follows:

"That the sum of $1,200 be hereby appropriated, to be expended under the direction of the Commissioner of Public Buildings, for the purpose of fitting up the document-room and a portion of the adjoining passage, to receive, temporarily, a portion of the books of the Congressional Library."

Mr. CHANDLER. I hope that the bill will be put immediately upon its passage. If there is no objection, I will move the previous question.

The SPEAKER. As the bill makes an appropriation, it requires the unanimous consent of the House to its passage now.

There being no objection, the bill was read a third time and passed.

The bill from the Senate for relief of Thomas Snodgrass, was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The bill from the Senate for the relief of the legal representatives of John Rice Jones, was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

The SPEAKER stated that all the business on the Speaker's table was disposed of.

On motion, the House then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, January 16, 1852.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Rev. Mr. BUTLER.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

On motion by Mr. DANIEL, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of William B. Nourse, a passed midshipman in the Navy of the United States, praying payment for the discharge of duties not called for by his rank, be taken from the files of the House, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. D. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole upon the Private Calendar.

Mr. FITCH. It requires, I believe, a suspension of the rules for that purpose, and I would ask if the motion supersedes the ordinary business of the morning hour?

The SPEAKER. The 29th rule provides that Friday and Saturday in every week shall be set apart for the consideration of private bills and private business, in preference to any other, unless otherwise determined by a majority of the House.

Mr. MASON. Then let us have the regular order of business.

The question being put, the motion was agreed to.

So the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House, (Mr. SEYMOUR, of Connecticut, in the chair.)

The CHAIRMAN stated the first business before the committee was bill No. 88, for the relief of William Greer, reported by Mr. MACE from the Committee of Claims.

The bill was then read through.

Mr. GUDDINGS. I would like to hear the report made in this case read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is informed by the CLERK that the report has not yet been returned from the printer.

Mr. MACE. The claim of Mr. Greer is one growing out of a contract which he had with the Post Office Department, to furnish certain blanks, &c., to the postmasters of the State of Georgia. Under his contract, when he distributed this post office matter to the postmasters of that State he was required to take vouchers, and these vouchers were to be transmitted to the Post Office Department, amongst other things to avoid the payment of postage. But it seems that at Savannah, the postmaster, instead of doing this, transmitted these vouchers directly to Mr. Greer; and for the purpose of obtaining them, he was compelled to pay the postage upon them. The postage amounted to $60 25; and the Post Office Department refused to make this allowance, because they were not transmitted to the Post Office Department, and because the Postmaster General conceived that he had not the authority to make the allowance under any law. Had these vouchers been transmitted to the Post Office Department directly, as they should have been, there would have been no difficulty about it. They were transmitted to Mr. Greer, and he had to pay the postage for them out of his own pocket. So the committee must see, that according to every principle of right, Mr. Greer is entitled to this sum of money, with interest upon it.

Mr. FOWLER. When did this take place?

Mr. MACE. In 1843.

The bill was then ordered to be laid aside, and reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass.

WILLIAMS, STAPLES & WILLIAMS.

The bill (No. 89) for the relief of Williams, Staples & Williams, came up as the next in order upon the calendar.

The bill was then read through.

Mr. FOWLER. Let us hear the report in this case.

The CHAIRMAN. There has been no report made in regard to it.

Mr. FULLER, of Maine. The bill states substantially the facts of the case. There was a report made, but I understand it has not been printed. The persons claiming relief in this case imported molasses. By an agreement between the importers and the collector of the port, the goods were stored in the warehouse mutually agreed upon by them—the public warehouse at that time being thought not sufficiently safe. The goods while in that state, in unbroken packages, were destroyed by fire. The importers paid the duties, and they went to the Treasury for relief. Being advised they could not get it there, they applied to Congress to have the duties refunded to them. It is, therefore, simply to refund the money they paid upon these several hogsheads of molasses which were destroyed, and which did not go into the general consumption of the country, that this bill is reported. The bill is one in accordance with universal usage from the foundation of this Government.

Mr. FOWLER. I wish to ask one question. It is, whether this is not the same case which was brought up here during the last session of Congress?

Mr. FULLER. It is the same bill, and it was reported upon favorably. In no case, I believe, where duties have been paid upon goods destroyed by fire, while in the public warehouse, and where other goods were necessarily imported to fill their place, have the Government refused, upon application, to refund the duties.

Mr. GIDDINGS. What was done with the bill at the last session?

Mr. FULLER. It failed for want of time, like a great many others.
